

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

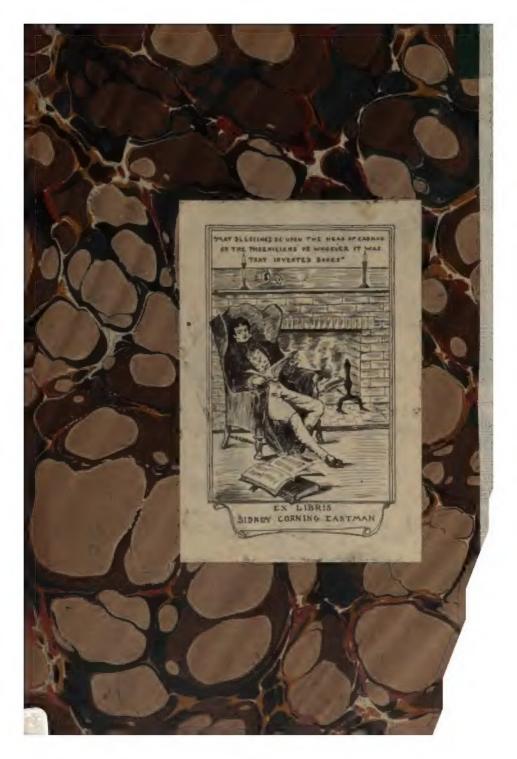

We also ask that you:

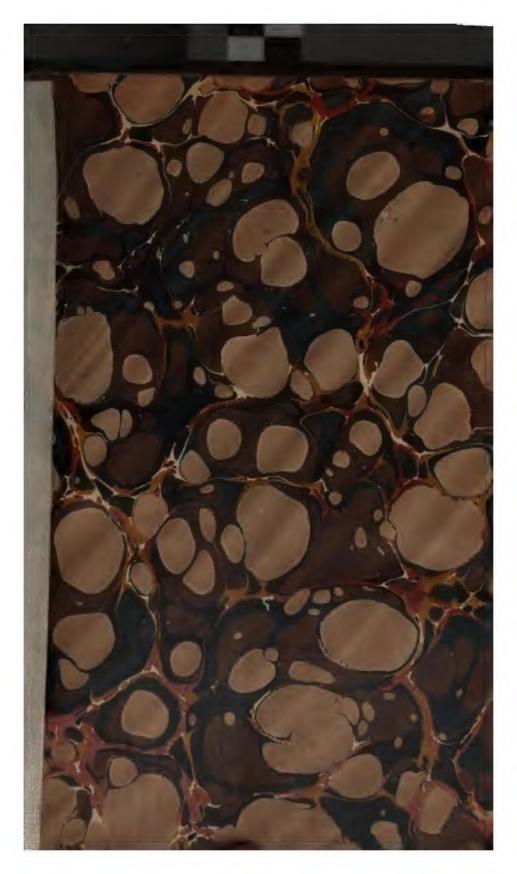

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

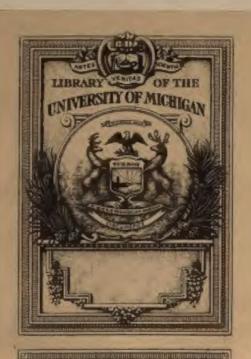

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

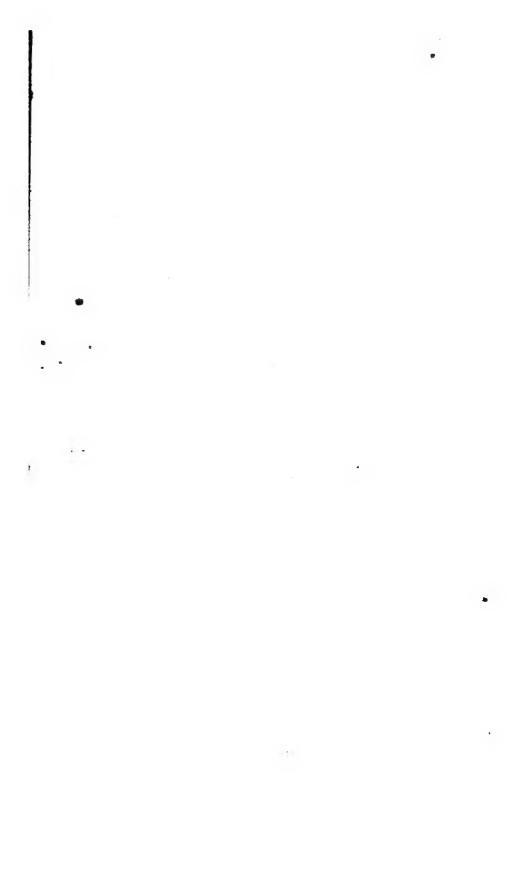

Bequest of Sidney C. Eastman

H18

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

LITERATURE OF EUROPE,

IN THE

FIFTEENTH, SIXTEENTH, AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES.

BY

HENRY HALLAM, F.R.A.S.

FOREIGN ASSOCIATE OF THE ACADEMY OF MORAL AND POLYTICAL SCIENCES IN THE FRENCH INSTITUTE.

De modo autem hujusmodi historiæ conscribendæ, iliud imprimis monemus, ut materia et copis ejus, non tantum ab historiis et criticis petatur, verum etiam per singulas amorum centurias, aut etiam minora intervalla, seriatim libri pracipul, qui eo temporia spatio conscripti sunt, in consilium adhibeantur; ut ex corum non perlectione (id enim infinitum quiddam easet), sed degustatione, et observatione argumenti, styll, methodi, genius illius temporis literarius, veluti incantatione quadam, a mortuis evocatur, ... Bacon de Augm. Scient.

Becond Gition.

IN THREE VOLUMES.

VOL. III.

LONDON: JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET. 1843.

I ANDON:
Printed by A. Sporriswoods,
New-Street-Square.

Sukney Facturan

CONTENTS

O

THE THIRD VOLUME.

PART III. - continued.

CHAP. V.

HISTORY OF PORTRY FROM 1600 TO 1650.

				Page		Page
imation of	f the 8	eicent	tisti	3	Serrasin	21
e so great	as for	merly	-	8	Low State of German Literature	22
! them by	Rubbi	- '	-	4	Literary Societies	22
Salfi	400		-	4	Opits	23
f Marini	-	-	-	5	His Followers	24
acter	-	-	-	6	Dutch Poetry	25
ularity	-	-	-	7	Spiegel	25
Rapite of	Tasson	i	-	8	Hooft, Cats, Vondel	26
h -	-	-	-	9	Danish Poetry	27
)MEIB	-	-	-	11	English Poets numerous in this	•
es of Span	ish Po	etry	-	11	Age	27
1ances	-	*	-	12	Phineas Fletcher	27
thers Arge	nsela	-	-	13	Giles Fletcher	28
-	-	-	-	13	Philosophical Poetry	29
-	-	-	, and	14	Lord Brooke	29
f Taste in	Spani	sh Ve	rse	15	Denham's Cooper's Hill	30 and far-fe	tched A	llusio	1115	16	Poets called Metaphysical	31
-	-	-	-	17	Donne	32
ols forme	d by hi	m	-	17	Crashaw	33
-	-	-	-	19	Cowley	33
s upon his	Poetr	y	-	20	Johnson's Character of him -	84
Regnier	-	-	-	20	Narrative Poets. — Daniel -	34
- Maynard	-	-	-	21	Drayton's Polyolbion	35
-	-	-	-	21	Browne's Britannia's Pastorale -	36

					Page			1	Page
Bir John Beau	mont	-	-	-	36 j	Allegro and Penseroso	-	-	48
Davenant's Go	ndibe	rt	-	-	87	Ode on the Nativity	-	-	48
Sonnets of Sha	ksper	ure .		-	87	His Sonnets	-	-	49
The Person w	hom 1	they	address	-	39	Anonymous Poetry -	-	-	49
Sonnets of Dri					41	Latin Poets of France	-	-	49
Carew -	-	-	-		42	In Germany and Italy	-	-	50
Ben Jonson				-	43	In Holland Heinsius	-	-	51
Wither -	-	-	-	-	48	Casimir Sarbievius -	-	-	5 L
Habington	-	-	-	-	44	Barleus		-	52
Earl of Pembi		-	-	-	44	BaldeGreek Poem of	Hein	sius	58
Suckling	_	-	_	-	44	Latin Poets of Scotland	,	on-
Lovelace	-	-	-	-	45	ston's Psalms -	-	-	53
Herrick	-	-	-	-	45	Owen's Epigrams -	-	-	54
Milton -	-	-	-	-	46	Alabaster's Roxana -	-	-	54
His Comus	_	-	-	-	4 6	May's Supplement to Lu	C&TL		54
Lycidas	-	-	-	-	47	Milton's Latin Poems	_	-	55
-

CHAP. VI.

HISTORY OF DRAMATIC LITERATURE FROM 1600 to 1650.

Decline of the Italian Theatre -	57	Number of Theatres -		77
Filli di Sciro	58	Encouraged by James	-	77
Translations of Spanish Drames -	59	General Taste for the Stage		78
	59	Theatres closed by the Parliamen	t	79
	60	Shakspeare's Twelfth Night	_	80
	61	Merry Wives of Windsor	_	80
	61	36	_	82
La Vida es Sueno	62	Lear	_	84
A Secreto agravio secreta vengança	64	The second Advanced	_	84
	64	Pericles	_	86
His Merita sometimes overrated -	66	His Roman Tragedies. Juliu	_	00
Plays of Hardy	67	Cesar	_	87
	69	Antony and Cleopatra -		87
	70	Coriolanus		88
	71	His Retirement and Death	_	89
	72	Chartman of his Classics	_	89
	72	His Judgment	_	90
Rodogune	73	His Observator	_	_
	78	His Donalasias	_	92
- 1	74	Critics on Shakspeare	-	98
Nicomède	74	Ron Ionean	-	98
Faults and Beauties of Corneille -	74	The Alchemist	-	94
Le Menteur	75	Volpone, or The Fox		95
Other French Tragedies -	75	The Silent Woman	-	96
Wenceslas of Rotrou	76	Sad Shanhand	_	97
Popularity of the Stage under	•	Beaumont and Fletcher	-	97
Elizabeth	77	Corrupt State of their Text	-	98
Mileotti - "		Corrupt Distr of Mell Jext	-	98

CONTENTS.

•	Page		Page
The Maid's Tragedy -	- 99	Their Tragedies	- 111
Philaster		Inferior to their Comedies -	- 112
King and No King	• 101	Their Female Characters -	- 113
The Elder Brother	- 102	Massinger: General Nature of	hia
The Spanish Curate	- 102	Dramas	- 114
The Custom of the Country	- 103	His Delineations of Character	- 115
The Loyal Subject	- 103	His Subjects	- 116
Beggar's Bush	- 104	Beauty of his Style	- 116
The Scornful Lady	- 104	Inferiority of his comic Powers
Valentinian
The Two Noble Kinsmen -	- 106		- 117
The Faithful Shepherdess -	- 107		- 118
Rule a Wife and Have a W		Ford	- 118
Some other Plays		Shirley	- 119
Origin of Fletcher's Plays -
Defects of their Plots -		1 *
Their Sentiments and Styl			_ matic
Their Characters
		· ·

CHAP. VII.

HISTORY OF POLITE LITERATURE IN PROSE FROM 1600 to 1650.

Decline of Taste in Italy 124	Legal Speeches of Patru 142
Style of Galileo 126	And of Le Maistre 143
Bentivoglio 126	Improvement in English Style - 144
Boccalini's News from Parnassus 126	Earl of Essex 145
His Pietra del Paragone 128	Knolles's History of the Turks - 146
Farrante Pallavicino - 128	Raleigh's History of the World - 148
Dictionary Della Crusca - 129	Daniel's History of England - 149
Grammatical Works. Buonmattei	Bacon 149
Bartoli 129	Milton 150
Tassoni's Remarks on Petrarch - 130	Clarendon 150
Galileo's Remarks on Tasso - 130	The Icon Basilice 151
Sforza Pallavicino 130	Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy - 152
And other critical Writers - 131	Earle's Characters 152
Prolusiones of Strada 131	Overbury's Characters 152
Spanish Prose. Gracian - 132	Jonson's Discoveries 158
French Prose. Du Vair 133	Publication of Don Quixote - 154
Balzac 133	Its Reputation 154
Character of his Writings - 134	New Views of ita Design - 155
His Letters 135	Probably erroneous - 156
Voiture. Hôtel Rambouillet - 136	Difference between the two Parts 157
Establishment of French Academy 137	Excellence of this Romance - 159
Its Objects and Constitution - 139	Minor Novels of Cervantes - 160
It publishes a Critique on the Cid 140	Other Novels - Spanish 160
Vaugelas's Remarks on the French	And Italian 160
Language 141	French Romances - Astrée - 160
La Mothe le Vayer 142	Heroic Romances - Gomberville - 161
•

Calprenède	- 161	Few Books of Fiction in England 166
Scuderi Argenis of Barcley -	- 162 - 164	Mundus Alter et Idem of Hall - 167 Godwin's Journey to the Moon - 167
His Euphormio -	- 165	Howell's Dodona's Grove - 168
Campanella's City of the Sur	1 - 165	Adventures of Baron de Fæneste 1814
	Ottan	. VIII.
	UHAP	. VIII.

HISTORY OF MATREMATICAL AND PHYSICAL SCIENCE PROM 1600 TO 1650.

State of Science in 16th Century 170	Other Discoveries by him - 187
Tedionaness of Calculations - 171	Spots of the Sun discovered - 188
Napier's Invention of Logarithms 171	Copernican System held by Galileo 188
Their Nature 171	His Dialogues, and Persecution - 189
Property of Numbers discovered	Descartes alarmed by this 190
by Stifelius 171	Progress of Copernican System - 191
Extended to Magnitudes - 172	Descartes denies general Gravita-
By Napier 178	tion 191
Tables of Napier and Briggs - 173	Cartesian Theory of the World - 192
Kepler's new Geometry 174	Transits of Mercury and Venus - 194
Its Difference from the Ancient - 175	Laws of Mechanics 194
Adopted by Galileo 176	Statics of Galileo 194
Extended by Cavalieri 176	_
Applied to the Ratios of Solids - 177	-0.
Problem of the Cycloid 178	Law of Motion laid down by Des-
Progress of Algebra 179	cartes 198
Briggs. Girard 179	Also those of compound Forces - 199
Harriott 179	Other Discoveries in Mechanics 199
Descartes 181	In Hydrostatics and Pneumatics 199
His Application of Algebra to	Optica Discoveries of Kepler - 201
Curves 181	Invention of the Telescope - 201
Suspected Plagiarism from Harriott 182	Of the Microscope 202
Fermat 183	Antonio de Dominis - 202
Algebraic Geometry not successful	Dioptries of Descartes. Law of
at first 184	Refraction 203
Astronomy Kepler 184	Disputed by Fermat 204
Conjectures as to Comets 186	Curves of Descartes 204
Galileo's Discovery of Jupiter's	Theory of the Rainbow 205
Satellites 186	- 400

CHAP. IX.

HISTORY OF SOME OTHER PROVINCES OF LITERATURE FROM 1600 to 1650.

Aldrovandus -		- 206	Botany Columna 210
		- 206	John and Gaspar Bauhin 211
Rio and Marcgraf			Parkinson 211
Jonston -		- 207	Valves of the Veins discovered - 212
Fabricius on the	Language	of	Theory of the Blood's Circulation 212
Brutes .		- 208	Sometimes ascribed to Servetus - 218

vii

Page		Page
To Columbus 214	Purchas's Pilgrim	- 226
And to Casalpin 215	Olearius and Pietro della Valle	- 226
Generally unknown before Harvey - 216	Lexicon of Ferrari	- 227
His Discovery 216	Maps of Blaew	- 227
Unjustly doubted to be original - 216		- 228
Harvey's Treatise on Generation - 218	Mendoza's Wars of Granada	- 228
Lacteals discovered by Asellius - 218	Mezeray	- 228
Optical discoveries of Scheiner - 219		- 229
Medicine. — Van Helmont - 219	0	- 229
Diffusion of Hebrew 220	Universities	- 229
Language not studied in the best		- 230
Method 221	Casaubon's Account of Oxford	- 230
The Buxtorfs 221	Catalogue of Bodleian Library	- 232
Vowel points rejected by Cappel - 222	Continental Libraries -	- 282
	Italian Academies	- 233
		- 234
Chaldee and Byriac 224	The Lincel
Arabic 224	Prejudice for Antiquity diminishe
Erpenius 224	Browne's Vulgar Errors -	- 286
Golius 224	Life and Character of Peiresc	- 287
Other Eastern Languages - 225

CONTENTS.

PART IV.

ON THE LITERATURE OF THE SECOND HALF OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAP. I.

RISTORY OF ANGIENT LITERATURE IN EUROPE PROM 1650 TO 1700.

James Frederic Gronovius -	-	243	Stanley's Æschylus 250
James Gronovius	-	244	Other English Philologers 251
Grevius	-	244	Bentley 25
Isaac Vossius	-	244	His Epistle to Mill 251
Decline of German Learning	-	244	Dissertation on Phalaris 251
Spanheim –	-	245	Disadvantages of Scholars in that
Jesuit Colleges in France -	_	245	Age 255
Port Royal Writers. Lancelot	-	245	Theseuri of Greevius and of Gro-
Latin Grammara. Perizonius	-	246	novius 254
Delphin Editions	-	246	Fabretti 254
Le Fevre and the Daciers -	-	247	Numismatics. Spanheim — Vail-
Henry Valois. Complaints	of		lent 255
Decay of Learning -	-	248	Chronology. Usher 250
English Learning, Duport	-	248	Pezron 250
Greek not much studied -	-	249	Marsham 257
Gataker's Cinnus and Antonipus	-	250

CHAP. II. HISTORY OF THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE PROM 1650 TO 1700.

Pa	ge Page
Decline of Papal Influence 25
Dispute of Louis XIV, with Inno-	Arminianism in England 275 cent XI 25
Four Articles of 1682 25	- I
Dupin on the Ancient Discipline 26
Dupin's Ecclesiastical Library - 26	1 Bull's Defensio Fidei Nicense - 278
Fleury's Ecclesiastical History - 26	Not satisfactory to all 279
His Dissertations 26	2 Mystics 279
Protestant Controversy in France 26	3 Fenelon 280
Bossuet's Exposition of Catholic	Change in the Character of Theo-
Faith 26
His Conference with Claude - 26	5 Freedom of many Writings - 281
Correspondence with Molanus and	Thoughts of Pascal 282
Leibnitz 26
His Variations of Protestant	Progress of tolerant Principles - 288
Churches 26	7 Bayle's Philosophical Commentary 289
Anglican Writings against Popery 26	8 Locke's Letter on Toleration - 289
Taylor's Dissuasive 26
Barrow. — Stillingfleet 26	9 Bourdaloue 291
Jansenius 26	9 Compared with Bossuet 292
Condemnation of his Augustinus	Funeral Discourses of Bossuet - 292
in France 27	0 Fléchier 294
And at Rome 27	1 English Sermons Barrow - 295
The Jansenista take a Distinction 27	1 South 296
And are persecuted 27:	2 Tillotson 297
Progress of Arminianism 27:	8 Expository Theology 297
Courcelles 27:	Pearson on the Creed 298
Limborch 273	Simon's Critical Histories 298
Le Clerc 27	4

CHAP. III.

HISTORY OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY FROM 1650 TO 1700.

Aristotelian Metaphysics -		300	More 308
Their Decline. Thomas White		301	Gassendi 308
Logic	-	301	His Logic 309
Stanley's History of Philosophy	-	303	His Theory of Ideas 309
Gale's Court of Gentiles -	-	303	And of the Nature of the Soul . 310
Cudworth's Intellectual System	-	304	Distinguishes Ideas of Reflection - 811
Its Object	-	304	Also Intellect from Imagination - 312
Sketch of it	-	305	His Philosophy misunderstood by
His Plastic Nature	-	305	Stewart 313
His Account of old Philosophy	-	806	Bernier's Epitome of Gassendi - 315
His Arguments against Atheism	-	306	Process of Cartesian Philosophy - 316

a
4	-

CONTENTS.

	Page		Page
La Forge.—Regis	- 517	Glanvil's Scepsis Scientifica	- 856
Huet's Censure of Cartesianisa	n - 319	His Plus Ultra	- 360
Port-Royal Logic	- 320	Dalgarno	- 361
Malebranche	- 322	Wilkins	- 361
His Style	- 323	Locke on Human Understanding	362
Sketch of his Theory -	- 324	Ita Merita	- 362
Character of Malebranche -	- 888	Its Defects	- 364
Compared with Pascal -	- 338	Origin of Ideas, according to Locke	e 365
Arnsuld on true and false Idea	u - 330		- 365
Norris	- 340	An Error as to geometrical Figure	e 9 68
Pascal	- 840		- 871
Spinosa's Ethica	- 342		- 372
Its general Originality -	- 348	His Love of Truth and Originality
View of his Metaphysical The			- 374
Spinosa's Theory of Action			- 875
Passion	- 358		- 376
Character of Spinosism -	- 354	Locke's Conduct of Understanding

CHAP. IV.

HISTORY OF MORAL AND POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND OF JURISPRUDENCE FROM 1650 то 1700.

Casuistry of the Jesuits 379 ;	Fenelon on Female Education - 417
Pascal's Provincial Letters 379	Puffendorf's Theory of Politics - 419
Their Truth questioned by some - 380	Politics of Spinosa 428
Taylor's Ductor Dubitantium - 381	His Theory of a Monarchy - 425
Its Character and Defects 381	Amelot de la Houssaye 427
Cudworth's immutable Morality - 382	Harrington's Oceana 427
Nicole, La Placette 383	Patriarcha of Filmer 429
Other Writers 383	Sidney's Discourses on Govern-
Moral System of Spinosa 384	ment 430
Cumberland's De Legibus Nature 387	Locke on Government 430
Analysis of Prolegomena 387	Observations on this Treatise - 438
His Theory expanded afterwards 391	Avis aux Refugiéz, perhaps by
Remarks on Cumberland's Theory 397	Bayle 439
Puffendorf's Law of Nature and	Political Economists 440
Nations 399	Mun on Foreign Trade 441
Analysis of this Work 400	Child on Trade 442
Puffendorf and Paley compared - 406	Locke on the Coin 442
Rochefoucault 407	Statistical Tracts 444
La Bruyere 409	Works of Leibnitz on Roman Law 445
Education Milton's Tractate - 410	Civil Jurists Godefroy-Domat 447
Locke on Education. Its Merits 410	Noodt on Usury 447
And Defects 411	Law of Nations Puffendorf - 448

VOL. III. a

CHAP. V. RISTORY OF PORTRY FROM 1650 TO 1700.

Page	Page
Improved Tone of Italian Poetry 449	He owes less to Homer than the
Filicaja 450	Tragedians 465
Guidi 451	Compared with Dante 466
Menzini 452	Elevation of his Style 468
Salvator Rosa - Redi 452	His Blindness 468
Other Poets 458	His Passion for Music 469
Christina's Patronage of Letters - 453	Faults in Paradise Lost - 470
Society of Arcadians 453	Its Progress to Fame 470
La Fontaine 454	Paradise Regained 471
Character of his Fables 455	Samson Agonistes 471
Boileau. His Epistles 456	Dryden. His earlier Poems - 472
His Art of Poetry 456	Absalom and Achitophel 473
Comparison with Horace 457	Mac Flecknoe 474
The Lutrin 458	The Hind and Panther 475
General Character of his Poetry - 458	Its singular Fable 475
Lyric Poetry lighter than before - 458	Its Reasoning 475
Benserade 459	The Fables 476
Chaulieu 459	His Odes — Alexander's Feast - 477
Pastoral Poetry 459	His Translation of Virgil - 477
Segrais 460	Decline of Poetry from the Re-
Deshoulières 460	storation 478
Fontenelle 460	Some minor Poets enumerated - 478
Bad epic Poems 461	Latin Poets of Italy 480
German Poetry 461	Ceva 480
Waller 461	Sergardi 481
Butler's Hudibras 462	Of France - Quillet 481
Paradise Lost - Choice of Subject 463	Menage 481
Open to some Difficulties 463	Rapin on Gardens 481
Its Arrangement 464	Santeul 483
Characters of Adam and Eve - 465	Latin Poetry in England 483

CHAP, VI.

HISTORY OF DRAMATIC LITERATURE FROM 1650 TO 1700.

Italian and S	panish	Dran	28	- 485	Athalie	_	498
Racine's first	Trage	ediea	-	- 485	Racine's Female Characters	_	494
Andromaque	-	-	-	- 486	Racine compared with Corneille	-	495
Britannicus	-		-	- 488	Beauty of his Style	-	495
Berenice	-	-	-	- 489	Thomas Corneille - His Ariane	-	496
Bajazet	-	-	-	- 489	Manlius of La Fosse -		497
Mithridate	-	-	-	- 490	Molière – – –		498
I phigénie	-	-	_	- 491	L'Avare		498
Phédre	-	-	-	- 492	L'Ecole des Femmes _		499
Eather	-	•	•	- 493	Le Misauthrope		500

CONTENTS.

		Page						Page
Les Femmes Savantes	-	- 500	Heroic Trage	dies of	Dryd	en	-	510
Tartuffe	-	- 501	His later Tra	gedies	_	-	-	510
Bourgeois Gentilhomme.	Geor	ge	Don Sebastisi	1 -	-		-	511
Dandin	-	- 502	Spanish Friat	-	-	-	-	512
Character of Molière	-	- 503	Otway	-	_	-		518
Les Plaideurs of Racine	-	- 504	Southern	-	-	-	-	518
Regnard — Le Joueur	_	- 504	Lee	-	-	-	-	514
His other Plays -	_	- 505	Congreve		-	-		514
Quinault. Boursault	_	- 505	Comedies of		II.'s	Reign	_	514
Dancourt	-	- 506	Wycherley	-	-		-	515
Brueys		- 507	Improvement	after (he Re	volutio	110	516
Operas of Quainault	-	- 507	Congreve			_		516
Revival of the English T	beatre	- 508	Love for Love			-	_	517
Change of public Taste	-	- 509	His other Cor	medies	-	-		517
Ita Causes -	-	- 509	Farquhar, V	anbru	gh	-		518
		-01

CHAP. VII.

BISTORY OF POLITE LITERATURE IN PROSE, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

Low State of Literature in Italy - 519	And Le Clerc	- 538
Crescimbeni 519	Leipsic Acts	- 538
Age of Louis XIV. in France - 520	Bayle's Thoughts on the Comet	- 539
Fontenelle — his Character - 521	His Dictionary	- 539
His Dialogues of the Dead 522	Baillet. Morhof	- 541
Those of Fenelon 522	The Ana	- 541
Fontenelle's Plurality of Worlds - 522	English Style in this Period	- 542
His History of Oracles 523	Hobbes	- 543
St. Evremond 524	Cowley	- 543
Madame de Sevigné 524	Evelyn	- 544
The French Academy 525	Dryden	- 544
French Grammars 526	His Essay on Dramatic Poesy	- 546
Bonhours' Entretiens d'Ariste et	Improvements in his Style	- 546
d'Eugène 527	His critical Character -	- 547
Attacked by Barbier d'Aucour - 529	Rymer on Tragedy	- 548
La Manière de Bien Penser - 530	Sir William Temple's Essays	- 548
Rapin's Reflections on Eloquence	Style of Locke	- 549
and Poetry 530	Sir George Mackenzie's Essays	- 549
His Parallela of Great Men = 531	Andrew Fletcher	- 549
Bossu on Epic Poetry 532	Walton's Complete Angler -	- 550
Fontenelle's critical Writings - 532	Wilkins's New World -	- 550
Preference of French Language to	Antiquity defended by Temple	- 551
Latin 532	Wotton's Reflections -	- 552
General Superiority of Ancients	Quevedo's Visions	- 552
disputed 533	French Heroic Romances -	- 553
Charles Perrault 533	Novels of Madame La Fayette	- 553
Fontenelle 534	Scarron's Roman Comique	- 554
Boileau's Defence of Antiquity - 535	Cyrano de Bergerac	- 555
First Reviews - Journal des Scavans 535	Segrais	- 555
Reviews established by Bayle - 537	Perrault	- 556

CONTENTS.

Hamilton - 56 If élémaque of Fenelon - 55 Deficiency of English Romances - 55 Pilozim's Progress - 55	6 Turkish Spy 559 7 Chiefly of English Origin - 560 8 Swift's Tale of a Tub - 568
Pilgrim's Progresa 55	8

CHAP. VIII.

HISTORY OF PHYSICAL AND OTHER LITERATURE PROM 1650 TO 1700.

Reasons for omitting Mathemati	CS	564	Camerarius confirms this -	_	581
Academy del Cimento -	-	564	Predecessors of Grew -	_	582
Royal Society	-	565	Malpighi	_	582
Academy of Sciences at Paris	-	566	Early Notions of Geology -	_	583
State of Chemistry	_	567	Burnet's Theory of Earth -		584
Becker	_	567	Other Geologists		584
Boyle	_	568	Protogæa of Leibnitz -		585
His Metaphysical Works -	_	568	Circulation of Blood established		586
Extract from one of them -	_	569	Willis, Vieussens		587
His Merits in Physics and Ch			Malpighi		587
mistry		569	Other Anatomists		587
General Character of Boyle	_	570	Medical Theories		588
Of Hooke and others -	_	570	Polyglott of Walton		590
Lemery		571	Hottinger		590
Slow Progress of Zoology -		572	Spencer		590
Before Ray		572	Bochart		590
His Synopsis of Quadrupeds	_	573	Pococke		591
Merits of this Work -		573	D'Herbelot		591
Redi		574	Hyde		591
Swammerdam		575	Maps of the Sansons -		592
Lister	_	575	De Lisle's Map of the World	-	592
Comparative Anatomy -	_	575	Voyages and Travels -	•	593
Botany	_	576			594
Jungius	-	576			594
Morison	_	576			594
Ray		578			595
Rivinus		578			595
Tournefort	_	579	Burnet		595
Vegetable Physiology -		580	General Character of 17th Cen		-50
	_	580			596
His Anatomy of Plants -	_	580	Conclusion		596
He discovers the Sexual System	_	581	•		-04
•

PART III. - continued.

ON THE LITERATURE OF THE FIRST HALF OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF POETRY, FROM 1600 TO 1650.

SECT. I.

ON ITALIAN POETRY.

Characters of the Poets of the Seventeenth Century -- Sometimes too much depreciated -- Marini -- Tassoni -- Chiabrera,

1. At the close of the sixteenth century, few remained in Italy to whom posterity has assigned a considerable reputation for their poetry. But the ensuing period matter ages than any other since the revival of letters. The seicentisti, the writers of the seventeenth century, were stigmatised in modern criticism, till the word has been associated with nothing but false taste and every thing that should be shunned and despised. Those who had most influence in leading the literary judgment of Italy went back, some almost exclusively to the admiration of Petrarch and his contemporaries, some to the various writers who cultivated their native poetry in the sixteenth century. Salvini is of the former class, Muratori of the latter.*

2. The last age, that is, the concluding twenty years of the eighteenth century, brought with it, in many respects, a change of public sentiment in Italy. A great as masculine turn of thought, an expanded grasp of philosophy, a thirst, ardent to excess, for great exploits and Muratori, Della Perfetta Poesia, is are contained some remarks by Salvini, one of the best books of criticism in the a bigotted Florentine.

 Italian language; in the second volume noble praise, has distinguished the Italian people of the last fifty years from their progenitors of several preceding generations. It is possible that the enhanced relative importance of the Lombards in their national literature may have not been without its influence in rendering the public taste less fastidious as to purity of language, less fine in that part of aesthetic discernment which relates to the grace and felicity of expression, while it became also more apt to demand originality, nervousness, and the power of exciting emotion. The writers of the seventeenth century may, in some cases, have gained by this revolution; but those of the preceding ages, especially the Petrarchists whom Bembo had led, have certainly lost ground in national admiration.

3. Rubbi, editor of the voluminous collection, called Parnaso Italiano, had the courage to extol the "seicentistic of them, in all but style, above their predecessors." Give them, he says, "but grace and purity, take from them their capricious exaggerations, their perpetual and forced metaphors, you will think Marini the first poet of Italy, and his followers, with their fulness of imagery and personification, will make you forget their monotonous predecessors. I do not advise you to make a study of the seicentisti; it would spoil your style, perhaps your imagination; I only tell you that they were the true Italian poets; they wanted a good style, it is admitted, but they were so far from wanting genius and imagination, that these perhaps tended to impair their style."

parts of this panegyric, and especially the strongly hyperbolical praise of Marini, carried too far. But I am not sure that we should be wrong in agreeing with Rubbi, that there is as much catholic poetry, by which I mean that which is good in all ages and countries, in some of the minor productions of the seventeenth as in those of the sixteenth age. The sonnets, especially, have more individuality and more meaning. In this, however, I should wish to two, out of his long collection in fifty.

Parmaso Italiano, sol ali. (Avver-volumes, to the writers of the sevents onth timento.) Rublu, however, gives but century.

include the latter portion of the seventeenth century. Salfi, a writer of more taste and judgment than Rubbi, has recently taken the same side, and remarked the superior originality, the more determined individuality, the greater variety of subjects, above all, what the Italians now most value, the more earnest patriotism of the later poets.* Those immediately before us, belonging to the first half of the century, are less numerous than in the former age; the sonnetteers especially have produced much less; and in the collections of poetry, even in that of Rubbi, notwithstanding his eulogy, they take up very little room. Some, however, have obtained a durable renown, and are better known in Europe than any, except the Tassos, that flourished in the last fifty years of the golden age.

5. It must be confessed that the praise of a masculine genius, either in thought or language, cannot be Adone of bestowed on the poet of the seventeenth century Marian whom his contemporaries most admired, Giovanni Battista Marini. He is, on the contrary, more deficient than all the rest in such qualities, and is indebted to the very opposite characteristics for the sinister influence which he exerted on the public taste. He was a Neapolitan by birth, and gave to the world his famous Adone in 1623. As he was then fiftyfour years old, it may be presumed, from the character of the poem, that it was in great part written long before; and he had already acquired a considerable reputation by his other works. The Adone was received with an unbounded and ill-judging approbation; ill-judging in a critical sense, because the faults of this poem are incapable of defence, but not unnatural, as many parallel instances of the world's enthusiasm have shown. No one had before carried the corruption of taste so far; extravagant metaphors, false thoughts, and conceits on equivocal words, are very frequent in the Adone; and its author stands accountable in some measure for his imitators, who during more than half a century looked up to Marini with emulous folly, and frequently succeeded in greater deviations from pure taste without his imagination and elegance.

^{*} Saifi, Hist Litt. de l'Italie (continuation de Ginguené), vol. xu. p. 424

6. The Adone is one of the longest poems in the world, containing more than 45,000 lines. He has shown some ingenuity in filling up the canvas of so slight a story by additional incidents from his own invention, and by long episodes allusive to the times in which he lived. But the subject, expanded so interminably, is essentially destitute of any superior interest, and fit only for an enervated people, barren of high thoughts and high actions, the Italy, notwithstanding some bright exceptions, of the seventeenth century. If we could overcome this essential source of weariness, the Adone has much to delight our fancy and our ear. Marini is, more than any other poet, the counterpart of Ovid; his fertility of imagination, his ready accumulation of circumstances and expressions, his easy flow of language, his harmomous versification, are in no degree inferior; his faults are also the same; for in Ovid we have all the overstrained figures and the false conceits of Marini. But the Italian poet was incapable of imitating the truth to nature and depth of feeling which appear in many parts of his ancient prototype, nor has he as vigorous an expression. Never does Marini rise to any high pitch; few stanzas, perhaps, are remembered by natives for their beauty, but many are graceful and pleasing, all are easy and musical.* " Perhaps," says Salfi, " with the exception of Ariosto, no one has been more a poet by nature than het;" a praise, however, which may justly seem hyperbolical to those who recall their attention to the highest attributes of poetry.

Five starmar of the seventh canto, being a choral song of sityrs and late chants, are thrown into term advacable, and have been accounted by the Italian an extraordinary effort of skird, from the difficulty of sustaining a matre which is not strong in rhymes with so much spirit and case. Lact were also to divided into three parts, themselves separately advacable, though not rhyming. One starms will make this clear.

Here's reas administed pampino 18 ms, or very facilities, a passion of the control of the contro

Though this metrical skill may not be of the bigliest merit in poetry, it is no more to be slighted than facility of touch in a painter.

If Vol viv p. 1-17. The character of Marini's poetry which this critic has given, is in general very just, and in good taste. Comming our 12-2, has also done justice, and no more than justice, to Marini. Tradesschi has hardly said enough in his favour, and as to Muratori, it was his business to restore and mentant a purity of taste, which rendered him saints towards the excesses of such poets as Marini.

7. Marini belongs to that very numerous body of poets who, delighted with the spontaneity of their ideas, And popul never reject any that arise; their parental love forbids all preference, and an impartial law of gavelkind shares their page among all the offspring of their brain. Such were Ovid and Lucan, and such have been some of our own poets of great genius and equal fame. Their fertility astonishes the reader, and he enjoys for a time the abundant banquet; but satiety is too sure a consequence, and he returns with less pleasure to a second perusal. The censure of criticism falls invariably, and sometimes too harshly, on this sort of poetry; it is one of those cases where the critic and the world are most at variance; but the world is apt, in this instance, to reverse its own judgment, and yield to the tribunal it had rejected. "To Marini," says an eminent Italian writer, "we owe the lawlessness of composition: the ebullition of his genius, incapable of restraint, burst through every bulwark, enduring no rule but that of his own humour, which was all for sonorous verse, bold and ingenious thoughts, fantastical subjects, a phraseology rather Latin than Italian, and in short aimed at pleasing by a false appearance of beauty. It would almost pass belief how much this style was admired, were it not so near our own time that we hear as it were the echo of its praise; nor did Dante, or Petrarch, or Tasso, or perhaps any of the ancient poets, obtain in their lives so much applause." But Marini, who died in 1625, had not time to enjoy much of this glory. The length of this poem, and the diffuseness which produces its length, render it nearly impossible to read through the Adone; and it wants that inequality which might secure a preference to detached portions. The story of Psyche in the fourth canto may perhaps be as fair a specimen of Marini as could be taken: it is not easy to destroy the beauty of that fable, nor was be unfitted to relate it with grace and interest; but he has displayed all the blemishes of his own style. t

Crescimbeni, i., 470.

Andres even goes so far as to declare, that no one can read the Adone whose 4 The Adone has been frequently that no one can read the Adone whose charged with mant of decency. It was beart as well as tasto is not correct; and put to the him of the Roman jugacities. That, both for the sake of good morals and grave writers have deemed it necessary to product against its ligentiqueness of every one's hands. After such inves-

8. The Secchia Rapita of Alessandro Tassoni, published at Paris in 1622, is better known in Europe than might have been expected from its local subject, idiomatic style, and unintelligible personalities. It turns, as the title imports, on one of the petty wars, frequent among the Italian cities as late as the beginning of the fourteenth century, wherein the Bolognese endeavoured to recover the bucket of a well, which the citizens of Modena in a prior incursion had carried off. Tassoni, by a poetical anachronism, mixed this with an earlier contest of rather more dignity between the little republics, wherein Enzio, king of Sardinia, a son of Frederic II., had been made prisoner. He has been reckoned by many the inventor, or at least the reproducer in modern times, of the mock-heroic style. Pulci, however, had led the way; and when Tassoni claims originality, it must be in a very limited view of the execution of his poem. He has certainly more of paredy than Pulci could have attempted; the great poems of Ariosto and Tasso, especially the latter, supply him with abundant opportunities for this ingenious and lively, but not spiteful, exercise of wit, and he has advoitly seized the ridiculous side of his contemporary Marini. The combat of the cities, it may be observed, is serious enough, however triffing the cause, and has its due proportion of slaughter; but Tassoni, very much in the manner of the Morgante Maggiore, throws an air of ridicule over the whole. The episodes are generally in a still more comic style. A graceful facility and a light humour, which must have been incomparably better understood by his countrymen and contemporaries, make this a very amusing poem. It is exempt from the bad taste of the age; and the few portions where the burlesque tone disappears are versified with tives, it may seem extraordinary that, though the poem of Marini must by its nature be rather voluptums, it is by far less open to such an objection than the Orlando Fumoso, nor more, I believe, than the Farry Queen. No charge is apt to be made or caproleusly as those

Hodean seems to acknowledge himself or debted to Treson, for the Lutrin, and Pope may have followed both in the though what he has added as a purely original conception. But in fact the mock-heroic or burlesque style, in a general wose, is so natural, and moreover so common, that it is allo to talk of its insentor. What class is Rabelus, Don Quante, or, in Italian, the rominee of Berteldo, als older than Passani? What else are the popular tales of children, John the Gigant eide, and many more? and Pope may have followed both in the The joem of l'assoni had a very great birst sketch of the Rape of the Lock, repetition. Voltage dot it injustice, though it was much in his own line.

much elegance. Perhaps it has not been observed, that the Count de Culagne, one of his most ludicrous characters, bears a certain resemblance to Hudibras, both by his twkward and dastardly appearance as a knight, and by his ridiculous addresses to the lady whom he woos.* None, however, will question the originality of Butler,

9. But the poet of whom Italy has, in later times, been far more proud than of Marini or Tassoni was Chiabrera. Of his long life the greater part fell within the sixteenth century; and some of his poems were published before its close; but he has generally been considered as belonging to the present period. Chabrera is the founder of a school in the lyric poetry of Italy, rendered afterwards more famous by Guidi, which affected the name of Pindaric. It is the Theban lyre which they boast to strike: it is from the fountain of Dirce that they draw their inspiration; and these allusions are as frequent in their verse, as those to Valclusa and the Sorga in the followers of Petrarch. Chabrera borrowed from Pindar that grandeur of sound, that pomp of epithets, that rich swell of imagery, that unvarying majesty of conception, which distinguish the odes of both poets. He is less frequently barsh or turgid, though the latter blemish has been sometimes observed in him, but wants also the masculine condensation of his prototype; nor does he deviate so frequently, or with so much power of imagination, into such digressions as those which generally shade from our eves, in a skilful profusion of ornament, the victors of the Grecian games whom Pindar professes to celebrate. poet of the house of Medici and of other princes of Italy, great at least in their own time, was not so much compelled to desert his immediate subject, as he who was paid for an ode by some wrestler or boxer, who could only become worthy of heroic song by attaching his name to the ancient glories of his native city. The profuse employment of mythological allusions, frigid as it appears at present, was so customary, that we can hardly impute to it much blame; and it seemed peculiarly appropriate to a style which was stu-

^{*} Cantos X, and XI. It was intended as a indicule on Marsin, but represents a real personage. Salts, 200, 147

diously formed on the Pindaric model.* The odes of Chiabrera are often panegyrical, and his manner was well fitted for that style, though sometimes we have ceased to admire those whom he extols. But he is not eminent for purity of taste, nor, I believe, of Tuscan language: he endeavoured to force the idiom, more than it would bear, by constructions and inversions borrowed from the ancient tongues; and these odes, splendid and noble as they are, bear in the estimation of critics some marks of the seventeenth century.† The satirical epistles of Chiabrera are praised by Salfi as written in a moral Horatian tone, abounding with his own experience and allusions to his time. 1 But in no other kind of poetry has he been so highly successful as in the lyric; and, though the Grecian robe is never cast away, he imitated Anacreon with as much skill as Pindar. "His lighter odes," says Crescimbeni, " are most beautiful and elegant, full of grace, vivacity, spirit, and delicacy, adorned with pleasing inventions, and differing in nothing but language from those of Anacreon. His dithyrambics I hold incapable of being excelled, all the qualities required in such compositions being united with a certain nobleness of expression which elevates all it touches upon." §

10. The greatest lyric poet of Greece was not more the model of Chiabrera than his Roman competitor was of Testi. " Had he been more attentive to the choice of his expression," says Crescimbeni, "he might have carned the name of the Tuscan Horace." The faults of his age are said to be frequently discernible in Testi; but there is, to an ordinary reader, an Horatian elegance, a certain charm of grace and case in his cauzoni, which render them pleasing. One of these, beginning, Ruscelletto orgoglioso, is highly admired by Muratori, the best, perhaps, of the Itahan critics, and one not slow to censure any defects of taste. It apparently alludes to some enemy in the court of Modena. The character of [.] Salfi justifies the continual introduction of mythology by the Italian poets, on the ground that it was a part of their rate mal robe stance, meanward with the monuments and recollections of their glury. Tail would be more to the purpose if this mythology had not been almost exclusively Greek. But perhaps all that was of classical antiquity might be bloeded in their sentiments with the memory of Rome.

[†] Soffi, vo. 250, † Id. xiii. 2012

[§] Storis del a volgar poesia, li 483. I thus canton is in Mathias, Compommenti Larici, ii, 190.

Testi was ambitious and restless, his life spent in seeking and partly in enjoying public offices, but terminated in prison. He had taken, says a later writer, Horace for his model; and perhaps like him he wished to appear sometimes a stoic, sometimes an epicurean; but he knew not like him how to profit by the lessons either of Zeno or Epicurus, so as to lead a tranquil and independent life.

11. The imitators of Chiabrera were generally unsuccessful; they became hyperbolical and exaggerated. His follow-The translation of Pindar by Alessandro Adimari,  though not very much resembling the original, has been praised for its own beauty. But these poets are not to be confounded with the Marinists, to whom they are much supe-Ciampoli, whose Rime were published in 1628, may perhaps be the best after Chiabrera.† Several obscure epic poems, some of which are rather to be deemed romances, are commemorated by the last historian of Italian literature. Among these is the Conquest of Granada by Graziani, published in 1650. Salfi justly observes that the subject is truly epic; but the poem itself seems to be nothing but a series of episodical intrigues without unity. The style, according to the same writer, is redundant, the similes too frequent and monotonous; yet he prefers it to all the heroic poems which had intervened since that of Tasso. 1

SECT. II. — On Spanish Poetry.

Romances - The Argensolas - Villegas - Gongora, and his School.

12. THE Spanish poetry of the sixteenth century might be arranged in three classes. In the first we night place that which was formed in the ancient school, of Spanish poetry. though not always preserving its characteristics; the short trochaic metres, employed in the song or the ballad, altogether national, or aspiring to be such, either in their subjects or in their style. In the second would stand that to which the imitation of the Italians had given rise, the school of Boscan and Garcilasso; and with these we might place also the epic poems which do not seem to be essentially different from similar productions of Italy. A third and not inconsiderable division, though less extensive than the others, is composed of the poetry of good sense; the didactic, semi-satirical, Horatian style, of which Mendoza was the founder, and several specimens of which occur in the Parnaso Español of Sedano.

[•] Saiti, rii, 251. † Id. p. 303. Tiraboschi, zi, 364. Baillet, on the authority of others, † Id. vol. ziii. p. 94—129. speaks less honourably of Ciampoli.

18. The romances of the Cid and many others are rethere ferred by the most competent judges to the reign of Philip III. These are by no means among the best of Spanish romances, and we should naturally expect that so artificial a style as the imitation of ancient manners and sentiments by poets in wholly a different state of society, though some men of talent might succeed in it, would soon degenerate into an affected mannerism. The Italian style continued to be cultivated; under Philip III., the decline of Spain in poetry, as in arms and national power, was not so striking as afterwards. Several poets belong to the age of that prince, and even that of Philip IV. was not destitute of men of merited reputation. Among the best

 Duran, Romançero de romanees doctrinales, amatorios, festivos, de 1829. The Mounth tomanees, with a few except. as, and these of the Cid, are uscribed by this author to the latter part of the sixties th and the first had of the severteenth century. In the preface to a former publication, Romances Mornres, this writer has sain, Cost todos for romanica que publicames en este bleo perteneces al signo 16 ", y algunos pocos a , tancipos del 1" Los a cores son descor exciden, pero sus obras I an dega lo, y mercento llegar a la posteridad. It seems manifest from internal evidence, without critical kn wiedge of the language, that these relating to the Cid are not of the middle ages, though some seem still inclined to give them a high antiquity. It is not sufficient to say that the language bas been modern sed, the whole structure of these ballads is redolent of a low age, and if the Spanish erities agree in this, I know not why foreigners should strive against them — [It s hardly, perhaps, necessary to warn the reades, that the colibrated long poem on the Cid is not reckoned among these romances.—1842]

† Antonio bestows unbounded praise on a posm of the upic class, the Bernardo of Balbuena, published at Madrid in 1641, though be compound that in his own age it by hid in the corners of booksellers' shops. Balbuena, in his opin in, has left all Spanish poets far behind him. The subject of his poem is the very common fable of Roncesvalles. Duze, a more judicious and resonable critic than Automo, while he demes this absolute presemmence of Balbuena, gives him a respectable place among the many epic writers of Spani. But I do not find him mentioned in Bouterwick; in fact, most of these poems are very scarce, and are treasures for the bibliomaniaes.

were two brothers, Lupercio and Bartholomew Argensola. These were chiefly distinguished in what I have The large called the third or Horatian manner of Spanish poetry, though they by no means confined themselves to any peculiar style. " Lupercio," says Bouterwek, " formed his style after Horace with no less assiduity than Luis de Leon; but he did not possess the soft enthusiasm of that pious poet, who in the religious spirit of his poetry is so totally unlike Horace. An understanding at once solid and ingenious, subject to no extravagant illusion, yet full of true poetic feeling, and an imagination more plastic than creative, impart a more perfect Horatian colouring to the odes, as well as to the canciones and sonnets of Lupercio. He closely imitated Horace in his didactic satires, a style of composition in which no Spanish poet had preceded him. But he never succeeded in attaining the hold combination of ideas which characterises the ode style of Horace; and his conceptions have therefore seldom any thing like the Horatian energy. On the other hand, all his poems express no less precision of language than the models after which he formed his style. His odes, in particular, are characterised by a picturesque tone of expression which he seems to have imbibed from Virgil rather than from Horace. The extravagant metaphors by which some of Herrera's odes are deformed were uniformly avoided by Lupercio," The genius of Bartholomew Argensola was very like that of his brother, nor are their writings easily distinguishable; but Bouterwek assigns, on the whole, a higher place to Bartholomew. Dieze inclines to the same judgment, and thinks the eulogy of Nicolas Antonio on these brothers, extravagant as it seems, not beyond their merits.

14. But another poet, Manuel Estevan de Villegas, whose poems, written in very early youth, entitled Amatorias or Eroticas, were published in 1620, has attained a still higher reputation, especially in other parts of Europe. Dieze calls him "one of the best lyric poets of Spatn, excellent in the various styles he has employed, but above all in his odes and songs. His original poems are full of genius; his translations of Horace and Anacreon might often pass for original. Few surpass him in harmony of verse; he is the Spanish Anacreon, the poet of the Graces." . Bouterwek, a more discriminating judge than Dieze, who is perhaps rather valuable for research than for taste, has observed, that "the graceful luxuriance of the poetry of Villegas has no parallel in modern literature; and generally speaking, no modern writer has so well succeeded in blending the spirit of ancient poetry with the modern. But constantly to observe that correctness of ideas, which distinguished the classical compositions of antiquity, was by Villegus, as by most Spanish poets, considered too rigid a requisition, and an unnecessary restraint on genius. accordingly sometimes degenerates into conceits and images, the monstrous absurdity of which are characteristic of the author's nation and age. For instance, in one of his odes in which he entreats Lyda to suffer her tresses to flow, he says that 'agitated by Zephyr, her locks would occasion a thousand deaths, and subdue a thousand lives;' and then he adds, in a strain of extravagance, surpassing that of the Marinists, ' that the sun himself would cease to give light, if he did not snatch beams from her radiant countenance to illumine the East.' But faults of this glaring kind are by no means frequent in the poetry of Villegas, and the fascinating grace with which he emulates his models, operates with so powerful a charm, that the occasional occurrence of some little affectations, from which he could scarcely be expected entirely to abstain, is easily overlooked by the reader." !

Hett of Spanish Laterature, p. 396.

has sometimes been confounded with the poet we have just named, is better known in Europe for his prose than his verse; but he is the author of numerous poems both serious and comic or satirical. The latter are by much the more esteemed of the two. He wrote burlesque poetry with success, but it is frequently unintelligible except to natives. In satire he adopted the Juvenalian style. F A few more might perhaps be added, especially Espinel, a poet of the classic school, Borja de Esquillace, once viceroy of Peru, who is called by Bouterwek the last representative of that style in Spain, but more worthy of praise for withstanding the bad taste of his contemporaries than for any vigour of genius, and Christopher de la Mena.* No Portuguese poetry about this time seems to be worthy of notice in European literature, though Manuel Faria y Sousa and a few more might attain a local reputation by sonnets and other amatory verse.

^{*} Geschichte der Spanischen Dichtkunst, p. 210.

[†] Bouterwek, i. 479. † Id. p. 468

16. The original blemish of Spanish writing both in prose and verse had been an excess of effort to say every Defect of thing in an unusual manner, a deviation from the batch beaten paths of sentiment and language in a wider virial curve than good taste permits. Taste is the presiding faculty which regulates, in all works within her jurisdiction, the struggling powers of imagination, emotion, and reason. Each has its claim to mingle in the composition; each may sometimes be allowed in a great measure to predominate; and a phlegmatic application of what men call common sense in sesthetic criticism is almost as repugnant to its principles as a dereliction of all reason for the sake of fantastic absurdity. Taste also must determine, by an intuitive sense of right somewhat analogous to that which regulates the manners of polished life, to what extent the most simple, the most obvious, the most natural, and therefore, in a popular meaning, the most true, is to be modified by a studious introduction of the new, the striking, and the beautiful, so that neither what is insipid and trivial, nor yet what is forced and affected, may displease us. In Spain, as we have observed, the latter was always the prevailing fault. The public taste had been formed on bad models, on the Oriental poetry, metaphorical beyond all perceptible analogy, and on that of the Provençals, false in sentiment, false in conception, false in image and figure. The national character, proud, swelling, and ceremonious, conspired to give an inflated tone; it was also grave and sententious rather than lively or delicate, and therefore fond of a strained and ambitious style. These vices of writing are carried to excess in romances of chivalry, which became ridiculous in the eyes of sensible men, but were certainly very popular; they affect also, though in a different manner, much of the Spanish prose of the sixteenth century, and they belong to a great deal of the poetry of that age, though it must be owned that much appears wholly exempt from them, and written in a very pure and classical spirit. Cervantes strove by example and by precept to maintain good taste; and some of his contemporaries took the same line. But they had to fight against the predominant turn of their nation, which soon gave the victory to one of the worst manners of writing that ever disgraced public favour.

[·] Bouterwek, p. 188.

17. Nothing can be more opposite to what is strictly called a classical style, or one formed upon the best models of Greece and Rome, than pedantry. This was nevertheless the weed that overspread the face of literature in those ages when Greece and Rome were the chief objects of veneration. Without an intimate discernment of their beauty it was easy to copy allusions that were no longer intelligible, to counterfeit trains of thought that belonged to past times, to force reluctant idioms into modern form, as some are said to dress after a lady for whom nature has done more than for themselves. From the revival of letters downwards this had been more or less observable in the learned men of Europe, and after that class grew more extensive, in the current literature of modern languages. Pedantry, which consisted in unnecessary, and perhaps unintelligible, references to ancient learning, was afterwards combined with other artifices to obtain the same end, far-fetched metaphors and extravagant conceits. The French versifiers of the latter end of the sixteenth century were eminent in both, as the works of Ronsard and Du Bartas attest. We might, indeed, take the Creation of Du Bartas more properly than the Euphues of our English Lilly, which though very affected and unpleasing, does hardly such violence to common speech and common sense, for the type of the style which, in the early part of the seventeenth century, became popular in several countries, but especially in Spain, through the misplaced labours of Gongora.

^{*} Cerrantes, in his Vinge del Parnoso, style; but this, Dieze says, is all ironical, praises Gongora, and even imitates his Gesch, der Diehtkunst, p. 250.

18. Luis de Gongora, a man of very considerable talents, and capable of writing well, as he has shown, in different styles of poetry, was unfortunately led by an ambitious desire of popularity to introduce one which should render his name immortal, as it has done in a mode which he did not design. This was his estilo culto, as it was usually called, or highly polished phraseology, wherein every word seems to have been out of its natural place, " In fulfilment of this object," says Bouterwek, "he formed for himself, with the most laborious assiduity, a style as uncommon as affected, and opposed to all the ordinary rules of the Spanish language, either in prose or verse. He particularly endeavoured to introduce into his native tongue the intricate constructions of the Greek and Latin, though such an arrangement of words had never been attempted in Spanish composition. He consequently found it necessary to invent a particular system of punctuation, in order to render the sense of his verses intelligible. Not satisfied with this patchwork kind of phraseology, he affected to attach an extraordinary depth of meaning to each word, and to diffuse an air of superior dignity over his whole style. In Gongora's poetry the most common words received a totally new signification; and in order to impart perfection to his estilo culto, he summoned all his mythological learning to his aid." . "Gongora," says an English writer, " was the founder of a sect in literature. The style called in Castilian cultismo owes its origin to him. This affectation consists in using language so pedantic, metaphors so strained, and constructions so involved, that few readers have the knowledge requisite to understand the words, and still fewer ingenuity to discover the allusion, or patience to unravel the sentences. These authors do not avail themselves of the invention of letters for the purpose of conveying but of concealing their ideas."

19. "The Gongorists formed a strong party in literature, and carried with them the public voice. If we were to believe some writers of the seventeenth century, believe to be greatest poet of Spain. The age of ^{*} Bouterwisk, p 434.

† Dieze, p. 240. Nicolas Antonio, † Lord Holland's Lope de Vega, to the diagrace of his judgment, mainp. 54.

Lains this with the most extravagent

VOL. HI.

Cervantes was over, nor was there vitality enough in the criticism of the reign of Philip IV. to resist the contagion. Two sects soon appeared among these cultoristos; one who retained that name, and like their master, affected a certain precision of style; another, called conceptistos, which went still greater lengths in extravagance, desirous only, it might seem, of expressing absurd ideas in unnatural language. The prevalence of such a disease, for no other analogy can so fitly be used, would seem to have been a bad presage for Spain; but in fact, like other diseases, it did but make the tour of Europe, and rage worse in some countries than in others. It had spent itself in France, when it was at its height in Italy and England. I do not perceive the close connexion of the estilo culto of Gongora with that of Marini, whom both Bouterwek and Lord Holland suppose to have formed his own taste on the Spanish school. It seems rather too severe an imputation on that most ingenious and fertile poet, who, as has already been observed, has no fitter parallel than Ovid. The strained metaphors of the Adone are casily collected by critics, and seem extravagant in juxtaposition, but they recur only at intervals; while those of Gongora are studiously forced into every line, and are besides incomparably more refined and obscure. His style, indeed, seems to be like that of Lycophron, without the excuse of that prophetical mystery which breathes a certain awfulness over the symbolic language of the Cassandra. Nor am I convinced that our own metaphysical poetry in the reigns of James and Charles had much to do with either Marini or Gongora, except as it bore marks of the same vice, a restless ambition to excite wonder by overstepping the boundaries of nature.

have laid claim to the estilo culto as prosetheir property, and one of their writers eulogy on Gongora; and Baillet copies who practices it. Manuel de Faria y him, but the next age unhestatingly Sousa, gives Don Schaatian the credit of reversed the sentence. The Portuguese having been the first who wrote it in

. Bouterwek, p. 488,

SECT. III.

Motherbe - Regmer - Other French Poets.

20. MALHERBE, a very few of whose poems belong to the last century, but the greater part to the first twenty years of the present, gave a polish and a grace to the lyric poetry of France which has rendered his name celebrated in her criticism. The public taste of that country is (or I should rather say, used to be) more intolerant of defects in poetry than rigorous in its demands of excellence. Malherbe, therefore, who substituted a regular and accurate versification, a style pure and generally free from pedantic or colloquial phrases, and a sustained tone of what were reckoned elevated thoughts, for the more unequal strains of the sixteenth century, acquired a reputation which may lead some of his readers. to disappointment. And this is likely to be increased by a very few lines of great beauty which are known by heart. These stand too much alone in his poems. In general, we find in them neither imagery nor sentiment that yield us delight. He is less mythological, less affected, less given to frigid hyperboles than his predecessors, but far too much so for any one accustomed to real poetry. In the panegyrical odes Malherbe displays some felicity and skill; the poet of kings and courtiers, he wisely perhaps wrote, even when he could have written better, what kings and courtiers would understand and reward, Polished and elegant, his lines seldom pass the conventional tone of poetry; and while he is never original he is rarely impressive. Malherbe may stand in relation to Horace as Chiahrera does to Pindar: the analogy is not very close; but he is far from deficient in that calm philosophy which forms the charm of the Roman poet, and we are willing to believe that he sacrificed his time reluctautly to the praises of the great. It may be suspected that he wrote verses for others; a practice not unusual, I believe, among these courtly rhymers; at least his Alcandre seems to be Henry IV., Chrysanthe or Oranthe the Princess of Condé. He seems himself in some passages to have affected gallantry towards Mary of Medicis, which at that time was not reckoned an impertinence.

21. Bouterwek has criticised Malherbe with some justice, but with greater severity. He deems him no poet, Criticisms upon his postry. which in a certain sense is surely true. But we narrow our definition of poetry too much, when we exclude from it the versification of good sense and select diction. This may probably be ascribed to Malherbe; though Bouhours, an acute and somewhat rigid critic, has pointed out some passages which he deems nonsensical. Another writer of the same age, Rapin, whose own taste was not very glowing, observes that there is much prose in Malherbe; and that, well as he merits to be called correct, he is a little too desirous of appearing so, and often becomes frigid, † Boileau has extolled him, perhaps, somewhat too highly, and La Harpe is inclined to the same side; but in the modern state of French criticism, the danger is that the Malherbes will be too much depreciated.

22. The satires of Regnier have been highly praised by Boileau, a competent judge, no doubt, in such matters. Some have preferred Regnier even to himself, and found in this old Juvenal of France a certain stamp of satirical genius which the more polished critic wanted. $ These satires are unlike all other French poetry of the age of Henry IV.; the tone is vehement, somewhat rugged and coarse, and reminds us a little of his contemporaries Hall and Donne, whom, however, he will generally and justly be thought much to excel. Some of his satires are borrowed from Ovid or from the Italians. § They have been called gross and licentious; but this only applies to one, the rest are unexcep-Regnier, who had probably some quarrel with Malberbe, speaks with contempt of his elaborate polish. But the taste of France, and especially of that highly cultivated nobility who formed the court of Louis XIII, and his son, no

Vol. v. p. 238.

⁺ Reflexions sur la Poétique, p. 147. Malberbe a rate le premier qui nous a remis dans le bon chemm, joignant la pureté au grand style, mais comme il commença cette manière, il ne put la porter jusques dans sa perfection; il y a luen de la prose dans ses vers. In another place he says. Malherbe est exact et correct, man il ne hazarde rien, et par l'envie qu'il a d'etre trop asge, il est aouvent froid. p 209.

[†] Bouterwek, p. 246. La Harpe. Biogr, Univ. 5 Niceron, al. 397.

longer endured the rude, though sometimes animated, versification of the older poets. Next to Malherbe in reputation stood Racan and Maynard, both more or less of his school. Of these it was said by their master that Maynard. Racan wanted the diligence of Maynard, as Maynard did the spirit of Racan, and that a good poet might be made out of the two. A foreigner will in general prefer the former, who seems to have possessed more imagination and sensibility, and a keener relish for rural beauty. Maynard's verses, according to Pelisson, have an ease and elegance that few can imitate, which proceeds from his natural and simple construction. † He had more success in epigram than in his sonnets, which Boileau has treated with little respect. Nor does he speak better of Malleville, who chose no other species of verse, but seldom produced a finished piece, though not deficient in spirit and delicacy. Viaud, more frequently known by the name of Theophile, a writer of no great elevation of style, is not destitute of imagination. Such at least is the opinion of Rapin and Bouterwek. ‡

23. The poems of Gombauld were, in general, published before the middle of the century; his epigrams, which are most esteemed, in 1657. These are often lively and neat. But a style of playfulness and gaiety had been introduced by Voiture. French poetry under Ronsard and his school, and even that of Malherbe, had lost the lively tone of Marot, and became serious almost to severity. Voiture, with an apparent case and grace, though without the natural air of the old writers, made it once more amusing. In reality, the style of Voiture is artificial and elaborate, but, like his imitator Prior among us, he has the skill to disguise this from the reader. He must be admitted to have had, in verse as well as prose, a considerable influence over the taste of France. He wrote to please women, and women are grateful when they are pleased. Sarrazin, says his biographer, though less celebrated than Voiture, deserves perhaps to be rated above him; with equal ingenuity, physical lunagination graude et le wils petit. Il a des hardwises houreuses à force de se permettre tout. Réflexions aux la Poetique, p. 209.

^{*} Pelisson, Hist, de l'Academie, t. 200. Buillet, Jugemens der Sarans ophile a lunagination graude et le wils (Poetes) v. 1510. Li Harpe, Cours de Littérati re. Bouterwek, v. 260.

† lidem.

† lidem.

[&]amp; Bonterwek, 252. Ropin mys, Thé-

he is far more natural.* The German historian of French literature has spoken less respectfully of Sarrazin, whose verses are the most insipid rhymed prose, such as he not unhappily calls toilet-poetry. † This is a style which finds little mercy on the right bank of the Rhine; but the French are better judges of the merit of Sarrazin.

SECT. IV.

Rise of Poetry in Germany - Opitz and his followers - Dutck Poets.

24. THE German language had never been more despised by the learned and the noble than at the beginning Low state of Garman of the seventeenth century, which seems to be the lowest point in its native literature. The capacity was not wanting; many wrote Latin verse with success; the collection made by Gruter is abundant in these cultivators of a foreign tongue, several of whom belong to the close of the preceding age. But among these it is said that whoever essayed to write their own language did but fail, and the instances adduced are very few. The upper ranks began about this time to speak French in common society; the burghers, as usual, strove to imitate them; and what was far worse, it became the mode to intermingle French words with German, not singly and sparingly, as has happened in other times and countries, but in a jargon affectedly pie-bald and macaronic. Some hope might have been founded on the literary academies, which, in emulation of Italy, sprung up in this period. The oldest is The Fruitful Society (Die fruchtbringende Gesellschaft), known also as the order of Palms, established at Weimar in 1617.1 Five princes enrolled their names at the beginning. It held forth the laudable purpose of purifying and correcting the mother tongue and of promoting its literature, after the

i

^{*} Biogr. Univ. Baillet, n. 1532.

† Bouterwek, v. 256. Specimens of all these poets will be found in the collection of Auguis, vol. vi.: and I must own, that, with the exceptions of Mal-manner of the Italian academies. But it is not unusual for literary associations to promise much and fail of performance; one man is more easily found to lay down a good plan, than many to co-operate in its execution. Probably this was merely the scheme of some more gifted individual, perhaps Werder, who translated Ariosto and Tasso ; for little good was effected by the institution. Nor did several others which at different times in the seventeenth century arose over Germany deserve more praise. They copied the academies of Italy in their quaint names and titles, in their by-laws, their petty ceremonials and symbolic distinctions, to which, as we always find in these self-elected societies, they attached vast importance, and thought themselves superior to the world by doing nothing for it. "They are gone," exclaims Bouterwek, "and have left no clear vestige of their existence." Such had been the meister-singers before them, and little else in effect were the Academies, in a more genial soil, of their own age. Notwithstanding this, though I am compelled to follow the historian of German literature, it must strike us that these societies seem to manifest a public esteem for something intellectual, which they knew not precisely how to attain; and it is to be observed that several of the best poets in the seventeenth century belonged to them.

25. A very small number of poets, such as Meckerlin and Spee, in the early part of the seventeenth century, though with many faults in point of taste, have been commemorated by the modern historians of literature. But they were wholly eclipsed by one whom Germany regards as the founder of her poetic literature, Martin Opitz, a native of Silesia, honoured with a laurel crown by the emperor in 1628, and raised to offices of distinction and trust in several courts. The national admiration of Opitz scems to have been almost enthusiastic; yet Opitz was far from being the poet of enthusiasm. Had he been such his age might not have understood him. His taste was French and Dutch; two countries of which the poetry was pure and correct, but not imaginative. No great elevation, no energy of genius will be found in this German Heinsius or Malherbe. Opitz displayed, however, another kind of excellence. He wrote the language with a purity of idiom, in which Luther alone, whom he chose as his model, was superior; he gave more strength to the versification, and paid a regard to the collocation of syllables according to their quantity, or length of time required for articulation, which the earlier poets had neglected. He is, therefore, reckoned the inventor of a rich and harmonious rhythm; and he also rendered the Alexandrine verse much more common than before. His sense is good; he writes as one conversant with the ancients, and with mankind; if he is too didactic and learned for a poet in the higher import of the word, if his taste appears fettered by the models he took for imitation, if he even retarded, of which we can hardly be sure, the development of a more genuine nationality in German literature, be must still be allowed, in a favourable sense, to have made an epoch in its history.†

[.] Honterwok, 2, 29,

26. Opitz is reckoned the founder of what was called the massilow, first Silesian school, rather so denominated from him than as determining the birthplace of its poets. They were chiefly lyric, but more in the line of songs and short effusions in trochaic metre than of the regular ode, and sometimes display much spirit and feeling. The German song always seems to bear a resemblance to the English; the identity of metre and rhythm conspires with what is more essential, a certain analogy of sentiment. Many, however, of Opitz's followers, like himself, took Holland for their Par-advantage, a thymen prose in Alexandrings overspread the German literature of the screentreeth and first part of the eighteenth century.

† Boaterwek, x 89-119, has given an elaborate critique of the poetry of Opits. " He is the father, not of German poetry, but of the modern German language of poetry, der neueren deutsches dichtersprache, p. 93. The fame of Opite spread beyond his country, little as his language was fan thur Non pers t Germania, Grotius writes to him, in le st. Opiti doctavane, que te hobet hompletaximum textem, quid lingua Germanica, quid ingenia Germanica va-

. Bouterwek (p. 94) thinks this no rex poeta interprete Germanorum poetarum rege, talul com tabi blandorn dico; da tectro a te primum Germanicapoeu formam datam et hab tum quo cum shis gentibus possit contendere. Ep. 200. Baillet observes, that Opitz passes for the hest of German poets, and the first who gave cules to that poetry, and raised it to the state it had some reached; so that he is inther to be occurred its father than its Laprover Jugemens des Sasam (Postex), n. 1436. But reputation is transitery, though ten ed tions of the poems of Opitz were published with n the seventeenth century, which Bouterwek thanks much for Germany at that time, though it would not be so leant Fost 272. And afterwards, in much in some countries, scarce any one, 1888, thanking him for the present of his except the lovers of old hierature, now translation of the Paslan. Dignus rest asks for these obsolete productions. p. 90. nassus, and translated their songs from Dutch. Fleming was distinguished by a genuine feeling for lyric poetry; he made Opitz his model, but had he not died young, would probably have gone beyond him, being endowed by nature with a more poetical genius. Gryph, or Gryphius, who belonged to the Fruitful Society, and bore in that the surname of the immortal, with faults that strike the reader in every page, is also superior in fancy and warmth to Opitz. But Gryph is better known in German literature by his tragedies. The hymns of the Lutherau church are by no means the lowest form of German poetry. They have been the work of every age since the Reformation; but Dach and Gerhard, who, especially the latter, excelled in these devotional songs, lived about the middle of the seventeenth century. shade of Luther seemed to protect the church from the profanation of bad taste; or, as we should rather say, it was the intense the pathy of the German nation, and the simple majesty of their ecclesiastical music.

27. It has been the misfortune of the Dutch, a great people, a people fertile of men of various ability there and erudition, a people of scholars, of theologians people, and philosophers, of mathematicians, of historians, of painters, and, we may add, of poets, that these last have been the mere violets of the shade, and have peculiarly suffered by the narrow limits within which their language has been spoken or known. The Flemish dialect of the southern Netherlands might have contributed to make up something like a national literature, extensive enough to be respected in Europe, if those provinces, which now affect the name of Belgium, had been equally fertile of talents with their neighbours.

28. The golden age of Dutch literature is this first part of the seventeenth century. Their chief poets are Spiegel, Hooft, Cats, and Vondel. The first, who has been styled the Dutch Ennius, died in 1612; his principal poem, of an ethical kind, is posthumous, but may probably have been written towards the close of the preceding century. "The style is vigorous and concise; it is rich in imagery and powerfully expressed, but is deficient in elegance and perspicuity." Spiegel had rendered much service to his native tongue, and was a member of a literary academy which published a Dutch grammar in 1584. Koornhert and Dousa, with others known to fame, were his colleagues; and be it remembered, to the honour of Holland, that in Germany, or England, or even in France, there was as yet no institution of this kind. But as Holland at the end of the sixteenth century, and for many years afterwards, was pre-eminently the literary country of Europe, it is not surprising that some endeavours were made, though unsuccessfully as to European renown, to cultivate the native language. This language is also more soft, though less sonorous than the German.

Bouterwek, v 218. Eichborn, iv 888.

29. Spiegel was followed by a more celebrated poet, Peter Hooft, who gave sweetness and harmony to Dutch Henft, verse. "The great creative power of poetry," it has been said, " he did not possess; but his language is correct, his style agreeable, and he did much to introduce a better epoch." t His amatory and anacreontic lines have never been excelled in the language; and Hooft is also distinguished both as a dramatist and an historian. He has been called the Tacitus of Holland. But here again his praises must by the generality be taken upon trust. Cats is a poet of a different class; ease, abundance, simplicity, clearness, and purity are the qualities of his style: his imagination is gay, his morality popular and useful. No one was more read than Father Cats, as the people call him; but he is often trifling and monotonous. Cats, though he wrote for the multitude, whose descendants still almost know his poems by heart, was a man whom the republic held in high esteem; twice ambassador in England, he died great pensionary of Holland, in 1651. Vondel, a native of Cologne, but the glory, as he is deemed, of Dutch poetry, was best known as a tragedian. In his tragedies, the lyric part, the choruses which he retained after the ancient model, have been called the sublimest of odes. But some have spoken less highly of Vondel.‡

^{*} Bioge Univ. † Id poets I am indeleted to Eichhorn, vol. iv. † Foreign Quart. Rev. vol. iv. p. 10. part I, and to the Biographic University while.

30. Denmark had no literature in the native language, except a collection of old ballads, full of Scandina-Daniah vian legends, till the present period; and in this it does not appear that she had more than one poet, a Norwegian bishop, named Arrebo. Nothing, I believe, was written in Swedish. Sclavonian, that is, Polish and Russian, poets there were; but we know so little of those languages, that they cannot enter, at least during so distant a period, into the history of European literature.

SECT. V. - ON ENGLISH POETRY.

limitators of Spenier - The Fletchers - Philosophical Poets - Denkam -Donne - Couley - Historical and Narrative Poets - Shakepeare's Somuels -Lyrse Poets - Milton's Lycalas, and other Poems.

31. The English poets of these fifty years are very numerous, and though the greater part are not familiar to the general reader, they form a favourite study of those who cultivate our poetry, and are sought of those who cultivate our poetry, and are sought of them have within half a century been reprinted separately, and many more in the useful and copious collections of Anderson, Chalmers, and other editors. Extracts have also been made by Headley, Ellis, Campbell, and Southey. It will be convenient to arrange them rather according to the schools to which they belonged, than in mere order of chronology.

32. Whatever were the misfortunes of Spenser's life, whatever neglect he might have experienced at the phase hands of a statesman grown old in cares which render a man insensible to song, his spirit might be consoled by the prodigious reputation of the Fairy Queen. He was placed at once by his country above all the great Italian names, and next to Virgil among the ancients; it was a natural consequence that some should imitate what they so deeply reverenced. An ardent admiration for Spenser inspired the genius of two young brothers, Phineas and Giles Fletcher. The first, very soon after the Queen's death, as some allusions to Lord Essex seem to denote, composed, though he did not so soon publish, a poem, entitled The Purple Island. By this strange name he expressed a subject more strange: it is a minute and claborate account of the body and mind of man. Through five cantos the reader is regaled with nothing but allegorical anatomy, in the details of which Phineas seems tolerably skilled, evincing a great deal of ingenuity in diversifying his metaphors, and in presenting the delineation of his imaginary island with as much justice as possible to the allegory without obtruding it on the reader's view. In the sixth canto he rises to the intellectual and moral faculties of the soul, which occupy the rest of the poem. From its nature it is insuperably wearisome; yet his language is often very poetical, his versification harmonious, his invention fertile. But that perpetual monotony of allegorical persons, which sometimes displeases us even in Spenser, is seldom relieved in Fletcher; the understanding revolts at the confused crowd of inconceivable beings in a philosophical poem; and the justness of analogy, which had given us some pleasure in the anatomical cantos, is lost in tedious descriptions of all possible moral qualities, each of them personified, which can never co-exist in the Purple Island of one individual.

and Triumph, though his subject has not all the national unity that might be desired, had a manifest superiority in its choice. Each uses a stanza of his own; Phineas one of seven lines, Giles one of eight. This poem was published in 1610. Each brother alludes to the work of the other, which must be owing to the alterations made by Phineas in his Purple Island, written probably the first, but not published, I believe, till 1683. Giles seems to have more vigour than his elder brother; but less sweetness, less smoothness, and more affectation in his style. This, indeed, is deformed by words neither English nor Latin, but simply barbarous; such as elamping, eblazon, deproxtrate, purpured, glitterand, and many others. They both bear much resemblance to Spenser: Giles sometimes ventures to cope with him, even in celebrated passages, such as the description of the Cave of Despair. And he has had the honour, in turn, of being followed by Milton, especially in the first meeting of our Saviour with Satan in the Paradise Regained. Both of these brothers are deserving of much praise; they were endowed with minds eminently poetical, and not inferior in imagination to any of their contemporaries. But an injudicious taste, and an excessive fondness for a style which the public was rapidly abandoning, that of allegorical personification, prevented their powers from being effectively displayed.

34. Notwithstanding the popularity of Spenser, and the general pride in his name, that allegorical and imaginative school of poetry, of which he was the great- cal poetry. est ornament, did not by any means exclude a very different kind. The English, or such as by their education gave the tone in literature, had become, in the latter years of the queen, and still more under her successor, a deeply thinking, a learned, a philosophical people. A sententious reasoning, grave, subtle and condensed, or the novel and remote analogies of wit, gained praise from many whom the creations of an excursive fancy could not attract. Hence much of the poetry of James's reign is distinguished from that of Elizabeth, except perhaps her last years, by partaking of the general character of the age; deficient in simplicity, grace, and feeling, often obscure and pedantic, but impressing us with a respect for the man, where we do not recognise the poet. From this condition of public taste arose two schools of poetry, different in character, if not unequal in merit, but both appealing to the reasoning more than to the imaginative faculty as their judge.

35. The first of these may own as its founder Sir John Davies, whose poem on the Immortality of the Soul, published in 1600, has had its due honour in our last volume. Davies is eminent for perspicuity; but this cannot be said for another philosophical poet, Sir Fulk Greville, afterwards Lord Brooke, the bosom friend of Sir Philip Sidney, and once the patron of Jordano Bruno. The titles of Lord Brooke's poems, A Treatise of Human Learning, A Treatise of Monarchy, A Treatise of Religion, An Inquisition upon Fame and Honour, lead us to anticipate more of sense than fancy. In this we are not deceived; his mind was pregnant with deep reflection upon multifarious learning, but he struggles to give utterance to thoughts which he had not fully endowed with words, and amidst the shackles of rhyme and metre which he had not learned to manage. Hence of all our poets he may be reckoned the most obscure; in aiming at condensation, he becomes elliptical beyond the bounds of the language, and his rhymes, being forced for the sake of sound, leave all meaning behind. Lord Brooke's poetry is chiefly worth notice as an indication of that thinking spirit upon political science, which was to produce the riper speculations of Hobbes, and Harrington, and Locke.

[.] Christ's Vict. and Triumph, ii. 23,

36. This argumentative school of verse was so much in unison with the character of that generation, that Daniel, a poet of a very different temper, adopted it in his panegyric addressed to James soon after his accession, and in some other poems. It had an influence upon others who trod generally in a different track, as is especially perceived in Giles Fletcher. The Cooper's Hill of Sir John Penham, published in 1643, belongs in a considerable degree to this reasoning class of poems. It is also descriptive, but the description is made to slide into philosophy. The plan is original, as far as our poetry is concerned, and I do not recollect any exception in other languages. Placing himself upon an eminence not distant from Windsor, he takes a survey of the scene; he finds the tower of St. Paul's on his farthest horizon, the Castle much nearer, and the Thames at his feet. These, with the ruins of an abbey, supply in turn materials for a reflecting rather than imaginative mind, and, with a stag-hunt which he has very well described, fill up the canvas of a poem of no great length, but once of no tritling reputation.

37. The epithet, majestic Denham, conferred by Pope, conveys rather too much; but Cooper's Hill is no ordinary poem. It is nearly the first instance of vigorous and rhythmical couplets, for Denham is incomparably less feeble than Browne, and less prosaic than Beaumont. Close in thought, and nervous in language like Davies, he is less hard and less monotonous; his cadences are animated and various, perhaps a little beyond the regularity that metre demands; they have been the guide to the finer ear of Dryden. Those who caunot endure the philosophic poetry, must ever be dissatisfied with Cooper's Hill; no personification, no ardeut words, few metaphors beyond the common use of speech, nothing that warms, or melts, or fascinates the heart. It is rare to find lines of eminent beauty in Denham; and equally so to be struck by any one as feeble or low. His language is always well chosen and perspicuous, free from those strange turns of expression, frequent in our older poets, where the reader is apt to suspect some error of the press, so irreconcilable do they seem with grammar or meaning. The expletive do, which the best of his predecessors use freely, seldom occurs in Denham; and he has in other respects brushed away the rust of languid and ineffective redundancies which have obstructed the popularity of men with more native genius than himself.

38. Another class of poets in the reigns of James and his son were those whom Johnson has called the metaphysical; a name rather more applicable, in the ordinated nary use of the word, to Davies and Brooke. These were such as laboured after conceits, or novel turns of thought, usually false, and resting upon some equivocation of language, or exceedingly remote analogy. This style Johnson supposes to have been derived from Marini. But Donne, its founder, as Johnson imagines, in England, wrote before Marini. It is, in fact, as we have lately observed, the style which, though Marini has earned the discreditable reputation of perverting the taste of his country by it, had been gaining ground through the latter half of the sixteenth cen-

• The comparison by Denham be-tween the Thicker and his own poetry was once celebrated: -

O cook! I flow take those, and make thy stream My be gut example, as it is my thene. Though deep jet escare, though gentle, yet not Strong without rage, without o erflowing full.

Johnson, while he highly extols there understood simply on one side of the comparison, and metaphorically on the other; and if there he any language which does not express intellectual operations by material images, into that language they cannot be translated," Perhaps these metaphors are to materally applied to style, that no language of a cultivated people is without them. But the ground of objection is, in fact, that the lines contain nothing but wit, and that wit which turns on a play of words, lines, truly observes, that "most of the They are rather increases in this respect, words thus artfully opposed, are to be and remarkably harmorious, which is probably the secret of their popularity; but, as poetry, they deserve no great Plaise.

tury. It was, in a more comprehensive view, one modification of that vitiated taste which sacrificed all ease and naturalness of writing and speaking for the sake of display. The mythological erudition and Grecisms of Ronsard's school, the Euphuism of that of Lilly, the "estilo culto" of Gongora, even the pedantic quotations of Burton and many similar writers, both in England and on the Continent, sprang like the concetti of the Italians, and of their English imitators, from the same source, a dread of being overlooked if they paced on like their neighbours. And when a few writers had set the example of successful faults, a bad style, where no sound principles of criticism had been established, readily gaining ground, it became necessary that those who had not vigour enough to rise above the fashion, should seek to fall in with it. Nothing is more injurious to the cultivation of verse, than the trick of desiring, for praise or profit, to attract those by poetry whom nature has left destitute of every quality which genuine poetry can attract. The best, and perhaps the only secure basis for public taste, for an resthetic appreciation of beauty, in a court, a college, a city, is so general a diffusion of classical knowledge, as by rendering the finest models familiar, and by giving them a sort of authority, will discountenance and check at the outset the vicious novelties which always exert some influence over uneducated minds. But this was not yet the case in England. Milton was perhaps the first writer who eminently possessed a genuine discernment and feeling of antiquity; though it may be perceived in Spenser, and also in a very few who wrote in prose.

39. Donne is generally esteemed the earliest, as Cowley was afterwards the most conspicuous, model of this manner. Many instances of it, however, occur in the lighter poetry of the queen's reign. Donne is the most inharmonious of our versiliers, if he can be said to have deserved such a name by lines too rugged to seem metre. Of his earlier poems many are very licentious; the later are chiefly devout. Few are good for much; the conceits have not even the merit of being intelligible; it would perhaps be difficult to select three passages that we should care to read again.

40. The second of these poets was Crashaw, a man of some imagination and great piety, but whose softness of heart, united with feeble judgment, led him to admire and imitate whatever was most extravagant in the mystic writings of Saint Teresa. He was more than Donne a follower of Marini, one of whose poems, The Massacre of the Innocents, he translated with success. It is difficult, in general, to find any thing in Crashaw that bad taste has not deformed. His poems were first published in 1646.

41. In the next year, 1647, Cowley's Mistress appeared; the most celebrated performance of the miscalled metaphysical poets. It is a series of short amatory poems, in the Italian style of the age, full of analogies that have no semblance of truth, except from the double sense of words, and thoughts that unite the coldness of subtilty with the hyperbolical extravagance of counterfeited passion. few anacreontic poems, and some other light pieces of Cowley, have a spirit and raciness very unlike these frigid conceits; and in the ode on the death of his friend Mr. Harvey, he gave some proofs of real sensibility and poetic grace. The Pindaric odes of Cowley were not published within this period. But it is not worth while to defer mention of them. They contain, like all his poetry, from time to time, very beautiful lines, but the faults are still of the same kind; his sensibility and good sense, nor has any poet more, are choked by false taste; and it would be difficult to fix on any one poem in which the beauties are more frequent than the blemishes. Johnson has selected the elegy on Crashaw as the finest of Cowley's works. It begins with a very beautiful couplet, but I confess that little else seems, to my taste, of much value. The Complaint, probably better known than any other poem, appears to me the best in itself. His disappointed hopes give a not unpleasing melancholy to several passages. But his Latin ode in a similar strain is much more perfect. Cowley, perhaps, upon the whole, has had a reputation more above his deserts than any English poet; yet it is very easy to perceive that some who wrote better than he did not possess so fine a genius. Johnson has written the life of Cowley with peculiar care; and as his summary of the poet's character is more favourable than my own, it may VOL. III.

be caudid to insert it in this place, as at least very discriminating, elaborate, and well expressed.

42. "It may be affirmed, without any encomiastic fervour, that he brought to his poetic labours a mind replete with learning, and that his pages are embellished with all the ornaments which books could supply; that he was the first who imparted to English numbers the enthusiasm of the greater ode, and the gaiety of the less*; that he was equally qualified for sprightly sallies and for lofty flights; that he was among those who freed translation from servility, and instead of following his author at a distance, walked by his side; and that, if he left versitication yet improvable, he left likewise from time to time such specimens of excellence as enabled succeeding poets to improve it."

43. The poets of historical or fabulous narrative belong to another class. Of these the earliest is Daniel, whose minor poems fall partly within the sixteenth century. Datack His History of the Civil Wars between York and Lancaster, a poem in eight books, was published in 1004. Faithfully adhering to truth, which he does not suffer so much as an ornamental episode to interrupt, and equally studious to avoid the bolder figures of poetry, it is not surprising that Daniel should be little read. It is, indeed, certain that much Italian and Spanish poetry, even by those whose name has once stood rather high, depends chiefly upon merits which be abundantly possesses, a smoothness of rhythm, and a lucid narration in simple language. But that which from the natural delight in sweet sound is enough to content the ear in the southern tongues, will always seem bald and tame in our less harmonious verse. It is the chief praise of Daniel, and must have contributed to what popularity he enjoyed in his own age, that his English is eminently pure, free from affectation of archaism and from pedantic innovation, with very little that is now obsolete. Both in prose and in poetry, he is, as to language, among the best writers of his time, and wanted but a greater confidence in his own power, or, to speak

Was not Milton's Ode on the Na- Cowler superior in gracty to Sir John tivity written as early as any of Cow- Suckling?

ley's? And would Johnson have thought less indulgently, a greater share of it, to sustain his correct taste, calm sense, and moral feeling.

44. Next to Daniel in time, and much above him in reach of mind, we place Michael Drayton, whose Barons' Drayton, Wars have been mentioned under the preceding Possilion. period, but whose more famous work was published partly in 1613, and partly in 1622. Drayton's Polyolbion is a poem of about 30,000 lines in length, written in Alexandrine couplets, a measure, from its monotony, and perhaps from its frequency in doggrel ballads, not at all pleasing to the car. It contains a topographical description of England, illustrated with a prodigality of historical and legendary erudition. Such a poem is essentially designed to instruct, and speaks to the understanding more than to the fancy. The powers displayed in it are, however, of a high cast. It has generally been a difficulty with poets to deal with a necessary enumeration of proper names. The catalogue of ships is not the most delightful part of the Iliad, and Ariosto never encounters such a roll of persons or places without sinking into the tamest insigndity. Virgil is splendidly beautiful upon similar occasions; but his decorative elegance could not be preserved, nor would continue to please, in a poem that kept up through a great length the effort to furnish instruction. of Drayton is sustained, with extraordinary ability, on an equable line, from which he seldom much deviates, neither brilliant nor prosaic; few or no passages could be marked as impressive, but few are languid or mean. The language is clear, strong, various, and sufficiently figurative; the stories and fictions interspersed, as well as the general spirit and liveliness, relieve the heaviness incident to topographical description. There is probably no poem of this kind in any other language, comparable together in extent and excellence to the Polyolbion; nor can any one read a portion of it without admiration for its learned and highly gifted author. Yet perhaps no English poem, known as well by name, is so little known beyond its name; for while its immense length deters the common reader, it affords, as has just been hinted, no great harvest for selection, and would be judged very unfairly by partial extracts. It must be owned also that geography and antiquities may, in modern times, be taught better in prose than in verse; yet whoever consults the Polyolbiou for such objects, will probably be repaid by petty knowledge which he may not have found any where else.

45. Among these historical poets I should incline to class William Browne, author of a poem with the quaint Beowne's Bartanesa's Pastorale title of Britannia's Pastorals, though his story, one of little interest, seems to have been invented by himself. Browne, indeed, is of no distinct school among the writers of that age; he seems to recognise Speuser as his master, but his own manner is more to be traced among later than earlier poets. He was a native of Devonshire; and his principal poem, above mentioned, relating partly to the local scenery of that county, was printed in 1613. Browne is truly a poet, full of imagination, grace, and sweetness, though not very nervous or rapid. I know not why Headley, favourable enough for the most part to this generation of the sons of song, has spoken of Browne with unfair contempt. Justice, however, has been done to him by later critics. But I have not observed that they take notice of what is remarkable in the history of our poetical literature, that Browne is an early model of ease and variety in the regular couplet. Many passages in his unequal poem are hardly excelled, in this respect, by the fables of Dryden. It is manifest that Milton was well acquainted with the writings of Browne.

46. The commendation of improving the rhythm of the couplet is due also to Sir John Beaumont, author of a short poem on the battle of Bosworth Field. It was not written, however, so early as the Britannia's Pastorals of Browne. In other respects it has no pretensions to a high rank. But it may be added that a poem of Drummond on the visit of James I. to Scotland in 1617 is perfectly harmonious; and what is very remarkable in that hereafter." "He poetry." Mr. Campbell, a far less includent judge of the pider bards, observes, "is not without the auty, but it is the beauty of niere landscape and allegory, without the minuters and passions that constitute human interest." Specimens of English Poetry, vv. 323.

^{• &}quot;Browne," Mr Southey says, " is a poet who produced no slight effect upon his contamporaries. George Wither in his hippest press has bearned the manner of his friend, and Minton may be traced to him. And in our days his pecul arrives have been caught, and his becauses im taxed, by non-who will themedies find admirers and imilators.

age, he concludes the verse at every couplet with the regularity of Pope.

47. Far unlike the poem of Browne was Gondibert, published by Sir William Davenant in 1650. It may parental's probably have been reckoned by himself an epic; trondisort. but in that age the practice of Spain and Italy had effaced the distinction between the regular epic and the heroic romance. Gondibert belongs rather to the latter class by the entire want of truth in the story, though the scene is laid at the court of the Lombard kings, by the deficiency of unity in the action, by the intricacy of the events, and by the resources of the fable, which are sometimes too much in the style of comic fiction. It is so imperfect, only two books and part of the third being completed, that we can hardly judge of the termination it was to receive. Each book, however, after the manner of Spenser, is divided into several cantos. It contains about 6000 lines. The metre is the four-lined stanza of alternate rhymes; one capable of great vigour, but not perhaps well adapted to poetry of imagination or of passion. These, however, Davenant exhibits but sparingly in Gondibert; they are replaced by a philosophical spirit, in the tone of Sir John Davies, who had adopted the same metre, and, as some have thought, nourished by the author's friendly intercourse with Hobbes. Gondibert is written in a clear, nervous English style; its condensation produces some obscurity, but pedantry, at least that of language, will rarely be found in it, and Davenant is less infected by the love of conceit and of extravagance than his contemporaries, though I would not assert that he is wholly exempt from the former blemish. But the chief praise of Gondibert is due to masculine verse in a good metrical cadence; for the sake of which we may forgive the absence of interest in the story, and even of those glowing words and breathing thoughts which are the soul of genuine poetry. Goudsbert is very little read; yet it is better worth reading than the Purple Island, though it may have less of that which distinguishes a poet from another man.

48. The sonnets of Shakspeare, for we now come to the minor, that is, the shorter and more lyric, poetry of some the age, were published in 1600, in a mann mysterious as their subject and contents. They are dedicated by an editor (Thomas Thorpe, a bookseller) "to Mr. W. H. the only begetter of these sonnets." * No one, as far as I remember, has ever doubted their genuineness; no one can doubt that they express not only real but intense emotions of the heart; but when they were written, who was the W. H. quaintly called their begetter, by which we can only understand the cause of their being written, and to what persons or circumstances they allude, has of late years been the subject of much curiosity. These sonnets were long overlooked; Steevens spoke of them with the utmost scorn, as productions which no one could read; but a very different suffrage is generally given by the lovers of poetry, and perhaps there is now a tendency, especially among young men of poetical tempers, to exaggerate the beauties of these remarkable productions. They rise, indeed, in estimation as we attentively read and reflect upon them; for I do not think that at first they give us much pleasure. No one ever entered more fully than Shakspeare into the character of this species of poetry, which admits of no expletive imagery, no merely ornamental line. But though each sonnet has generally its proper unity, the sense, I do not mean the grammatical construction, will sometimes be found to spread from one to another, independently of that repetition of the leading idea, like variations of an air, which a series of them frequently exhibits, and on account of which they have latterly been reckoned by some rather an integral poem than a collection of sonnets. But this is not uncommon among the Italians, and belongs, in fact, to those of Petrarch himself. They may easily be resolved into several series according to their subjects†; but when read attentively, we find them relate to one

 The precise words of the dedication are the following: -

To the only Begetter Of these ensuing Sonnets Mr W. H. All Happiness And that eternity promised By our over living poet Wisheth the Well-wishing Advanturer In setting forth T. T.

nets, never before imprinted, 4to. 1609. G. Eld for T. T.

† This has been done in a late publication, "Shakspeare's Auto-biographical Poems, by George Armitage Brown" (1838). It might have occurred to any attentive reader, but I do not know that the analysis was ever so completely made before, though almost every one has The title-page runs. Shakspeare's Son-dresed in the former and latter part of definite, though obscure, period of the poet's life; in which an attachment to some female, which seems to have touched neither his heart nor his fancy very sensibly, was overpowered, without entirely ceasing, by one to a friend; and this last is of such an enthusiastic character, and so extravagant in the phrases that the author uses, as to have thrown an unaccountable mystery over the whole work. It is true that in the poetry as well as in the fictions of early ages, we find a more ardent tone of affection in the language of friendship than has since been usual; and yet no instance has been adduced of such rapturous devotedness, such an idolatry of admiring love, as one of the greatest beings whom nature ever produced in the human form pours forth to some unknown youth in the majority of these sonnets.

49. The notion that a woman was their general object is totally untenable, and it is strange that Coleridge should have entertained it. Those that were evidently addressed to a woman, the person above hinted, are by much the smaller part of the whole, but twenty-eight out of one hundred and fifty-four. And this mysterious Mr. W. II. must be presumed to be the idolised friend of Shakspeare. But who could be be? No one recorded as such in literary history or anecdote answers the description. But if we seize a clue which innumerable passages give us, and suppose that they allude to a youth of high rank as well as personal beauty and accomplishment, in whose favour and intimacy, according to the base prejudices of the world, a player and a poet, though he were the author of Macbeth, might be thought honoured, something of the strangeness, as it appears to us, of Shakspeare's humiliation in addressing him as a being before whose feet he crouched, whose frown he feared, whose injuries, and those of the most

the sammers. Mr. Brown's work did not fall rate my hands tel mearly the time that these sheets passed through the press, which I mention or account of some coincidences of opinion, especially as to Shakspeare's knowledge of Latin could only have some from a man deeply in love, and in love with a woman, and there is one sounce of ch from its meon-granty I take to be a purposed blind,"

Table Talk, vol. ii p. 180. This sonnet the ed for supposes to be the twentieth, which certainly could not have been addressed to a woman, but the proof is equally strong as to most of the rest. Coleredge's opinion is absolutely unten-" "It seems to me that the souncts able, nor do I conceive that any one else is likely to maint un it after reading the somets of Shakspeare, but to those who have not done this, the authority may justly seem imposing.

insulting kind, the seduction of the mistress to whom we have alluded, he felt and bewniled without resenting; something, I say, of the strangeness of this humiliation, and at best it is but little, may be lightened and in a certain sense rendered intelligible. And it has been ingeniously conjectured within a few years by inquirers independent of each other, that William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, born in 1580, and afterwards a man of noble and gallant character, though always of a licentious life, was shadowed under the initials of Mr. W. H. This hypothesis is not strictly proved, but sufficiently so, in my opinion, to demand our assent.

50. Notwithstanding the frequent beauties of these sonnets, the pleasure of their perusal is greatly diminished by these circumstances; and it is impossible not to wish that Shakspeare had never written them. There is a weakness and folly in all excessive and misplaced affection, which is not redeemed by the touches of nobler sentiments that abound in this long series of sonnets. But there are also faults of a merely critical nature. The obscurity is often such as only conjecture can penetrate; the strain of tenderness and adoration would be too monotonous, were it less unpleasing; and

. In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1892, p. 217, et post, it will be seen that this occurred both to Mr Bonden and Mr Heywood Bright And it does not appear that Mr Brown, nuthor of the Drake has fixed on Lord Southampton as the object of these sonnets, and reed probably by the tradition of his friendahip with Stakspears, and by the latter's having dedicated to him his Venus and Adonis, as well as by what is remarkable on the face of the series of sonners, that Shakspeare looked up to his friend "with reverence and homage " But, unfortunately, this was only the reverence and homage of an inferior to one of high runk, and not such as the virtues of Southampton might have challenged Proofs of the low moral character of " Mr W II" are continual. It was also impossible that Lord Southampton could be called "beauteous and lovely youth," or "sweet boy " Mrs. Jameson, in her " Loves of the Poets," has adopted the same hypothesis, but is forced in consequence to suppose some of the earlier sonnets to be addressed to a woman.

Pembroke succeeded to his father in 1601 I anchine to think that the sonnets work above quoted, had any knowledge were written about that time, some pro-of their priority. bably earlier, some later. That they were the same as Merry, in 1598, has mentioned among the compositions of Shakepeare, " his sugred sonnets among his private friends, I do not believe, both on account of the date, and from the peculiarly personal allusions they cuptain,

Much has been written lately on the subject of Shakspeare's sonnets, and a untural reluctance to admit soy fadings in such a man has led some to fancy that his ni stress was no other than his wife, Ann Hathaway, and others to conjecture that he lent his pen to the amours of a friend. But I have seen no ground to after my own view of the case, except that possibly some other annels may have been meant by Mercs. - 1842] so many frigid conceits are scattered around, that we might almost fancy the poet to have written without genuine emotion, did not such a host of other passages attest the contrary.

51. The sonnets of Drummond of Hawthornden, the most celebrated in that class of poets, have obtained, probably, as much praise as they deserve. But they bond ond are polished and elegant, free from conceit and bad taste, in pure unblemished English; some are pathetic or tender in sentiment, and if they do not show much originality. at least would have acquired a fair place among the Italians of the sixteenth century. Those of Daniel, of Drayton, and of Sir William Alexander, afterwards Earl of Stirling, are perhaps hardly inferior. Some may doubt, however, whether the last poet should be placed on such a level. † But the difficulty of finding the necessary rhymes in our language has caused most who have attempted the sonnet to swerve from laws which cannot be transgressed, at least to the degree they have often dared, without losing the unity for which that complex mechanism was contrived. Certainly three quatrains of alternate rhymes, succeeded by a couplet, which Drummond, like many other English poets, has sometimes given us, is the very worst form of the sonnet, even if, in deference to a scanty number of Italian precedents, we allow it to pass as a sonnet at all. ! We possess indeed noble poetry in the

"I concur in this with Mr Campbell, iv. 344 Mr. Southey thinks Drammond "I has deserved the high reputation by has obtained," which occurs to say the same thing, but is in fact different. He observes that Drammond "inspectly berrows and iometries translates from the 11st an and Spanish poets." Southey's British Poets, p. 798. The furious invectise of Gilbord against Drammond for having written private memoranda of his conversations with Ben Jonson, which he did not publish, and which, for night we know, were perfectly furtifol, is absured. Any one clos would have been thankful for so much literary ancedote.

† Lord briefing is rather monotonous, an immetteers usually are, and be will dresses for instruct by the appellation, "Fair tygress," (amphyll observer that there is elegance of expression in a few of Stirling's shorter pieces. Vol. iv. p. 200. The longest poem of Stirling is entirled Domesday, in twelve books, or, as he call them, hours. It is written in the Italian octave stansa, and has somewhat of the condensed style of the philosophical school, which he seems to have initiated, but his combers are harsh

† The legitimate somest consists of two quarrants and two tercets; as much axill, to say the least, is required for the management of the latter in of the former. The rhymes of the last air lines are capable of many arrangements; but by fir the worst, and also the heast common in Italy, is that we man y adopt, the fifth and airst rhyming together, frequently after a full pause, so that the accent ends with the point of men gram. The best form, as the Italians hold, as the rhyming together of the three univers, and the three even lines, but as our land.

form of sonnet; yet with us it seems more fitted for grave than amatory composition; in the latter we miss the facility and grace of our untive English measures, the song, the madrigal, or the ballad.

52. Carew is the most celebrated among the lighter poets, though no collection has hitherto embraced his entire writings. Headley has said, and Ellis echoes the praise, that "Carew has the ease without the pedantry of Waller, and perhaps less conceit. Waller is too exclusively considered as the first man who brought versification to any thing like its present standard. Carew's pretensions to the same merit are seldom sufficiently either considered or allowed." Yet in point of versification, others of the same age seem to have surpassed Carew, whose lines are often very harmonious, but not so artfully constructed or so uniformly pleasing as those of Waller. He is remarkably unequal; the best of his little poems (none of more than thirty lines are good) excel all of his time; but, after a few lines of great beauty, we often come to some ill expressed, or obscure, or weak, or inharmonious passage. Few will hesitate to acknowledge that he has more fancy and more tenderness than Waller, but less choice, less judgment and knowledge where to stop, less of the equability which never offends, less attention to the unity and thread of his little pieces. I should hesitate to give him, on the whole, the preference as a poet, taking collectively the attributes of that character; for we must not, in such a comparison, overlook a good deal of very inferior merit which may be found in the short volume of Carew's poems. The best have great beauty, but he has had, in late criticism, his full share of applause. Two of his guage is less rich in consumit terminatiozs, there can be no objection to what has abundant precedents even in theirs, the rhy am g of the first and fourth, second and fifth, third and scath, lines. Thus, with a break in the sense at the third line, will make a real sonner, which Shakspears, Milton, Bowles, and Wordsworth have often fixed to give us, even where they have given us something good instead.

The common form of the Italian son-tirely contenue. Quadrate is called risso chases, where the poesis, in 25.—1842.)

rhymes of the two quatrams are 1, 4, 5, 8

— 2, 3, 6, 7, but the alternate rhyme connetumes, though her regularly, occurs. The terrests are either in runs incommunity is found in these, even among the early poets. Quadrio prefers the order a, b, a, b, a, b, where there are only two thyming terminations; but does not object to a, b, c, a, b, c; or even a, b, c, b, a, c. The couplet termination he entirely con lemms. Quadrio, Storia d'ogni poessa, in. 25.—1842.)

most pleasing little poems appear also among those of Herrick; and as Carew's were, I believe, published posthumously, I am rather inclined to prefer the claim of the other poet, independently of some internal evidence as to one of them. In all ages, these very short compositions circulate for a time in polished society, while mistakes as to the real author are natural.

53. The minor poetry of Ben Jonson is extremely beautiful. This is partly mixed with his masques and interludes, poetical and musical rather than dramatic pieces, and intended to gratify the imagination by the charms of song, as well as by the varied scenes that were brought before the eye; partly in very short effusions of a single sentiment, among which two epitaphs are known by heart. Jonson possessed an admirable taste and feeling in poetry, which his dramas, except the Sad Shepherd, do not entirely lead us to value highly enough; and when we consider how many other intellectual excellencies distinguished him, wit, observation, judgment, memory, learning, we must acknowledge that the inscription on his tomb, O rare Ben Jonson I is not more pithy than it is true.

54. George Wither, by siding with the less poetical, though more prosperous party in the civil war, and by a profusion of temporary writings to serve the ends of faction and folly, has left a name which we were accustomed to despise, till Ellis did justice to "that playful fancy, pure taste, and artless delicacy of sentiment which distinguish the poetry of his early youth." His best poems were pub-

 One of these poems begins —
 Amongst the myrthe as I was d, Love if I'm) sight that literally d

Herrick wants four good lines which are in Carew; and as they are rather more likely to have been interpolated than left out, this leads to a sort of inference that he was the original, there are also some other petty improvements. The second poem is that beginning—

Ask me may I send you here. This firstling of the infant year,

Herrick gives the second line strangely, This sweet infants of the year which is little clse than non-sense; and all the other variations are for the worse. I must leave it in doubt, whether he borrowed, and divigared a little, or was himself improved upon. I must own that he has a trick of spoiling what he takes. Suckling has an incomparable image, on a lidy dancing

Her feet here all the petherat, Lake and must at le choud out, As if they fearld the light

Herrick has it thus -

Her pritty feet, like mails, did cerep

A most singular parallel for an elegant dancer

lished in 1622 with the title "Mistress of Philarete." Some of them are highly beautiful, and bespeak a mind above the grovelling puritanism into which he afterwards fell. I think there is hardly any thing in our lyric poetry of this period equal to Wither's lines on his Muse, published by Ellis."

55. The poetry of Habington is that of a pure and amiable mind, turned to versification by the custom of ffabington. the age, during a real passion for a lady of birth and virtue, the Castara whom he afterwards married; but it displays no great original power, nor is it by any means exempt from the ordinary blemishes of hyperbolical compli-Earl of Pen. ment and far-fetched imagery. The poems of William Earl of Pembroke, long known by the character drawn for him by Clarendon, and now as the object of Shakspeare's doting friendship, were ushered into the world after his death, with a letter of extravagant flattery addressed by Donne to Christiana Countess of Devonshire.† But there is little reliance to be placed on the freedom from interpolation of these posthumous editions. Among these poems attributed to Lord Pembroke, we find one of the best known of Carew's 1, and even the famous lines addressed to the Soul, which some have given to Silvester. The poems, in general, are of little merit; some are grossly indecent; nor would they be mentioned here except for the interest recently attached to the author's name. But they throw no light whatever on the sonnets of Shakspeare.

56. Sir John Suckling is acknowledged to have left far behind him all former writers of song in gaiety and ease; it is not equally clear that he has ever since been surpassed. His poetry aims at no higher praise; he shows no sentiment or imagination, either because he had them not, or because he did not require either in the style he chose. Perhaps the Italians may have poetry in that style equal to Suckling's; I do not know that they have, nor do be one of earlier date. The Countess of Devoustare is not called dowager, her husband died in 1643.

^{*} Ellis's Specimens of Early English Ports, in: 96

[†] The only edition that I have seen, or that I find mentioned of Lord Pensbroke's poems, is in 1650. But as Donne died in 1631, I conceive that there must Ask me no more whither no strag. The golden stoms of the day

I believe that there is any in French; that there is none in Latin I am convinced.* Lovelace is chiefly known by a single song; his other poetry is much inferior; and indeed it may be generally remarked that the flowers of our early verse, both in the Elizabethan and the subsequent age have been well culled by good taste and a friendly spirit of selection. We must not judge of them, or shall judge of them very favourably, by the extracts of Headley or Ellis.

57. The most amorous, and among the best of our amorous poets was Robert Herrick, a clergyman ejected from his living in Devonshire by the long parliament, whose "Hesperides, or Poems Human and Divine," were published in 1648. Herrick's divine poems are, of course, such as might be presumed by their title and by his calling; of his human, which are poetically much superior, and probably written in early life, the greater portion is light and voluptuous, while some border on the licentious and indecent. A selection was published in 1815, by which, as commonly happens, the poetical fame of Herrick does not suffer; a number of dull epigrams are omitted, and the editor has a mainfest preference for what must be owned to be the most elegant and attractive part of his author's rhymes, He has much of the lively grace that distinguishes Anacreon and Catullus, and approaches also, with a less cloying monotony, to the Basia of Joannes Secundus, Herrick has as much variety as the poetry of kisses can well have; but his love is in a very slight degree that of sentiment, or even any intense passion; his mistresses have little to recommend them, even in his own eyes, save their beauties, and none of these are omitted in his catalogues. Yet he is abundant in the resources of verse; without the exuberant gaiety of Suckling, or perhaps the delicacy of Carew, he is sportive, fauciful, and generally of polished language. The faults of his age are sometimes apparent; though he is not often obscure, he runs, more perhaps for the sake of variety than any other cuase, into occasional pedantry; he has his con-

^{*} Sorkhog's Epithalamium, though all the world, and is a matchless piece of not written for those " Qui Mosas co-liveliness and facility, little severiores," has been read by almost

ceits and false thoughts, but these are more than redeemed by the numerous very little poems (for those of Herrick are frequently not longer than epigrams), which may be praised without much more qualification than belongs to such poetry.

58. John Milton was born in 1609. Few are ignorant of his life, in recovering and recording every circumstance of which no diligence has been spared, nor has it often been unsuccessful. Of his Latin poetry some was written at the age of seventeen; in English we have nothing, I believe, the date of which is known to be earlier than the sonnet on entering his twenty-third year. In 1634, he wrote Comus, which was published in 1637. Lycidas was written in the latter year, and most of his shorter pieces soon afterwards, except the sonnets, some of which do not come within the first half of the century.

59. Comus was sufficient to convince any one of taste and feeling that a great poet had arisen in England, and one partly formed in a different school from his contemporaries. Many of them had produced highly beautiful and imaginative passages; but none had evinced so classical a judgment, none had aspired to so regular a perfection. Jonson had learned much from the ancients; but there was a grace in their hest models which he did not quite attain. Neither his Sad Shepherd nor the Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher have the elegance or dignity of Comus. A noble virgin and her young brothers, by whom this masque was originally represented, required an elevation, a purity, a sort of severity of sentiment which no one in that age could have given but Milton. He avoided, and nothing loth, the more festive notes which dramatic poetry was wont to mingle with its serious strain. But for this he compensated by the brightest bues of fancy and the sweetest melody of song. In Comus we find nothing prosaic or feeble, no false taste in the incidents, and not much in the language, nothing over which we should desire to pass on a second perusal. The want of what we may call personality, none of the characters having names, except Comus himself, who is a very indefinite being, and the absence of all positive attributes of time and place, enhance the ideality of the fiction by a certain indistinctness not unpleasing to the imagination.

60. It has been said, I think very fairly, that Lycidas is a good test of a real feeling for what is peculiarly Lyvides called poetry. Many, or perhaps we might say, most readers, do not taste its excellence; nor does it follow that they may not greatly admire Pope and Dryden, or even Virgil and Homer. It is, however, somewhat remarkable that Johnson, who has committed his critical reputation by the most contemptuous depreciation of this poem, had in an earlier part of his life selected the tenth ecloque of Virgil for peculiar praise •; the tenth ecloque, which, beautiful as it is, belongs to the same class of pastoral and personal allegory, and requires the same sacrifice of reasoning criticism as the Lycidas itself. In the age of Milton, the poetical world had been accustomed by the Italian and Spanish writers to a more abundant use of allegory than has been pleasing to their posterity; but Lycidas is not so much in the nature of an allegory as of a masque; the characters pass before our eyes in imagination, as on the stage; they are chielly mythological, but not creations of the poet. Our sympathy with the fate of Lycidas may not be much stronger than for the desertion of Gallus by his mistress; but many poems will yield an exquisite pleasure to the imagination that produce no emotion in the heart; or none at least, except through associations independent of the subject.

61. The introduction of St. Peter after the fabulous deities of the sea has appeared an incongruity deserving of censure to some admirers of this poem. It would be very reluctantly that we could abandon to this criticism the most splendid passage it presents. But the censure rests, as I think, on too narrow a principle. In narrative or dramatic poetry, where something like illusion or momentary belief is to be produced, the mind requires an objective possibility, a capacity of real existence, not only in all the separate portions of the imagined story, but in their coherency and relation to a common whole. Whatever is obviously incongruous, whatever shocks our previous knowledge of possibility, destroys to a certain extent that acquiescence in the fiction, which it is the true business of the fiction to produce. But the case is not the same in such poems as Lycidas. They pretend to no credibility, they aim at no illusion; they are read with the willing abandonment of the imagination to a waking dream, and require only that general possibility, that combination of images which common experience does not reject as incompatible, without which the fancy of the poet would be only like that of the lunatic. And it had been so usual to blend sacred with mythological personages in allegory, that no one probably in Milton's age would have been struck by the objection.

62. The Allegro and Penseroso are perhaps more fami-Abert and liar to us than any part of the writings of Milton. They satisfy the critics, and they delight mankind. The choice of images is so judicious, their succession so rapid, the allusions are so various and pleasing, the leading distinction of the poems is so felicitously maintained, the versification is so animated, that we may place them at the head of that long series of descriptive poems which our language has to boast. It may be added, as in the greater part of Milton's writings, that they are sustained at an uniform pitch, with few blemishes of expression and scarce any feebleness; a striking contrast, in this respect, to all the contemporaneous poetry, except perhaps that of Waller. Johnson has thought, that while there is no mirth in his melancholy, he can detect some melancholy in his mirth. This seems to be too strongly put; but it may be said that his Allegro is rather cheerful than gay, and that even his cheerfulness is not always without effort. In these poems he is indebted to Fletcher, to Burton, to Browne, to Wither, and probably to more of our early versifiers; for he was a great collector of sweets from those wild flowers.

63. The Ode on the Nativity, far less popular than most of the poetry of Milton, is perhaps the finest in the Nation.

English language. A grandeur, a simplicity, a breadth of manner, an imagination at once elevated and restrained by the subject, reign throughout it. If Pindar is a model of lyric poetry, it would be hard to name any other ode so truly Pindaric; but more has naturally been derived from the Scriptures. Of the other short poems, that on the death of the Marchioness of Winchester deserves particular mention. It is pity that the first lines are bad, and the last much worse; for rarely can we find more feeling or beauty than in some other passages.

64. The sonnets of Milton have obtained of late years the admiration of all real lovers of poetry. Johnson has been as impotent to fix the public taste in this instance as in his other criticisms on the smaller poems of the author of Paradise Lost. These sonnets are indeed unequal; the expression is sometimes harsh, and sometimes obscure; sometimes too much of pedantic allusion interferes with the sentiment, nor am I reconciled to his frequent deviations from the best Italian structure. But such blemishes are lost in the majestic simplicity, the holy calm, that ennoble many of these short compositions.

65. Many anonymous songs, many popular lays, both of Scotish and Euglish minstrelsy, were poured forth Anonymous in this period of the seventeenth century. Those of sector Scotland became, after the union of the crowns, and the consequent cessation of rude border frays, less warlike than before; they are still, however, imaginative, pathetic, and natural. It is probable that the best even of this class are a little older; but their date is seldom determinable with much precision. The same may be said of the English ballads, which, so far as of a merely popular nature, appear, by their style and other circumstances, to belong more frequently to the reign of James I. than any other period.

SECT. VI. - ON LATIN POETRY.

Latin Poets of France - And other Countries - Of England - May - Millon,

66. France, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, had been remarkably fruitful of Latin poetry; it Latin poetry was the pride of her scholars, and sometimes of her of France statesmen. In the age that we have now in review, we do now find so many conspicuous names; but the custom of VOL. 111.

academical institutions, and especially of the seminaries conducted by the Jesuits, kept up a facility of Latin versification, which it was by no means held pedantic or ridiculous to exhibit in riper years. The French enumerate several with praise; Guijon, Bourbon (Borbonius), whom some have compared with the best of the preceding century, and among whose poems that on the death of Henry IV. is reckoned the best: Cerisantes, equal, as some of his admirers think, to Sarbievius, and superior, as others presume, to Horace; and Petavius, who having solaced his leisure hours with Greek and Hebrew, as well as Latin versification, has obtained in the last the general suffrage of critics.* I can speak of none of these from direct knowledge, except of Borbonius, whose Diræ on the death of Henry have not appeared to my judgment deserving of so much eulogy.

67. The Germans wrote much in Latin, especially in the in Germany earlier decads of this period. Melissus Schedius. not undistinguished in his native tongue, might have been mentioned as a Latin poet in the last volume, since most of his compositions were published in the sixteenth century. In Italy we have not many conspicuous names. The bad taste that infested the school of Marini spread also, according to Tiraboschi, over Latin poetry. Martial, Lucan, and Claudian became in their eves better models than Catollus and Virgil. Baillet, or rather those whom he copies, and among whom Rossi, author of the Pinacotheca Virorum illustrium, under the name of Erythraus, a profuse and indiscriminating panegyrist, for the most part, of his contemporaries, furnishes the chief materials, bestows praise on Cesarini, on Querenghi, whom even Tiraboschi selects from the crowd, and on Maffei Barberini, best known as Pope Urban VIII.

68. Holland stood at the head of Europe in this line of

* Baillet, Jugement des Seavans, has l'autre ; car il écrit noblement, et d'un style assex pur. Apres tout, it n'a pas tant de feu, que Casimir, lequel avoit bien de l'espeit, et de cet espeit heureux qui fait les poetes. Bucanan a dex odes dignes de lastiques, man il a de grandes inegalites par le mélange de son caractero qui a de l'Esération mais sans pareté. Mag- n'est pas assez uni. Reflexions sur la Poetaque, p. 208.

eritaised all these and several more. Rapin's opinion on latte poetry is entailed to much regard from his own excellence in it. He praises three lyrists, Caurier, Mugdelenet, and Comanter, the two latter being French, Sartimiski delenet est pur mais sans elévation. Cerisantes a joint dans see odes l'un et poetry. Grotius has had the reputation of writing with spirit, elegance, and imagination. But he is excelled in Holland. by Heinsius, whose elegies, still more than his hexameters, may be ranked high in modern Latin. The habit, however, of classical imitation has so much weakened all individual originality in these versifiers, that it is often difficult to distinguish them, or to pronounce of any twenty lines that they might not have been written by some other author. Compare, for example, the elegies of Buchanan with those of Heinsius, wherever there are no proper names to guide us; a more finished and continued elegance belongs, on the whole (as at least I should say), to the latter, but in a short passage this may not be perceptible, and I believe few would guess with much confidence between the two. Heinsius, however, like most of the Dutch, is remarkably fond of a polysyllabic close in the pentameter; at least in his Javenilia, which, notwithstanding their title, are perhaps better than his later productions. As it is not necessary to make a distinct head for the Latin drama, we may here advert to a tragedy by Heinsins, Herodes Infanticida. This has been the subject of a critique by Balzac, for the most part very favourable; and it certainly contains some highly beautiful passages. Perhaps the description of the Virgin's feelings on the nativity, though praised by Balzac, and exquisitely classical in diction, is not quite in the best taste."

69. Sidonius Hoschius, a Flemish Jesuit, is extolled by Buillet and his authorities. But another of the same Canada order, Casimir Sarbievius, a Pole, is far better known, and, in lyric poetry, which he almost exclusively cultivated, obtained a much higher reputation. He had lived some years at Rome, and is full of Roman allusion. He had read Horace, as Sannazarius had Virgil, and Heinsius Ovid, till the style and tone became spontaneous; but he has more of cen-

A critique on the prema of Hermius will be found in the Retrospective Resiew, vol. 4, p. 19.; but notwithstanding the landstory spirit, which is for the most part too indiscriminating in that publication, the reviewer has not done justice to Heinston, and hardly seems, permips, a very competent jurige of Latin verse. The suffrages of those who were so, in favour of this Balassan poet, are co lected by Baillet. n. 1482.

I then seque it me have parada nune solne paret, Inter que ma cem tarp es imque has est athur a aparet paret a transfer paret a arres, ran heritable puret, a da proporte la paret, a and a men period, a paret a me a mental paret, a paret a mental paret, a paret a mental paret a period. A aparet a management in management a cristical production of the mental paret.

tonism than the other two. Yet while he constantly reminds us of Horace, it is with as constant an inferiority; we feel that his Rome was not the same Rome, that Urban VIII. was not Augustus, nor the Polish victories on the Danube like those of the sons of Livia. Hence his flattery of the great, though not a step beyond that of his master, seems rather more displeasing, because we have it only on his word that they were truly great. Sarbievius seldom rises high or pours out an original feeling; but he is free from conceits, never becomes prosaic, and knows how to put in good language the common-places with which his subject happens to formsh him. He is, to a certain degree, in Latin poetry what Chiabrera is in Italian, but does not deserve so high a place. Sarbievius was perhaps the first who succeeded much in the Alcaic stanza, which the earlier poets seem to avoid, or to use unskilfully. But he has many unwarrantable licences in his metre, and even false quantities, as is common to the great majority of these Latin versifiers.

70. Gaspar Barbeus had as high a name, perhaps, as any Latin poet of this age. His rhythm is indeed excellent, but if he ever rises to other excellence, I have not lighted on the passages. A greater equality I have never found than in Barleus; nothing is bad, nothing is striking. It was the practice with Dutchmen on their marriage to purchase epithalamiums in hexameter verse; and the muse of Barlaus was in request. These nuptial songs are of course about Peleus and Thetis, or similar personages, interspersed with fitting praises of the bride and bridegroom. Such poetry is not likely to rise high. The epicedia, or funeral lamentations, paid for by the heir, are little, if at all, better than the epithalamia; and the panegyrical effusions on public or private events rather worse. The elegies of Barkeus, as we generally find, are superior to the hexameters; he has here the same smoothness of versification, and a graceful gaiety which gives us pleasure. In some of his elegies and epistles he counterfeits the Ovidian style extremely well, so that they might pass for those of his model. Still there is an equability, a recurrence of trivial thoughts and forms, which in truth is too much characteristic of modern Latin to be a reproach to Barkeus. He uses the polysyllabic termination less than earlier Dutch poets. One of the epithalamia of Barkens, it may be observed before we leave him, is entitled Paradisus, and recounts the nuptials of Adam and Eve. It is possible that Milton may have seen this; the fourth book of the Paradise Lost compresses the excessive diffuseness of Barkens, but the ideas are in great measure the same. Yet since this must naturally be the case, we cannot presume imitation. Few of the poems of Barkens are so redundant as this; he has the gift of stringing together mythological parallels and descriptive poetry without stint, and his discretion does not inform him where to stop.

71. The eight books of Sylva by Balde, a German ecclesiastic, are extolled by Baillet and Bouterwek far above their value; the odes are tunid and unclassical; yet some have called him equal to Horace. Heinsins tried his skill in Greek verse. His Peplus Gracorum Epigrammatum was published in 1613. These are what our schoolboys would call very indifferent in point of elegance, and, as I should conceive, of accuracy: articles and expletives (as they used to be happily called) are perpetually employed for the sake of the metre, not of the sense.

72. Scotland might perhaps compete with Holland in this as well as in the preceding age. In the Delicite Tatasports Poetarum Scotorum, published in 1637 by Arthur of Scotond. Jonston, we find about an equal produce of each realine. century, the whole number being thirty-seven. Those of Jouston himself, and some elegies by Scot of Scotstarvet, are among the best. The Scots certainly wrote Latin with a good ear and considerable elegance of phrase. A sort of critical controversy was carried on in the last century as to the versions of the Psalms by Buchanan and Jonston. Though the national bonour may seem equally secure by the superiority of either, it has, I believe, been usual in Scotland to maintain the older poet against all the world. I am nevertheless inclined to think that Jonston's Psalms, all of which are in elegiac metre, do not fall short of those of Buchanan, either in elegance of style or in correctness of Latinity. In the 137th, with which Buchanan has taken much pains, he may be allowed the preference, but not at a great interval, and he has attained this superiority by too much diffuseness.

73. Nothing good, and hardly tolerable, in a poetical sense, over tot. had appeared in Latin verse among ourselves till this period. Owen's epigrams (Audoeni Epigrammata), a well-known collection, were published in 1607; unequal enough, they are sometimes neat and more often witty: but Attimater's they scarcely aspire to the name of poetry. Alabaster, a man of recondite Hebrew learning, published in 1632 his tragedy of Roxana, which, as he tells us, was written about forty years before for one night's representation, probably at college, but had been lately printed by some plagiary as his own. He forgets, however, to inform the reader, and thus lays himself open to some recrimination, that his tragedy is very largely borrowed from the Dalida of Groto, an Italian dramatist of the sixteenth century. The story, the characters, the incidents, almost every successive scene, many thoughts, descriptions, and images, are taken from this original; but it is a very free translation, or rather differs from what can be called a translation. The tragedy of Groto is shortened, and Alabaster has thrown much into another form, besides introducing much of his own. The plot is full of all the accumulated horror and slaughter in which the Italians delighted on their stage. I rather prefer the original tragedy. Alabaster has spirit and fire with some degree of skill; but his notion of tragic style is of the "King Cambyses' vein;" he is inflated and hyperbolical to excess, which is not the case with Groto.

74. But the first Latin poetry which England can vaunt is May's Supplement to Lucan, in seven books, Max's Sup-plement to Lucan, which carry down the history of the Pharsalia to the death of Casar. This is not only a very spirited poem, but, in many places at least, an excellent imitation. The versification, though it frequently reminds us of his model, is somewhat more negligent. May seems rarely to fall into Lucan's tumid extravagances, or to emulate his phi-

* I am indebted for the knowledge of read the trugedy of Groto, which I had not previously done,

The title of Roxana runs thus: -Rosana tragedia a plagiarii ungurbus Alabastro. Lond 1632.

this to a manuscript note I found in the copy of Alabaster's Roxana in the Bri-tish Museum Haud multurn about hore tragedia a pura versioni tragedia Italiea: vindicata aueta et agnita ab autore Gul. Ludovici Groti Czer Hadricous cur titulus Dalida, This induced me to losophical grandeur; but the narration is almost as impetuous and rapid, the images as thronged; and sometimes we have rather a happy imitation of the ingenious sophisms Lucan is apt to employ. The death of Cato and that of Cæsar are among the passages well worthy of praise. In some lines on Cleopatra's intrigue with Cæsar, while married to her brother, he has seized, with felicitous effect, not only the broken cadences, but the love of moral paradox we find in Lucan.*

75. Many of the Latin poems of Milton were written in early life, some even at the age of seventeen. His name, and the just curiosity of mankind to trace the Matten's development of a mighty genius, would naturally attract our regard. They are in themselves full of classical elegance, of thoughts natural and pleasing, of a diction culled with taste from the gardens of ancient poetry, of a versification remarkably well-cadenced and grateful to the ear. There is in them, without a marked originality, which Latin verse can rarely admit but at the price of some incorrectness or impropriety, a more individual display of the poet's mind than we usually find. "In the elegies," it is said by Warton, a very competent judge of Latin poetry, " Ovid was professedly Milton's model for language and versification. They are not, however, a perpetual and uniform tissue of Ovidian phraseology. With Ovid in view he has an original manner and character of his own, which exhibit a remarkable perspicuity of contexture, a native facility and fluency. Nor does his observation of Roman models oppress or destroy our great poet's inherent powers of invention and sentiment. I value these pieces as much for their fancy and genius as for their style and expression. That Ovid, among the Latin poets, was Milton's favourite, appears not only from his elegiae but his hexametric poetry. The versification of our author's hexameters has yet a different structure from that of the Metamorphoses: Milton's is more clear, intelligible, and flowing; less desultory, less familiar, and less embarrassed, with a frequent recurrence of periods. Ovid is at once rapid and abarupt." * Why Warton should have at once supposed Ovid to be Milton's favourite model in hexameters, and yet so totally different as he represents him to be, seems hard to say. The structure of our poet's hexameters is much more Virgilian, nor do I see the least resemblance in them to the manner of Ovid. These Latin poems of Milton bear some traces of juvenility, but, for the most part, such as please us for that very reason; it is the spring-time of an ardent and brilliant fancy, before the stern and sour spirit of polemical puritanism had gained entrance into his mind, the voice of the Allegro and of Comus.

, 22 a. Intest# powers domin, frate-enque sorvei Conjugio junctain, sacrie sub nomine tasta:

Concubits through tal. Computes polishent Que Professoreum thatanou, consuctaque are Major miniterio delictum ; turpius most, Qu's credat" justi sel thalamen Chopatra 19675 Lique minus lecto percaret, adultera facta

^{*} Warton's essay on the Latin poetry of Milton, inserted at length in Todd's edition.

CHAPTER VI.

HISTORY OF DRAMATIC LITERATURE, FROM 1600 to 1650.

SECT. I.

ON THE ITALIAN AND SPANISH DRAMA.

Character of the Italian Theatre in this Age — Bonarelli — The Spanish Theatre — Calderon — Appreciation of his Merits at a Dramatic Poet.

1. THE Italian theatre, if we should believe one of its historians, fell into total decay during the whole course of the seventeenth century, though the number of dramatic pieces of various kinds was by no means He makes a sort of apology for inserting in a copious list of dramatic performances any that appeared after 1600, and stops entirely with 1650. But in this he seems hardly to have done justice to a few, which, if not of remarkable excellence, might be selected from the rest. Andreini is perhaps best known by name in England, and that for one only of his eighteen dramas, the Adamo, which has been supposed, on too precarious grounds, to have furnished the idea of Paradise Lost in the original form, as it was planned by its great author. The Adamo was first published in 1613, and afterwards with amplification in 1611. It is denominated " A Sacred Representation;" and, as Andreini was a player by profession, must be presumed to have been brought upon the stage. It is, however, asserted by Riccoboni, that those who wrote regular tragedies did not cause them to be represented; probably he might have scrupled to give that epithet to the Adamo. Hayley and Walker have reckoned it a composition of considerable beauty.

^{*} Riccoboni, Hist, du Théatre Italien, vol. i.

.2. The majority of Italian tragedies in the seventeenth century were taken, like the Adamo, from sacred subjects, including such as ecclesiastical legends abundantly supplied. Few of these gave sufficient scope, either by action or character, for the diversity of excitement which the stage demands. Tragedies more truly deserving that name were the Solimano of Bonarelli, the Tancredi of Campeggio, the Demetrios of Rocco, which Salfi prefers to the rest, and the Aristodemo of Carlo de' Dottori. A drama by Testi, L'Isola di Alcina, had some reputation; but in this, which the title betrays not to be a legitimate tragedy, he introduced musical airs, and thus trod on the boundaries of a rival art. It has been suggested, with no inconsiderable probability, that in her passion for the melodrame Italy lost all relish for the graver tone of tragedy. Music, at least the music of the opera, conspired with many more important circumstances to spread an effeminacy over the public character.

3. The pastoral drama had always been allied to musical sentiment, even though it might be without accom-Pilli di Scho. paniment. The feeling it inspired was nearly that of the opera. In this style we find one imitation of Tasso and Guarini, inferior in most qualities yet deserving some regard, and once popular even with the critics of Italy. This was the Filli di Sciro of Bonarelli, published at Ferrara, a city already fallen into the bands of priests, but round whose descried palaces the traditions of poetical glory still lingered, in 1607, and represented by an academy in the same place soon afterwards. It passed through numerous editions, and was admired, even beyond the Alps, during the whole century, and perhaps still longer. It displays much of the bad taste and affectation of that period. Bonarelli is as strained in the construction of history and in his characters, as he is in his style. Celia, the heroine of this pastoral, struggles with a double love, the original idea, as he might truly think, of his drama, which he wrote a long dissertation in order to justify. It is, however, far less conformable to the truth of nature than to the sophisticated society for which he wrote. A wanton capricious court lady might perhaps waver, with some warmth of inclination towards both, between two lovers, " Alme dell' alma mia," as Celia calls them, and be very willing to possess either. But what is morbid in moral affection seldom creates sympathy, or is fit either for narrative poetry or the stage. Bonarelli's diction is studied and polished to the highest degree; and though its false refinement and affected graces often displease us, the real elegance of insulated passages makes us pause to admire. In harmony and sweetness of sound he seems fully equal to his predecessors, Tasso and Guarini; but he has neither the pathos of the one, nor the fertility of the other. The language and turn of thought seems, more than in the Pastor Fido, to be that of the opera, wanting, indeed, nothing but the intermixture of air to be perfectly adapted to music. Its great reputation, which even Crescimbeni does his utmost to keep up, proves the decline of good taste in Italy, and the lateness of its revival.

[·] Salfi, Continuation de Ginguéné, com on the Italian stage, Saggio Stovol. xii. chap ix. Besides this larger rico-Critico della Commedia Italiana. work, Salfi published in 1829 a short

4. A new fashion which sprung up about 1620, both marks the extinction of a taste for genuine tragedy, Transa. and by furnishing a substitute, stood in the way of its revival. Translations from Spanish tragedies dramas. and tragi-comedies, those of Lope de Vega and his successors, replaced the native muse of Italy. These were in prose and in three acts, irregular of course, and with very different characteristics from those of the Italian school. "The very name of tragedy," says Riccoboni, " became unknown in our country; the monsters which usurped the place did not pretend to that glorious title. Tragi-comedies rendered from the Spanish, such as Life is a Dream (of Calderon), the Samson, the Guest of Stone, and others of the same class, were the popular ornaments of the Italian stage."†

5. The extemporaneous comedy had always been the amusement of the Italian populace, not to say more of all who wished to unbend their minds, ‡ An epoch ^{*} Istoria della volgar Porua, iv. 147. He places the Fills di Seiro next to the Ammta.

[†] Hist, du Théstre Italien, i. 47.

t The extemporaneous comedy was called commedia dell' arte. " It con-in this art was made in 1611 by Flaminio Scala, who first published the outline or canvas of a series of these pieces, the dialogue being of course reserved for the ingenious performers. This outline was not quite so short as that sometimes given in Italian play-bills; it explained the drift of each actor's part in the scene, but without any distinct hint of what he was to say. The construction of these fables is censured by Riccoboni as both weak and licentious; but it would not be reasonable to expect that it should be otherwise. The talent of the actors supplied the deficiency of writers. A certain quickness of wit, and tact in catching the shades of manner, comparatively rare among us, are widely diffused in Italy. It would be, we may well suspect, impossible to establish an extemporaneous theatre in England which should not be stupidly vulgar. † But Bergamo sent out many Harlequins, and Venice many Pantalons. They were respected, as brilliant wit ought to be. The emperor Mathias conobled Cecchini, a famous Harlequin, who was, however, a man of letters. These actors sometimes took the plot of old comedies as their outline, and disfigured them, so as hardly to be known, by their extemporaneous dialogue.

6. Lope de Vega was at the height of his glory at the beginning of this century. Perhaps the majority of his dramas fall within it; but enough has been said on sisted," says Salfi, "in a more sketch or plan of a dramatic composition, the party in which having been hardly shadowed out were assigned to different actors who were to develop them in extemporaneous dialogue." Such a sketch was called a recentro, containing the subject of each scene, and those of Flaminia Scala were celebrated. Siggio Storico-Critico, p. 38. The pantomime, as it exists among us, is the descendant of this extemporaneous comedy, but with little of the wit and spirit of its progenitor.

balls, p. 40.

† This is only meant as to dialogue and as to the public stage. The taken of a single actor, like the late Charles Mathews, is not an exception; but even the power of strictly extemporaneous comody, with the agreeable purgnancy that the minor theatre requires, is not wenting among some whose station and habits of life restrain its exercise to the most private circles.

Riccoboni, Hist. du Théâtre Italien Salfi, vii. 518. An elaborate disquisition on the extemporaneous comedy by Mr. Panezzi, in the Foreign Review for 1829, (not the Foreign Quarterly, but one early extinguished,) derives it from the mimes and Atellanian comedies of ancient Italy, tracing them through the middle ages. The point seems sufficiently proved. The last company of performers in this old, though plebeinn, family, existed within about thirty years in Lombardy, a friend of mine at that time witnessed the last of the Harle-quins. I need hardly say that this character was not a more skipper over the stage, as we have seen him, but a very bonest and lively young Bergamasque. The plays of Carlo Gozza of plays they are, are mere hints to guide the wit of extemporaneous actors.

the subject in the last volume. His contemporaries and immediate successors were exceedingly numerous; the effulgence of dramatic literature in Spain corresponding exactly in time to that of England. Several are named by Bouterwek and Velasquez; but one only, Pedro Calderon de la Barca, must be permitted to arrest us. This celebrated man was born in 1600, and died in 1683. From an early age till after the middle of the century when he entered the church, he contributed, with a fertility only eclipsed by that of Lope, a long list of tragic, historic, comic, and tragi-comic dramas to the Spanish stage. In the latter period of his life, he confined himself to the religious pieces, called Autos Sacramentales. Of these, 97 are published in the collective edition of 1726, besides 127 of his regular plays. In one year, 1685, it is said that twelve of his comedies appeared. But the authenticity of so large a number has been questioned; he is said to have given a list of his sacred plays, at the age of eighty, consisting of only 68. No collection was published by himself. Some of his comedies, in the Spanish sense of the word, it may be observed, turn more or less on religious subjects, as their titles show: El Purgatorio de San Patricio — La Devocion de la Cruz — Judas Maccabeus — La Cisma de Inghilterra. He did not dislike contemporary subjects. In El Sitio de Breda, we have Spinola, Nassau, and others then living on the scene. Calderon's metre is generally trochaic, of eight or seven syllables, not always rhyming; but verses de arte mayor, as they were called, or anapæstic lines of eleven or twelve syllables, and also bendecasyllables, frequently occur.

7. The comedies, those properly so called, de capa y espada, which represent manners, are full of incident, but the come not perhaps crowded so as to produce any confusion; the characters have nothing very salient, but express the sentiments of gentlemen with frankness and spirit. We find in every one a picture of Spain; gallantry, jealousy, quick resentment of insult, sometimes deep revenge. The language of Calderon is not unfrequently poetical, even in these lighter dramas, but hyperbolical figures and insipid concerts deform its beauty. The gracioso, or witty servant, is an unfailing personage; but I do not know (my reading, however, being extremely limited) that Calderon displays much brilliancy or liveliness in his sallies.

8. The plays of Calderon required a good deal of theatrical apparatus, unless the good nature of the audience dispensed with it. But this kind of comedy must have led to scenical improvements. They seem to contain no indecency, nor do the intrigues ever become criminal, at least in effect; most of the ladies, indeed, are unmarried. Yet they have been severely censured by later critics on the score of their morality, which is no doubt that of the stage, but considerably purified in comparison with the Italian and French of the sixteenth century. Calderon seems to bear no resemblance to any English writer of his age, except, in a certain degree, to Beaumont and Fletcher. And as he wants their fertility of wit and humour, we cannot, I presume, place the best of his comedies on a level with even the second class of theirs. But I should speak perhaps with more reserve of an author, very few of whose plays I have read, and with whose language I am very imperfectly acquainted; nor should I have ventured so far, if the opinion of many European critics had not seemed to warrant my frigid character of one who has sometimes been so much applauded.

9. La Vida es Sueno rises, in its subject as well as style, LA VIGA on above the ordinary comedies of Calderon. Basilius, King of Poland, a deep philosopher, has by consulting the stars had the misfortune of ascertaining that his unborn son Sigismund would be under some extraordinary influences of evil passion. He resolves in consequence to conceal his birth, and to bring him up in a horrible solitude, where, it hardly appears why, he is laden with chains, and covered with skins of beasts, receiving meantime an excellent education, and becoming able to converse on every subject, though destitute of all society but that of his keeper Clotaldo. The inheritance of the crown of Poland is supposed to have devolved on Astolfo, duke of Moscovy, or on his cousin Estrella, who, as daughter of an elder branch, contests it with him. The play opens by a scene, in which Rosaura, a Moscovite lady, who having been betrayed by Astolfo, has fled to Poland in man's attire, descends the almost impassable precipices which overhang the small castle wherein Sigismund is confined. This scene and that in which he first appears, are impressive and full of beauty, even now that we are become accustomed in excess to these theatrical wonders. Clotaldo discovers the prince in conversation with a stranger, who by the king's general order must be detained, and prohably for death. A circumstance leads him to believe that this stranger is his son; but the Castilian loyalty transferred to Poland forbids him to hesitate in obeying his instructions. The king, however, who has fortunately determined to release his son, and try an experiment upon the force of the stars.

coming in, at this time, sets Rosaura at liberty.

10. In the next act Sigismund, who, by the help of a sleeping potion, has been conveyed to the palace, wakes in a bed of down, and in the midst of royal splendour. He has little difficulty in understanding his new condition, but preserves a not unnatural resentment of his former treatment. The malign stars prevail; he treats Astolfo with the utmost arrogance, reviles and threatens his father, throws one of his servants out of the window, attempts the life of Clotaldo and the honour of Rosaura. The king, more convinced than ever of the truth of astrology, directs another soporific draught to be administered; and in the next scene we find the prince again in his prison. Clotaldo, once more at his side, persuades him that his late royalty has passed in a dream, wisely observing, however, that asleep or awake we should always do what is right.

11. Sigismund, after some philosophical reflections, prepares to submit to the sad reality which has displaced his vision. But in the third act, an unforeseen event recalls him to the world. The army, become acquainted with his rights, and indignant that the king should transfer them to Astolfo, break into his prison, and place him at their head. Clotaldo expects nothing but death. A new revolution, however, has taken place. Signsmund, corrected by the dismal consequences of giving way to passion in his former dream, and apprehending a similar waking once more, has suddenly overthrown the sway of the sinister constellations that had enslaved him; be becomes generous, mild, and master of himself; and the only pretext for his disinheritance being removed, it is easy that he should be reconciled to his father, that Astolfo, abandoning a kingdom he can no longer claim, should espouse the injured Rosaura, and that the reformed prince should become the husband of Estrella. The incidents which chiefly relate to these latter characters have been omitted in this slight analysis.

12. This tragi-comedy presents a moral not so contemptible in the age of Calderon as it may now appear; that the stars may influence our will, but do not oblige it. If we could extract an allegorical meaning from the chimeras of astrology, and deem the stars but names for the circumstances of birth and fortune which affect the character as well as condition of every man, but yield to the persevering energy of self-correction, we might see in this fable the shadow of a permanent and valuable truth. As a play it deserves considerable praise; the events are surprising without excessive improbability, and succeed each other without confusion; the thoughts are natural and poetically expressed; and it requires, on the whole, less allowance for the different standard of national taste than is usual in the Spanish drama.

13. A Secreto agravio secreta vengança is a domestic tragedy which turns on a common story—a husband's revenge on one whom he erroneously believes to be still a favoured, and who had been once an accepted, lover. It is something like Tancred and Sigismunda, except that the lover is killed instead of the husband. The latter puts him to death secretly, which gives name to the play. He afterwards sets fire to his own house, and in the confusion designedly kills his wife. A friend communicates the fact to his sovereign, Sebastian King of Portugal, who applauds what has been done. It is an atrocious play, and speaks terrible things as to the state of public sentiment in Spain, but abounds with interesting and touching passages.

14. It has been objected to Calderon, and the following defence of Bouterwek seems very insufficient, that his servants converse in a poetical style like their masters. "The spirit, on these particular occasions," says that judicious but lenient critic, "must not be misunderstood. The servants in Calderon's comedies always imitate the language of their masters. In most cases they express themselves like the latter, in the natural language of real life, and often divested of that colouring of the ideas, without which a dramatic work ceases to be a poem. But whenever romantic gallantry speaks in the language of tenderness, admiration, or flattery, then, according to Spanish custom, every idea becomes a metaphor; and Calderon, who was a thorough Spaniard, seized these opportunities to give the reins to his fancy, and to suffer it to take a bold lyric flight beyond the boundaries of nature. On such occasions the most extravagant metaphoric language, in the style of the Italian Marinists, did not appear unnatural to a Spanish audience; and even Calderon himself had for that style a particular fondness, to the gratification of which he sacrificed a chaster taste. It was his ambition to become a more refined Lope de Vega or a Spanish Marini. Thus in his play, Bien vengas mal, si vengas solo, a waiting maid, addressing her young mistress who has risen in a gay humour, says - ' Aurora would not have done wrong had she slumbered that morning in her snowy crystal, for that the sight of her mistress's charms would suffice to draw aside the curtains from the couch of Sol.' She adds that, using a Spanish idea, 'it might then, indeed, be said that the sun had risen in her lady's eyes." Valets, on the like occasion, speak in the same style; and when lovers address compliments to their mistresses, and these reply in the same strain, the play of far-fetched metaphore is aggravated by antitheses to a degree which is intolerable to any but a Spanish-formed taste. But it must not be forgotten that this language of gallantry was in Calderon's time spoken by the fashionable world, and that it was a vernacular property of the aucient national poetry." . this but to confess that Calderon had not genius to raise himself above his age, and that he can be read only as a " Triton of the numows;" one who is great but in comparison with his neighbours? It will not convert bad writing into good to tell us, as is perpetually done, that we must place ourselves in the author's position, and make allowances for the taste of his age, or the temper of his nation. All this is true, rela-

P. 507 It has been ingeniously their masters, and designed to make it binted in the Quarterly Review, vol. xxv., ridiculous. But this is probably too rething the logis flour lar guage of servants fined an excuse in Spanish dramas is a puredy on that of tively to the author himself, and may be pleaded against a condemnation of his talents; but the excuse of the man is not that of the work.

15. The fame of Calderon has been latterly revived in Europe through the praise of some German critice, the merits but especially the unbounded panegyric of one of their greatest men, William Schlegel. The passage is well known for its brilliant eloquence. Every one must differ with reluctance and respect from this accomplished writer; and an Englishman, acknowledging with gratitude and admiration what Schlegel has done for the glory of Shakspeare, ought not to grudge the laurels he showers upon another head. It is however rather as a poet than a dramatist that Calderon has received this homage; and in his poetry, it seems to be rather bestowed on the mysticism, which finds a responsive chord in so many German hearts, than on what we should consider a more universal excellence, a sympathy with, and a power over all that is true and beautiful in nature and in man. Sismondi (but the distance between Weimar and Geneva in matters of taste is incomparably greater than by the public road) dissenting from this eulogy of Schlegel, which he fairly lays before the reader, stigmatises Calderon as eminently the poet of the age wherein he lived, the age of Philip IV. Salfi goes so far as to say we can hardly read Calderon without indignation; since he seems to have had no view but to make his genius subservient to the lowest prejudices and superstitions of his country." In the twenty-fifth volume of the Quarterly Review an elaborate and able critique on the plays of Calderon seems to have estimated him without prejudice on either side. "His boundless and inexhaustible fertility of invention, his quick power of seizing and prosecuting every thing with dramatic effect, the unfailing animal spirits of his dramas, if we may venture on the expression, the general loftiness and purity of his sentiments, the rich facility of his verse, the abundance of his language, and the clearness and precision with which he embodies his thoughts in words and figures, entitle him to a high rank as to the imagination and creative faculty of a poet, but we cannot consent to eurol him among the mighty masters of the human breast." . His total want of truth to nature, even the ideal nature which poetry embodies, justifies at least this sen-"The wildest flights of Biron and Romeo," it is observed, "are tame to the heroes of Calderon; the Asiatic pomp of expression, the exuberance of metaphor, the perpetual recurrence of the same figures, which the poetry of Spain derived from its intercourse with the Arabian conquerors of the peninsula, are lavished by him in all their fulness. Every address of a lover to a mistress is thickly studded with stars and flowers; her looks are always nets of gold, her lips rubies, and her heart a rock, which the rivers of his tears attempt in vain to melt. In short, the language of the heart is entirely abandoned for that of the fancy; the brilliant but false concetti which have infected the poetical literature of every country, and which have been universally exploded by pure taste, glitter in every page and intrude into every speech." †

[·] Hist. Litt. de Ginguéné, vol. 311. p. 499.

SECT. II. - ON THE FRENCH DRAMA.

Rarly French Dramatuts of this Period — Corneille — His principal Tragedies — Rotros.

16. Among the company who performed at the second theatre of Paris, that established in the Marais, was Hardy, who, like Shakspeare, uniting both arts, was himself the author of 600, or, as some say, 800 dramatic pieces. It is said that forty-one of these are extant in the collection of his works which I have never seen. Several of them were written, learned by heart, and represented within a week. His own inventions are the worst of all; his tragedies and tragi-comedies are borrowed with as close an adherence to the original text as possible from Homer or Plutarch or Cervantes. They have more incident than those of his predecessors, and are somewhat less absurd; but Hardy is a writer of little talent. The Marianne is the most tolerable of his tragedies. In these he frequently abandoned the chorus, and even where he introduces it, does not regularly close the act with an ode.

17. In the comedies of Hardy, and in the many burlesque farces represented under Henry IV, and Louis XIII., no regard was paid to decency, either in the language or the circumstances. Few persons of rank, especially ladies, attended the theatres.† These were first attracted by pastoral representations, of which Racan gave a successful example in his Artenice. It is hardly, however, to be called a drama. But the stage being no longer abandoned to the populace, and a more critical judgment in French literature gaining ground, encouraged by Richelieu, who built a large room in his palace for the representation of Mirame, an indifferent tragedy, part of which was suspected to be his own §, the aucient theatre began to be studied, rules were laid down and partially observed, a perfect decorum replaced the licentiousness and gross language of the old writers. Mairet and Rotrou, though without rising, in their first plays, much above Hardy, just served to prepare the way for the father and founder of the national theatre. I

18. The Melite of Corneille, his first production, was represented in 1629, when he was twenty-three years of age. This is only distinguished, as some say, from those of Hardy by a greater vigour of style; but Fontenelle gives a very different opinion. It had at least a success which caused a new troop of actors to be established in the Marais. His next, Clitandre, it is agreed, is not so good. But La Veuve is much better; irregular in action, but with spirit, character, ^{*} Fontenelle, Host, du Théatre François (in Œusres de Fontenelle, id. 72.).

Suard, Melanges de Latterature, vol iv. † Suard, p 1.34 Roteou boasts that aines he wrote for the theater, it had become so well regulated that respectable women might go to it with as little scraple as to the Lusembourg garden. Corneille, however, has, in general, the credit of having purified the stage, after his second piece, Chiandre, he admitted nothing beentious in his comed on. The only remain of grosmess, Fontenelle obbut as he gravely goes on to remark, le tutoyement ne choque pas les bonnes mirins; if no choque que la politesse et la visie galanterie p. 91. But the last instance of this hemous offence is in Le-Musteur.

¹ Suard, ubi supra.

Fontenella, p. 84-96.

Id p. " It is difficult in France, as it is with us, to ascertain the date of plays, because they were often represented for years before they came from the press. It is conjectured by Fautenelle that one or two pieces of Mairet and Rotron may have preceded any by Corneille.

and well-invented situations, it is the first model of the highercomedy. These early comedies must in fact have been relatively of considerable merit, since they raised Corneille to high reputation, and connected him with the literary men of his time. The Medea, though much borrowed from Seneca, gave a tone of grandeur and dignity unknown before to French tragedy. This appeared in 1685, and was followed by the Cid next year.

19. Notwithstanding the defence made by La Harpe, 1 cannot but agree with the French Academy, in their criticism on this play, that the subject is essentially The CAL ill-chosen. No circumstances can be imagined, no skill can be employed, that will reconcile the mind to the marriage of a daughter with one that has shed her father's blood. And the law of unity of time, which crowds every event of the drama within a few hours, renders the promised consent of Chimène (for such it is) to this union still more revolting and improbable. † The knowledge of this termination re-acts on the reader during a second perusal, so as to give an irresistible impression of her insincerity in her previous solicitations for his death. She seems, indeed, in several passages, little else than a tragic coquette, and one of the most odious kind,1 The English stage at that time was not exempt from great violations of nature and decorum; yet had the subject of the Cid fallen into the hands of Beaumont and Fletcher, and it is one which they would have willingly selected, for the sake of the effective situations and contrasts of passion it affords, the part of Chimene would have been managed by them with great warmth and spirit, though probably not less incongruity and extravagance; but I can scarcely believe that the conclusion would have been so much in the style of comedy, Her death, or retirement into a monastery, would have ^{*} Suard. Fontenelle. La Harpe.

[†] La Harpe has said that Chimene does not promise at last to marry Rodrigge, though the spectator perceives that she will do so. He forgets that she has commissioned her lover's sword in the duel with Don Sancho . -

Sers vanqueur d'un combat dont Chimène est le prix - Act v sc 1.

[!] In these lines, for example, of the third set, some 4th : -

Mager les feux et teaux qui ranjent ma colère, le feus succepantice à lieux renges man pête y blas vas 4 « la s grant d'un el cried devar, Mon unique souhait cet du us rien pouvoir, seemed more consonant to her own dignity and to that of a tragic subject. Corneille was however borne out by the tradition of Spain, and by the authority of Guillen de Castro whom he imitated.

It is true that he found this in his Spainth original, but that does not renther the unitation judicious, or the sentiment either moral, or even theatrically specious.

20. The language of Corneille is elevated, his sentiments. if sometimes hyperbolical, generally noble, when he has not to deal with the passion of love; conscious of the nature of his own powers, he has avoided subjects wherein this must entirely predominate; it was to be, as he thought, an accessory but never a principal source of dramatic interest. In this, however, as a general law of tragedy, he was mistaken: love is by no means unfit for the chief source of tragic distress, but comes in generally with a cold and feeble effect as a subordinate emotion. In those Roman stories which he most affected, its expression could hardly be otherwise than insipid and incongruous. Corneille probably would have dispensed with it, like Shakspeare in Coriolanus and Jalius Clesar; but the taste of his contemporaries, formed in the pedantic school of romance, has imposed fetters on his genius in almost every drama. In the Cid, where the subject left him no choice, he has perhaps succeeded better in the delineation of love than on any other occasion; yet even here we aften find the cold exaggerations of complimentary verse, instead of the voice of nature. But other scenes of this play, especially in the first act, which bring forward the proud Castilian characters of the two fathers of Rodrigo and Chimène, are full of the nervous eloquence of Corneille; and the general style, though it may not have borne the fastidious criticism either of the Academy or of Voltaire, is so far above any thing which had been heard on the French stage, that it was but a very frigid eulogy in the former to say that it " had acquired a considerable reputation among works of the kind." It had at that time astonished Paris; but the prejudices of Cardinal Richelieu and the envy of inferior authors, joined, perhaps, to the proverbial unwillingness of critical bodies to commit themselves by warmth of praise, had some degree of influence on the judgment which the Academy pronounced on the Cid, though I do not think it was altogether so unjust and uncandid as has sometimes been supposed.

21. The next tragedy of Corneille, Les Horaces, is hardly open to less objection than the Cid; not so Les Homuch because there is, as the French critics have need discovered, a want of unity in the subject, which I do not quite perceive, nor because the fifth act is tedious and uninteresting, as from the repulsiveness of the story, and the jarring of the sentiments with our natural sympathies. Corneille has complicated the legend in Livy with the marriage of the younger Horatius to the sister of the Curiatii, and thus placed his two female personages in a nearly similar situation, which he has taken little pains to diversify by any contrast in their characters. They speak, on the contrary, nearly in the same tone, and we see no reason why the hero of the tragedy should not, as he seems half disposed, have followed up the murder of his sister by that of his wife, More skill is displayed in the opposition of character between the combatants themselves; but the mild, though not less courageous or patriotic, Curiatius attaches the spectator, who cares nothing for the triumph of Rome, or the glory of the Horatian name. It must be confessed that the elder Horatius is nobly conceived; the Roman energy, of which we find but a caricature in his brutish son, shines out in him with an admirable dramatic spirit. I shall be accused, nevertheless, of want of taste, when I confess that his celebrated Qu'il mourit, has always seemed to me less eminently sublime than the general suffrage of France has declared it. There is nothing very novel or striking in the proposition, that a soldier's duty is to die in the field rather than desert his post by flight; and in a tragedy full of the hyperboles of Roman patriotism, it appears strange that we should be astonished at that which is the principle of all military honour. The words are emphatic in their position, and calculated to draw forth the actor's energy; but this is an artifice of no great skill; and one can hardly help thinking, that a spectator in the pit would spontaneously have anticipated the answer of a warlike father to the feminine question, -

Que voulez-rous qu'il fit contre tross?

The style of this tragedy is reckoned by the critics superior to that of the Cid; the nervousness and warmth of Corneille is more displayed; and it is more free from incorrect and trivial expression.

22. Cinna, the next in order of time, is probably that tragedy of Corneille which would be placed at the head by a majority of suffrages. His eloqueuce reached here its highest point; the speeches are longer, more vivid in narration, more philosophical in argument, more abundant in that strain of Roman energy, which he had derived chiefly from Lucan, more emphatic and condensed in their language and versification. But, as a drama, this is deserving of little praise; the characters of Cinna and Maximus are contemptible, that of Emilia is treacherous and ungrateful. She is indeed the type of a numerous class who have followed her in works of fiction, and sometimes, unhappily, in real life; the female patriot, theoretically, at least, an assassin, but commonly compelled, by the iniquity of the times, to console herself in practice with safer transgressions. We have had some specimens; and other nations, to their shame and sorrow, have had more. But even the magnanimity of Augustus, whom we have not seen exposed to instant danger, is uninteresting, nor do we perceive why he should bestow his friendship as well as his forgiveness on the detected traitor that cowers before him. It is one of those subjects, which might, by the invention of a more complex plot than history furnishes, have better excited the spectator's attention, but not his sympathy.

28. A deeper interest belongs to Polyeucte; and this is the only tragedy of Corneille wherein he affects the heart. There is, indeed, a certain incongruity which we cannot overcome between the sanctity of Christian martyrdom and the language of love, especially when the latter is rather the more prominent of the two in the conduct of the drama. But the beautiful character of Pauline would redeem much greater defects than can be ascribed to this tragedy. It is the noblest, perhaps, on the French stage, and conceived with admirable delicacy and dignity. † In the

The coterie at the Hotel Rambou-standed by an actor of so little reputation allet thought that Polycoete would not that he did not even bear a part in the successed, on account of its religious cha-racter (orneitie, it is said, was about † Fontonelle thinks that it shows to withdraw his tragedy, but was dis-"un grand attachement à son devoir, et style, however, of Polyeucte, there seems to be some return towards the languid tone of common-place which had been wholly thrown off in Cinna.*

24. Rodogune is said to have been a favourite with the author. It can hardly be so with the generality of Hodegune. his readers. The story has all the atrocity of the older school, from which Corneille, in his earlier plays, had emancipated the stage. It borders even on ridicule. Two princes, kept by their mother, one of those furies whom our own Webster or Marston would have delighted to draw, in ignorance which is the elder, and consequently entitled to the throne, are enamoured of Rodogune. Their mother makes it a condition of declaring the succession, that they shall shed the blood of this princess. Struck with horror at such a proposition, they refer their passion to the choice of Rodogune, who, in her turn, demands the death of their mother. The embarrassment of these amiable youths may be conceived. La Harpe extols the fifth act of this tragedy, and it may perhaps be effective in representation.

25. Pompey, sometimes inaccurately called the Death of Pompey, is more defective in construction than even any other tragedy of Corneille. The hero, if Pompey is such, never appears on the stage, and his death being recounted at the beginning of the second act, the real subject of the piece, so far as it can be said to have one, is the punishment of his assassins; a retribution demanded by the moral sense of the spectator, but hardly important enough for dramatic interest. The character of Cesar is somewhat weakened by his passion for Cleopatra, which assumes more the tone of devoted gallantry than truth or probability warrant; but Cornelia, though with some Lucanic extravagance, is full of a Roman nobleness of spirit, which renders her, un grand caractère " in Pauline to desire that Severus should save her husband's life, matrad of procuring the latter to be executed that she might marry her lover. Reflexions our la Poetique, seel, 16. This is rather an odd notion of what is sufficient to constitute an heroic character. It is not the conduct of Pauline, which in every Christian or sixtuous woman must naturally be the same, but the fine writinents and language which accompany it, that render her part so noble.

⁴ In the second scene of the second set, between Severus and Pauline, two characters of the most elevated class, the former quits the stage with this line, —

Adieu, trop vertueur objet, et trop charmant.

The latter replies. -

Adleu, trop malbeureux et trop purfut amant

after Pauline, but at a long interval, the finest among the female characters of Corneille. The language is not beneath that of his earlier tragedies.

26. In Heraclius we begin to find an inferiority of style. Few passages, especially after the first act, are written with much vigour; and the plot, instead of the faults we may ascribe to some of the former dramas, a too great simplicity and want of action, offends by the perplexity of its situations, and still more by their nature; since they are wholly among the proper resources of comedy. The true and the false Heraclius, each uncertain of his paternity, each afraid to espouse one who may or may not be his sister, the embarrassment of Phocas, equally irritated by both, but aware that in putting either to death, he may punish his own son, the art of Leontine who produces this confusion, not by silence, but by a series of inconsistent falsehoods, all these are in themselves ludicrous, and such as in comedy could produce no other effect than laughter.

11 Niconede is generally placed by the critics below leading, an opinion in which I should hardly concur. The plot is feeble and improbable, but more tolerable than the strange entanglements of Heraclius; and the spirit of Corneille shines out more in the characters and sentiments. None of his later tragedies deserve much notice, except that we find one of his celebrated scenes in Sertorius, a drama of little general merit. Nicomède and Sertorius were both first represented after the middle of the century.

28. Voltaire has well distinguished "the fine scenes of Corneille, and the fine tragedies of Racine." It can, perhaps, hardly be said that, with the exception of Polyeucte, the former has produced a single play, which, taken as a whole, we can commend. The keys of the passions were not given to his custody. But in that which he introduced upon the French stage, and which long continued to be its boast, impressive energetic declamation, be introduced upon the French stage, and which long continued to be its boast, impressive energetic declamation, thoughts masculine, bold, and sometimes sublime, conveyed in a style for the most part clear, condensed, and noble, and in a rhythm sonorous and satisfactory to the ear, he has not since been equalled. Lucan, it has always been said, was the favourite study of Corneille. No one, perhaps, can admire one who has not a strong relish for the other. That the tragedian has ever surpassed the highest flights of his Roman prototype, it might be difficult to prove; but if his fire is not more intense, it is accompanied by less smoke; his hyperboles, for such he has, are less frequent and less turgid; his taste is more judicious, he knows better, especially in description, what to choose and where to stop. Lucan, however, would have disdained the politeness of the amorous heroes of Corneille, and though often tedious, often offensive to good taste, is never languid or ignoble.

29. The first French comedy written in polite language, without low wit or indecency, is due to Corneille, or rather, in some degree, to the Spanish author whom he copied in Le Menteur. This has been improved a little by Goldoni, and our own well-known farce, The Liar, is borrowed from both. The incidents are diverting, but it belongs to the subordinate class of comedy, and a better moral would have been shown in the disgrace of the principal character. Another comedy about the same time, Le Pedant Joné, by Cyrano de Bergerac, had much success. It has been called the first comedy in prose, and the first wherein a provincial dialect is introduced; the remark, as to the former circumstance, shows a forgetfulness of Larivey. Molière has borrowed freely from this play.

30. The only tragedies, after those of Corneille, anterior to 1630, which the French themselves hold worthy other breach of remembrance, are the Sophonisbe of Mairet; in which some characters and some passages are vigorously conceived, but the style is debased by low and ludicrous thoughts, which later critics never fail to point out with neverity*; the Scevole of Duryer, the best of several good tragedies, full of lines of great simplicity in expression, but which seem to gain force through their simplicity, by one who, though never sublime, adopted with success the severe and reasoning style of Corneille†; the Marianne of Tristan, which, at its appearance in 1637, passed for a rival of the Cid, and remained for a century on the stage, but is now ridiculed for a style alternately turgid and ludicrous; and the Wenceslas of Rotrou, which had not ceased perhaps thirty years since to be represented.

[·] Suard, ubi suprà.

31. This tragedy, the best work of a fertile dramatist, wencesian who did himself honour by a ready acknowledged rooten. ment of the superiority of Corneille, instead of canvassing the suffrages of those who always envy genius, is by no means so much below that great master, as, in the unfortunate efforts of his later years, he was below himself. Wenceslas was represented in 1647. It may be admitted that Rotrou had conceived his plot, which is wholly original, in the spirit of Corneille; the masculine energy of the sentiments, the delineation of bold and fierce passions, of noble and heroic love, the attempt even at political philosophy, are copies of that model. It seems, indeed, that in several scenes Rotrou must, out of mere generosity to Corneille, have determined to outdo one of his most exceptionable passages, the consent of Chimène to espouse the Cid. His own curtain drops on the vanishing reluctance of his heroine to accept the hand of a monster whom she hated, and who had just murdered her lover in his own brother. It is the Lady Anne of Shakspeare; but Lady Anne is not a heroine. Wenceslas is not unworthy of comparison with the second class of Corneille's tragedies. But the ridiculous tone of language and sentiment which the heroic romance had rendered popular, and from which Corneille did not wholly emancipate himself, often appears in this piece of Rotrou; the intrigue is rather too complex, in the Spanish style, for tragedy; the diction seems frequently obnoxious to the most indulgent criticism; but above all, the story is essentially ill contrived, ending in the grossest violation of poetical justice ever witnessed on the stage, the impunity and even the triumph of one of the worst characters that was ever drawn.

SECT. III. - ON THE ENGLISH DRAMA.

Loudon Theatres - Shakepeare - Jonson - Beaumont and Fletcher - Massinger - Other English Dramatists.

SQ. THE English drama had been encouraged through the reign of Elizabeth by increasing popularity, not- Popularity withstanding the strenuous opposition of a party of the than sufficiently powerful to enlist the magistracy, and, in a certain measure, the government, on its side. A progressive improvement in dramatic writing, possibly also. though we know less of this, in the skill of the actors, ennobled, while it kept alive, the public taste; the crude and insipid compositions of an Edwards or a Whetstone, among numbers more whose very names are lost, gave way to the real genius of Greene and Marlowe, and after them to Shakspeare.

SS. At the beginning of this century, not less than eleven regular play-houses had been erected in London and Number of its suburbs; several of which, it appears, were still thouses. in use, an order of the privy council in 1600, restraining the number to two, being little regarded. Of these the most important was that of the Black Friars, with which another, called the Globe, on the opposite side of the river, was connected; the same company performing at the former in winter, at the latter in summer. This was the company of which Burbage, the best actor of the day, was chief, and to which Shakspeare, who was also a proprietor, belonged. Their names appear in letters patent, and other legal instruments.

31. James was fond of these amusements, and had encouraged them in Scotland. The puritan influence, Romanaged which had been sometimes felt in the council of by James. Elizabeth, came speedily to an end; though the represent-the stage, as a performer, soon after paid to him in Marketti. Makene, at least, his mane appears among the seems, between this Mr Collar does notices of Separas in 1803. There is a tradition that James I wrote a letter ation of plays on Sundays, a constant theme of complaint, but never wholly put down, was now abandoned, and is not even tolerated by the declaration of sports. The several companies of players, who, in her reign, had been under the nominal protection of some men of rank, were now denominated the servants of the king, the queen, or other royal personages.* They were relieved from some of the vexatious control they had experienced, and subjected only to the gentle sway of the Master of the Revels. It was his duty to revise all dramatic works before they were represented, to exclude profane and unbecoming language, and specially to take care that there should be no interference with matters of state. The former of these functions must have been rather laxly exercised; but there are instances in which a licence was refused on account of very recent history being touched in a play.

. Shakspeare probably retired from thanking Shakspeare for the compliment

35. The reigns of James and Charles were the glory of our theatre. Public applause, and the favour of princes, were well bestowed on those bright stars of our literature who then appeared. In 1623, when Sir Henry Herbert became Master of the Revels, there were five companies of actors in London. This, indeed, is something less than at the accession of James, and the latest historian of the drama suggests the increase of puritanical sentiments as a likely cause of this apparent decline. But we find little reason to believe that there was any decline in the public taste for the theatre; and it may be as probable an hypothesis, that the excess of competition, at the end of Elizabeth's reign, had rendered some undertakings unprofitable; the greater fishes, as usual in such cases, swallowing up the less. We learn from Howes the continuator of Stow, that within sixty years before 1681 seventeen play-houses had been built in the metropolis. These were now larger and herace, however, granted to Burbage, Shakspeare, Hemmings, and others, in 1608, authorises them to act plays not only at the usual house, but in any other part of the kingdom. Burbage was reckoned the best actor of his time, and excelled as Richard III.

[.] Collier, i. 347. But the privilege of obnoxious to grave magistrates. peers to grant licences to itinemnt players, given by statute 14 Eliz c. 5., and 39 Eliz, c. 4, was taken away by I Jac. I. c. 7, so that they became hable to be treated as vagrants. Accordingly there were no established theatres in any provincial city, and strollers, though dear to the lovers of the buskin, were always more convenient than before. They were divided into public and private; not that the former epithet was inapplicable to both; but those styled public were not completely roofed, nor well provided with seats, nor were the performances by candle-light; they resembled more the rude booths we still see at fairs, or the constructions in which interludes are represented by day in Italy; while private theatres, such as that of the Black Friars, were built in nearly the present form. It seems to be the more probable opinion that movable scenery was unknown on these theatres. "It is a fortunate circumstance," Mr. Collier has observed, "for the poetry of our old plays that it was so; the imagination of the auditor only was appealed to; and we owe to the absence of painted canvas many of the finest descriptive passages in Shakspeare. his contemporaries, and immediate followers. The introduction of scenery gives the date to the commencement of the decline of our dramatic poetry." In this remark, which seems as original as just, I entirely concur. Even in this age the prodigality of our theatre in its peculiar boast, scenepainting, can hardly keep pace with the creative powers of Shakspeare; it is well that he did not live when a manager was to estimate his descriptions by the cost of realising them on canvas, or we might never have stood with Lear on the cliffs of Dover, or amidst the palaces of Venice with Shylock and Antonio. The scene is perpetually changed in our old drama, precisely because it was not changed at all. powerful argument might otherwise have been discovered in favour of the unity of place, that it is very cheap.

36. Charles, as we might expect, was not less inclined to this liberal pleasure than his predecessors. It was Thrattes to his own cost that Prynne assaulted the stage in the partial his immense volume, the Histrio-mastix. Even Milton, before the foul spirit had wholly entered into him, extolled the learned sock of Jonson, and the wild wood-notes of Shakspeare. But these days were soon to pass away; the cars of Prynne were avenged; by an order of the two houses of parliament, Sept. 2. 1042, the theatres were closed, as a becoming measure during the season of public calamity and impending civil war; but, after some unsuccessful attempts to evade this prohibition, it was thought expedient, in the complete success of the party who had always abhorred the drama, to put a stop to it altogether; and another ordinance of Jan. 22. 1648, reciting the usual objections to all such entertainments, directed the theatres to be rendered unserviceable. We must refer the reader to the valuable work which has supplied the sketch of these pages for further knowledge *; it is more our province to follow the track of those who most distinguished a period so fertile in dramatic genius; and first that of the greatest of them all.

37. Those who originally undertook to marshal the plays of Shakspeare according to chronological order, always attending less to internal evidence than to Night the very fallible proofs of publication they could obtain, placed Twelfth Night last of all, in 1612 or 1613. It afterwards rose a little higher in the list; but Mr. Collier has finally proved that it was on the stage early in 1602, and was at that time chosen, probably as rather a new piece, for representation at one of the Inns of Court. † The general style resembles, in my judgment, that of Much Ado about Nothing, which is referred with probability to the year 1600. Twelfth Night, notwithstanding some very beautiful passages, and the humorous absurdity of Malvolio, has not the coruscations of wit and spirit of character that distinguish the excellent comedy it seems to have immediately followed, nor is the plot nearly so well constructed. Viola would be more interesting, if she had not indelicately, as well as unfairly towards Ohvia, determined to win the duke's heart before she had seen him. The part of Sebastian has all that improbability which belongs to mistaken identity, without the comic effect for the sake of which that is forgiven in Plautus and in the Comedy of Errors.

38. The Merry Wives of Windsor is that work of Shakspeare in which he has best displayed English manners; for though there is something of this in the historical plays, yet we rarely see in them such a not entirely arranged in the most convement mainer. He seems nevertheless to have obligations to Dodsley's preface to his Collection of Old Plays, or rather perhaps to Reci's edition of it.

f Yol, a. p. 327

^{*} I have made a a particular references to Mr. Collier's double work. The History of English Dramatic Poetry, and Annals of the Stage; it will be necessary for the reader to make use of his index, but few books lately published contain so much valuable and original information, though picture of actual life as comedy ought to represent. It may be difficult to say for what cause he has abstained from a source of gaiety whence his prolific invention and keen eye for the diversities of character might have drawn so much. The Masters Knowell and Well-born, the young gentlemen who spend their money freely and make love to rich widows, an insipid race of personages, it must be owned, recur for ever in the old plays of James's reign; but Shakspeare threw an ideality over this class of characters, the Bassanios, the Valentines, the Gratianos, and placed them in scenes which neither by dress nor manners recalled the prose of ordinary life. In this play, however, the English gentleman, in age and youth, is brought upon the stage, slightly caricatured in Shallow, and far more so in Slender. The latter, indeed, is a perfect satire, and I think was so intended, on the brilliant youth of the provinces, such as we may believe it to have been before the introduction of newspapers and turnpike roads, awkward and boobyish among civil people, but at home in rude sports, and proud of exploits at which the town would laugh, yet perhaps with more courage and good-nature than the laughers. No doubt can be raised that the family of Lucy is ridiculed in Shallow; but those who have had recourse to the old fable of the deer-stealing, forget that Shakspeare never lost sight of his native county, and went, perhaps every summer, to Stratford. It is not impossible that some arrogance of the provincial squires towards a player, whom, though a gentleman by birth and the recent grant of arms, they might not reckon such, exited his malicious wit to those admirable delineations.

39. The Merry Wives of Windsor was first printed in 1602, but very materially altered in a subsequent edition. It is wholly comic; so that Dodd, who published the Beauties of Shakspeare, confining himself to poetry, says it is the only play which afforded him nothing to extract. This play does not excite a great deal of interest; for Anne Page is but ⁽Beautoont and Fletcher) imitated the quite sure that I understand this expres-ease of gentlemanly conversation better than Shakspeare, who was unable not very different from what I have seid. to be too much associated to succeed in a sample of a character not very uncommon, which under a garb of placid and decorous mediocrity is still capable of pursuing its own will. But in wit and humorous delineation no other goes beyond it. If Palstaff seems, as Johnson has intimated, to have lost some of his powers of merriment, it is because he is humiliated to a point where even his invention and impudence cannot bear him off victorious. In the first acts he is still the same Jack Falstaff of the Boar's Head. Jonson's earliest comedy, Every Man in his Humour, had appeared a few years before the Merry Wives of Windsor; they both turn on English life in the middle classes, and on the same passion of jealousy. If then we compare these two productions of our greatest comic dramatists, the vast superiority of Shakspeare will appear undeniable. Kitely, indeed, has more energy, more relief, more excuse, perhaps, in what might appear to his temper matter for jealousy, than the wretched, narrow-minded Ford; be is more of a gentleman, and commands a certain degree of respect; but dramatic justice is better dealt upon Ford by rendering him ridiculous, and he suits better the festive style of Shakspeare's most amusing play. His light-hearted wife, on the other hand, is drawn with more spirit than Dame Kitely; and the most ardent admirer of Jonson would not oppose Master Stephen to Slender or Bobadil to Falstaff. The other characters are not parallel enough to admit of comparison; but in their diversity (nor is Shakspeare perhaps in any one play more fertile), and their amusing peculiarity, as well as in the construction and arrangement of the story, the brilliancy of the wit, the perpetual gaiety of the dialogue, we perceive at once to whom the laurel must be given. Nor is this comparison instituted to disparage Jonson, whom we have praised, and shall have again to praise so highly, but to show how much easier it was to vanquish the rest of Europe than to contend with Shakspeare.

[&]quot; "No doubt," says Coloridge, "they this." Table Talk, ii. 396. I am not

40. Measure for Measure, commonly referred to the end Measure for of 1603, is perhaps, after Hamlet, Lear, and Macbeth, the play in which Shakspeare struggles, as it were, most with the over-mastering power of his own mind;

the depths and intricacies of being which he has searched and sounded with intense reflection, perplex and harass him;

his personages arrest their course of action to pour forth, in language the most remote from common use, thoughts which few could grasp in the clearest expression; and thus he loses something of dramatic excellence in that of his contemplative philosophy. The Duke is designed as the representative of this philosophical character. He is stern and melancholy by temperament, averse to the exterior shows of power, and secretly conscious of some unfitness for its practical duties. The subject is not very happily chosen, but artfully improved by Shakspeare. In most of the numerous stories of a similar nature, which before or since his time have been related, the sacrifice of chastity is really made, and made in vain. There is, however, something too coarse and disgusting in such a story; and it would have deprived him of a splendid exhibition of character. The virtue of Isabella, inflexible and independent of circumstance, has something very grand and elevated; yet one is disposed to ask, whether, if Claudio had been really executed, the spectator would not have gone away with no great affection for her; and at least we now feel that her reproaches against her miserable brother when he clings to life like a frail and guilty being are too harsh. There is great skill in the invention of Mariana, and without this the story could not have had any thing like a satisfactory termination; yet it is never explained how the Duke had become acquainted with this secret, and being acquainted with it, how he had preserved his esteem and confidence in Angelo. His intention, as hinted towards the end, to marry Isabella, is a little too common-place; it is one of Shakspeare's hasty half-thoughts. The language of this comedy is very obscure, and the text seems to have been printed with great inaccuracy. I do not value the comic parts highly; Lucio's impudent profligacy, the result rather of sensual debasement than of natural ill disposition, is well represented; but Elhow is a very inferior repetition of Dogberry. In dramatic effect Measure for Measure ranks high; the two scenes between Isabella and Angelo, that between her and Claudio, those where the Duke appears in disguise, and the catastrophe in the fifth act, are admirably written and very interesting; except so far as the spectator's knowledge of the two stratagems which have deceived Angelo may prevent him from participating in the indignation at Isabella's imaginary wrong which her lamentations would excite. Several of the circumstances and characters are borrowed from the old play of Whetstone, Promos and Cassandra; but very little of the sentiments or language. What is good in Measure for Measure is Shakspeare's own.

41. If originality of invention did not so much stamp almost every play of Shakspeare that to name one as the most original seems a disparagement to others, we might say, that this great prerogative of genius was exercised above all in Lear. It diverges more from the model of regular tragedy than Macbeth or Othello, and even more than Hamlet; but the fable is better constructed than in the last of these, and it displays full as much of the almost super-human inspiration of the poet as the other two. Lear himself is, perhaps, the most wonderful of dramatic conceptions, ideal to satisfy the most romantic imagination, vet idealised from the reality of nature. In preparing us for the most intense sympathy with this old man, he first abases him to the ground; it is not Œdipus, against whose respected age the gods themselves have conspired; it is not Orestes, noble minded and affectionate, whose crime has been virtue; it is a headstrong, feeble, and selfish being, whom, in the first act of the tragedy, nothing seems capable of redeeming in our eyes; nothing but what follows, intense woe, unnatural wrong. Then comes on that splendid madness, not absurdly sudden, as in some tragedies, but in which the strings that keep his reasoning power together give way one after the other in the freuzy of rage and grief. Then it is that we find what in life may sometimes be seen, the intellectual energies grow stronger in calamity, and especially under wrong. An awful cloquence belongs to unmerited suffering. Thoughts burst out, more profound than Lear in his prosperous hour could ever have conceived; inconsequent, for such is the condition of madness, but in themselves fragments of coherent truth, the reason of an unreasonable mind.

42. Timon of Athens is cast as it were in the same mould as Lear; it is the same essential character, the same generosity more from wanton ostentation than love of others, the same fierce rage under the smart of ingratitude, the same rousing up, in that tempest, of powers that had slumbered unsuspected in some deep recess of the soul; for had Timon or Lear known that philosophy of human nature in their calmer moments which fury brought forth, they would never have had such terrible occasion to display it. The thoughtless confidence of Lear in his children has something in it far more touching than the self-beggary of Timon; though both one and the other have prototypes enough in real life. And as we give the old king more of our pity, so a more intense abhorrence accompanies his daughters and the worse characters of that drama, than we spare for the miserable sycophants of the Athenian. Their thanklessness is anticipated, and springs from the very nature of their calling; it verges on the beaten road of comedy. In this play there is neither a female personage, except two courtezans, who hardly speak; nor is there any prominent character (the honest steward is not such), redeemed by virtue enough to be estimable; for the cynic Apemantus is but a cynic, and ill replaces the noble Kent of the other drama. The fable, if fable it can be called, is so extraordinarily deficient in action, a fault of which Shakspeare is not guilty in any other instance, that we may wonder a little how he should have seen in the single delineation of Timon a counter-balance for the manifold objections to this subject. But there seems to have been a period of Shakspeare's life when his heart was ill at ease, and ill content with the world or his own conscience; the memory of hours mis-spent, the pang of affection misplaced or unrequited, the experience of man's worser nature, which intercourse with unworthy associates, by choice or circumstance, peculiarly teaches; - these, as they sank down into the depths of his great mind, seem not only to have inspired into it the conception of Lear and Timon, but that of one primary character, the censurer of mankind. This type is first seen in the philosophic melancholy of Jaques, gazing with an undiminished screnity, and with a gaiety of fancy, though not of manners, on the follies of the world. It assumes a graver cast in the exiled Duke of the same play, and next one rather more severe in the Duke of Measure for Measure. In all these, however, it is merely contemplative philosophy. In Hamlet this is mingled with the impulses of a perturbed heart under the pressure of extraordinary circumstances; it shines no longer, as in the former characters, with a steady light, but plays in fitful coruscations amidst feigned gaiety and extravagance. In Lear it is the flash of sudden inspiration across the incongruous imagery of madness; in Timon it is obscured by the exaggerations of misanthropy. These plays all belong to nearly the same period: As you Like It being usually referred to 1600, Hamlet, in its altered form, to about 1602, Timon to the same year, Measure for Measure to 1603, and Lear to 1604. In the later plays of Shakspeare, especially in Macbeth and the Tempest, much of moral speculation will be found, but he has never returned to this type of character in the person-Timon is less read and less pleasing than the great majority of Shakspeare's plays; but it abounds with signs of his genius. Schlegel observes that of all his works it is that which has most satire; comic in representation of the parasites, indignant and Juvenalian in the bursts of Timon himself.

13. Pericles is generally reckoned to be in part, and only in part, the work of Shakspeare. From the poverty and bad management of the fable, the want of any effective or distinguishable character, for Marina is no more than the common form of female virtue, such as all the dramatists of that age could draw, and a general feebleness of the tragedy as a whole, I should not believe the structure to have been Shakspeare's. But many passages are far more in his manner than in that of any contemporary writer with whom I am acquainted; and the extrinsic testimony, though not conclusive, being of some value, I should not dissent from the judgment of Steevens and Malone, that it was, in no inconsiderable degree, repaired and improved by his touch. Drake has placed it under the year 1590, as the earliest of Shakspeare's plays, for no better reason, apparently, than that he thought it inferior to all the rest. But if, as most will agree, it were not quite his own, this reason will have less weight; and the language seems to me rather that of his second or third manner than of his first. Pericles is not known to have existed before 1609.

44. The majority of readers, I believe, assign to Macbeth, which seems to have been written about 1606, the pre-eminence among the works of Shakspeare; many, however, would rather name Othello, one of his latest, which is referred to 1611; and a few might prefer Lear to either. The great epic drama, as the first may be called, deserves, in my own judgment, the post it has attained, as being, in the language of Drake, "the greatest effort of our author's genius, the most sublime and impressive drama which the world has ever beheld." It will be observed that Shakspeare had now turned his mind towards the tragic drama. No tragedy but Romeo and Juliet belongs to the sixteenth century; ten, without counting Pericles, appeared in the first eleven years of the present. It is not my design to distinguish each of his plays separately; and it will be evident that I pass over some of the greatest. No writer, in fact, is so well known as Shakspeare, or has been so abundantly, and, on the whole, so ably criticised; I might have been warranted in saving even less than I have done.

45. Shakspeare was, as I believe, conversant with the better class of English literature which the reign of He Roman Elizabeth afforded. Among other books, the translation by North of Amyot's Plutarch seems to have fallen into his hands about 1607. It was the source of three tragedies founded on the lives of Brutus, Antony, and Coriolanus, the first bearing the name of Julius Caesar. In this the plot wants even that historical unity which the romantic drama requires; the third and fourth acts are ill connected; it is deficient in female characters, and in that combination which is generally apparent amidst all the intricacies of his fable. But it abounds in fine scenes and fine passages; the spirit of Plutarch's Brutus is well seized, the predominance of Casar himself is judiciously restrained, the characters have that individuality which Shakspeare seldom misses; nor is there, perhaps, in the whole range of ancient and modern eloquence a speech more fully realising the perfection that orators have striven to attain than that of Autony.

46. Antony and Cleopatra is of rather a different order; it does not furnish, perhaps, so many striking beauties as the last, but is at least equally redolent of the Cheopatra. genius of Shakspeare. Antony indeed was given him by history, and he has but embodied in his own vivid colours the irregular mind of the triumvir, ambitious and daring against all enemies but himself. In Cleopatra he had less to guide him; she is another incarnation of the same passions, more lawless and insensible to reason and honour, as they are found in women. This character being not one that can please, its strong and spirited delineation has not been sufficiently observed. It has indeed only a poetical originality; the type was in the courtezan of common life, but the resemblance is that of Michael Angelo's Sybils to a muscular woman. In this tragedy, like Julius Clesar, as has been justly observed by Schlegel, the events that do not pass on the stage are scarcely made clear enough to one who is not previously acquainted with history, and some of the persons appear and vanish again without sufficient reason. He has, in fact, copied Plutarch too exactly.

47. This fault is by no means discerned in the third Roman tragedy of Shakspeare, Coriolanus. He luckily found an intriusic historical unity which he could not have destroyed, and which his magnificent deliveation of the chief personage has thoroughly maintained. Coriolanus himself has the grandeur of sculpture; his proportions are colossal, nor would less than this transcendent superiority by which he towers over his fellow-citizens, warrant, or seem for the moment to warrant, his haughtiness and their pusillanimity. The surprising judgment of Shakspeare is visible in this. A dramatist of the second class (for he alone is in the first), a Corneille, a Schiller, or an Alfieri, would not have lost the occasion of representing the plebeian form of courage and patriotism. A tribune would have been made to utter noble speeches, and some critics would have extolled the balance and contrast of the antagonist principles. And this might have degenerated into the general saws of ethics and politics which philosophical tragedians love to pour forth. But Shakspeare instinctively perceived that to render the arrogance of Coriolanus endurable to the spectator, or dramatically probable, he must abase the plebeians to a contemptible populace. The sacrifice of historic truth is often necessary for the truth of poetry. The citizens of early Rome, " rusticorum mascula militum proles." are indeed calumniated in his scenes, and might almost pass for burgesses of Stratford; but the unity of emotion is not dissipated by contradictory energies. Coriolanus is less rich in poetical style than the other two, but the comic parts are full of humour. In these three tragedies it is manifest that Roman character, and still more Roman manners, are not exhibited with the precision of a scholar; yet there is something that distinguishes them from the rest, something of a grandiosity in the sentiments and language, which shows us that Shakspeare had not read that history without entering into its spirit.

48. Othello, or perhaps the Tempest, is reckoned by many the latest of Shakspeare's works. In the zenith of his faculties, in possession of fame disproportionate metand indeed to what has since accrued to his memory, but beyond that of any contemporary, at the age of about fortyseven, he ceased to write, and settled himself at a distance from all dramatic associations in his own native town; a home, of which he had never lost sight, nor even permanently quitted, the birthplace of his children, and to which he brought what might then seem affluence in a middle station, with the hope, doubtless, of a secure decline into the yellow leaf of years. But he was cut off in 1616, not probably in the midst of any schemes for his own glory, but to the loss of those enjoyments which he had accustomed himself to value beyond it. His descendants, it is well known, became extinct in little more than half a century.

49. The name of Sbakspeare is the greatest in our literature-it is the greatest in all literature. No man Greatest of ever came near to him in the creative powers of the bu ground. mind; no man had ever such strength at once, and such variety of imagination. Coleridge has most felicitously applied to him a Greek epithet, given before to I know not whom, certainly none so deserving of it, Augustones, the thousandsouled Shakspeare. The number of characters in his plays is astonishingly great, without reckoning those, who, although transient, have often their individuality, all distinct, all types of human life in well defined differences. Yet he never takes an abstract quality to embody it, scarcely perhaps a definite condition of manners, as Jonson does; nor did he draw much, as I conceive, from living models; there is no manifest appearance of personal caricature in his consedies, though in some slight traits of character this may not improbably have been the case. Above all, neither he nor his contemporaries wrote for the stage in the worst, though most literal, and of late years the most usual, sense; making the servants and hand-maids of dramatic invention to lord over it, and limiting the capacities of the poet's mind to those of the performers. If this poverty of the representative department of the drama had hung like an incumbent fiend on the creative power of Shakspeare, how would be have poured forth with such inexhaustible prodigality the vast diversity of characters that we find in some of his plays? This it is in which he leaves far behind not the dramatists alone, but all writers of fiction. Compare with him Homer, the tragedians of Greece, the poets of Italy, Plantus, Cervantes, Molière, Addison, Le Sage, Fielding, Richardson, Scott, the romancers of the elder or later schools—one man has far more than surpassed them all. Others may have been as sublime, others may have been more pathetic, others may have equalled him in grace and purity of language, and have shunned some of its faults; but the philosophy of Shakspeare, his intimate searching out of the human heart, whether in the gnomic form of sentence, or in the dramatic exhibition of character, is a gift peculiarly his own. It is, if not entirely wanting, very little manifested, in comparison with him, by the English dramatists of his own and the subsequent period, whom we are about to approach.

[•] Table Talk, vol. ii. p. 901. Cole- worriser reperture ampiduous yekangan, will ridge had pressonely spoken of Shak- present the same adea as appeared in a speare's recover mind, which, if we take benutiful image. it in the sense of multitudinous unity,

hardly less inferior to Shakspeare in judgment. To this quality I particularly advert, because foreign writers, and sometimes our own, have imputed an extraordinary barbarism and rudeness to his works. They belong indeed to an age sufficiently rude and barbarons in its entertainments, and are of course to be classed with what is called the romantic school, which has hardly yet shaken off that reproach. But no one who has perused the plays anterior to those of Shakspeare, or contemporary with them, or subsequent to them, down to the closing of the theatres in the civil war, will pretend to deny that there is far less regularity, in regard to every thing where regularity can be desired, in a large proportion of these (perhaps in all the tragedies), than in his own. We need only repeat the names of the Merchant of Venice, Romeo and Juliet, Macbeth, Othello, the Merry Wives of Windsor, Measure for Measure. The plots in these are excellently constructed, and in some with uncommon artifice. But even where an analysis of the story might excite criticism, there is generally an unity of interest which tones the whole. The Winter's Tale is not a model to follow, but we feel that the Winter's Tale is a single story; it is even managed as such with consummate skill. It is another proof of Shakspeare's judgment, that he has given action enough to his comedies without the bustling intricacy of the Spanish stage. If his plots have any little obscurity in some parts, it is from copying his novel or history too minutely.

51. The idolatry of Shakspeare has been carried so far of late years, that Drake and perhaps greater authorities have been unwilling to acknowledge any faults in his plays. This however is an extravagance rather derogatory to the critic than honourable to the poet. Besides the blemishes of construction in some of his plots, which are pardonable but still blemishes, there are too many in his style. His conceits and quibbles often spoil the effect of his scenes and take off from the passion be would excite. In the last act of Richard II., the Duke of York is introduced demanding the punishment of his son Annale for a conspiracy against the king, while the Duchess implores mercy. The scene is ill conceived and worse executed throughout; but one line is both atrocious and contemptible. The Duchess having dwelt on the word pardon, and urged the king to let her hear it from his lips, York takes her up with this stupid quibble:-

Speak it in French, King; say, Pardonnez-mol.

It would not be difficult to find several other instances, though none, perhaps, quite so bad, of verbal equivocations, misplaced and inconsistent with the person's, the author's, the reader's sentiment.

52. Few will defend these notorious faults. But is there His obsou. not one, less frequently mentioned, yet of more continual recurrence; the extreme obscurity of Shakspeare's diction? His style is full of new words and new senses. It is easy to pass this over as obsoleteness; but though many expressions are obsolete, and many provincial, though the labour of his commentators has never been so profitably, as well as so diligently, employed as in tracing this by the help of the meanest and most forgotten books of the age, it is impossible to deny that innumerable lines in Shakspeare were not more intelligible in his time than they are at present. Much of this may be forgiven, or rather is so incorporated with the strength of his reason and fancy that we love it as the proper body of Shakspeare's soul. Still, can we justify the very numerous passages which yield to no interpretation, knots which are never unloosed, which conjecture does but cut, or even those, which, if they may at last be understood, keep the attention in perplexity till the first emotion has passed away? And these occur not merely in places where the struggles of the speaker's mind may be well denoted by some obscurities of language, as in the soliloquies of Hamlet and Macbeth, but in dialogues between ordinary personages, and in the business of the play. We learn Shakspeare, in fact, as we learn a language, or as we read a difficult passage in Greek, with the eye glancing on the commentary; and it is only after much study that we come to forget a part, it can be but a part, of the perplexities he has caused us. This was no doubt one reason that he was less read formerly, his style passing for obsolete, though in many parts, as we have just said, it was never much more intelligible than it is, "

53. It does not appear probable that Shakspeare was ever placed below, or merely on a level with the other dramatic [&]quot; "Shakipeare's style is so pestered (Malone), vol. ii. part ii. p. 252 This is with figurative expressions that it is as by no means the truth, but rather the uffected as it is obscured. It is true that reverse of it. Dryden knew not at all in his latter plays he had worn off some-which were earlier, or which later, of what of this rust."— Dryden's Works. Shakspenre's plays.

writers of this period. That his plays were not so frequently represented as those of Fletcher, is little to His popul the purpose; they required a more expensive decoration, a larger company of good performers, and above all, they were less intelligible to a promiscuous audience. Yet it is certain that throughout the seventeenth century, and even in the writings of Addison and his contemporaries, we seldom or never meet with that complete recognition of his supremacy, that unhesitating preference of him to all the world, which has become the faith of the last and the present century. And it is remarkable that this apotheosis, so to speak, of Shakspeare, was originally the work of what has been styled a frigid and tasteless generation, the age of George II. Much is certainly due to the stage itself, when those appeared, who could guide and control the public taste, and discover that in the poet himself which sluggish imaginations could not have reached. The enthusiasm for Shakspeare is nearly coincident with that for Garrick; it was kept up by his followers, and especially by that highly-gifted family which has but recently been withdrawn from our

54. Among the commentators on Shakspeare, Warburton, always striving to display his own acuteness and Critica on scorn of others, deviates more than any one else Shakapana from the meaning. Theobald was the first who did a little. Johnson explained much well, but there is something magisterial in the manner wherein he dismisses each play like a boy's exercise, that irritates the reader. His criticism is frequently judicious, but betrays no ardent admiration for Shakspeare to thee was dull, whose best wit lies I'th' ladies questions, and the fools' repries.

But the suffrage of Jonson himself, of Milton, and of many more that might be quoted, tends to prove that his genus was esteemed beyond that of any other, though some might compare inferior writers to him in certain qualifications of the dramatic. Even Dryden, who came in a worse period, and had no undue reverence for Shakspeare, admits that "he was the man who of all modern, and perhaps ancient, poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul. All the images of nature were still present to him, and he draw them not laboriously, but luckily, when he describes any thing, you more than see it, you feel it too. Those who accuse him to have wanted learning give him the greater examinendation, he was naturally learned, he needed not the spectacles of blooks to read nature; he looked inwards, and found her there." — Drydeo's Prose Works (Malone's edition), vol. i. part il. p. 99.

A certain William Cartwright, in commendatory verses addressed to Fletcher, has the assurance to say,—

Shakspeare. Malone and Steevens were two laborious commentators on the meaning of words and phrases; one dull, the other clever; but the dulness was accompanied by candour and a love of truth, the eleverness by a total absence of both. Neither seems to have had a full discerament of Shakspeare's genius. The numerous critics of the last age who were not editors have poured out much that is trite and insipid, much that is hypercritical and erroneous; yet collectively they not only bear witness to the public taste for the poet, but taught men to judge and feel more accurately than they would have done for themselves. Hurd and Lord Kaimes, especially the former, may be reckoned among the best of this class ; Mrs. Montagu, perhaps, in her celebrated Essay, not very far from the bottom of the list. In the present century, Coleridge and Schlegel, so nearly at the same time that the question of priority and even plagiarism has been mooted, gave a more philosophical, and at the same time a more intrinsically exact view of Shakspeare, than their predecessors. What has since been written, has often been highly acute and sesthetic, but occasionally with an excess of refinement which substitutes the critic for the work. Jameson's Essays on the Female Characters of Shakspeare are among the best. It was right that this province of illustration should be reserved for a woman's hand.

55. Ben Jonson, so generally known by that familiar description that some might hardly recognise him without it, was placed next to Shakspeare by his own age. They were much acquainted, and belonged to the oldest, perhaps, and not the worst of clubs, formed by Sir Walter Raleigh about the beginning of the century, which met at the Mermaid in Friday Street. We may easily believe the testimony of one of its members, that it was a feast of the most subtle and brilliant wit. † Jonson had abundant of Poety, vol. i. p. 52., has some very good remarks on the diction of Shakspecie, suggested by the "caloda june. tura" of the Roman poet, illustrated by many instances. These remarks both serve to bring out the skill of Shakspears, and to explain the disputed pastage in Horses Hard justly maintains [.] Hurd, in his notes on Hornec's Art the obvious construction of that pavege; "notum a callida verbum Redsiderit junctura novum." That proposed by Lambinus and Beattie, which begins with seess, is madmissible, and gives a WOISE Sense powers of poignant and sarcastic humour, besides extensive reading, and Shakspeare must have brought to the Mermaid the brightness of his fancy. Selden and Camden, the former in early youth, are reported to have given the ballast of their strong sense and learning to this cluster of poets. There has been, however, a prevalent tradition that Jonson was not without some malignant and envious feelings towards Shakspeare. Gifford has repelled this imputation with considerable success, though we may still suspect that there was something caustic and saturnine in the temper of Jonson.

[.] Gefford's Life of Jouson, p. 65. Colher, 311. 275.

56. The Alchemist is a play which long remained on the stage, though I am not sure that it has been repre- The Alchesented since the days of Garrick, who was famous must in Abel Drugger. Notwithstanding the indiscriminate and injudicious panegyric of Gifford, I believe there is no reader of taste but will condemn the outrageous excess of pedantry with which the first acts of this play abound; pedantry the more intolerable, that it is not even what, however unfit for the English stage, scholars might comprehend, but the gibberish of obscure treatises on alchemy, which, whatever the commentators may choose to say, was as unintelligible to all but a few half-witted dupes of that imposture as it is at present. Much of this, it seems impossible to doubt, was omitted in representation. Nor is his pedantic display of learning confined to the part of the Alchemist, who had certainly a right to talk in the style of his science, if he had done it with some moderation: Sir Epicure Mammon, a worldly sensualist, placed in the author's own age, pours out a torrent of gluttonous cookery from the kitchens of Heliogabalus and Apicius; his dishes are to be camels' heels, the beards of barbels and dissolved pearl, crowning all with the paps of a sow. But while this habitual error of Jonson's vanity is not to be overlooked, we may truly say, that it is much more than compensated by the excellencies of this comedy. The plot, with great simplicity, is continually animated and interesting; the characters are conceived and delineated with admirable boldness, truth, spirit, and variety; the humour, especially in the two Puritans, a sect who now began to do penance on the stage, is amusing; the language, when it does not smell too much of book-learning, is foresble and clear. The Alchemist is one of the three plays which usually contest the superiority among those of Jonson.

57. The second of these is The Fox, which, according to general opinion, has been placed above the Alchemist. Notwithstanding the dissent of Gifford, I should concur in this suffrage. The fable belongs to a higher class of comedy. Without minutely inquiring whether the Roman hunters after the inheritance of the rich, so well described by Horace, and especially the costly presents by which they endeavoured to secure a better return, are altogether according to the manners of Venice, where Jonson has laid his scene, we must acknowledge that he has displayed the base cupidity, of which there will never be wanting examples among mankind, in such colours as all other dramatic poetry can hardly rival. Cumberland has blamed the mauner, in which Volpone brings ruin on his head by insulting, in disguise, those whom he had duped. In this, I agree with Gifford, there is no violation of pature. Besides their ignorance of his person, so that he could not necessarily foresee the effects of Voltore's rage, it has been well and finely said by Cumberland, that there is a moral in a villain's outwitting himself. And this is one that many dramatists have displayed.

58. In the choice of subject, The Fox is much inferior to Tartuffe, to which it bears some very general analogy. Though the Tartuffe is not a remarkably agreeable play, The Fox is much less so; five of the principal characters are wicked almost beyond any retribution that comedy can dispense; the smiles it calls forth are not those of gaiety but scorn; and the parts of an absurd English knight and his wife, though very humorous, are hardly prominent enough to enliven the scenes of guilt and fraud which pass before our eyes. But, though too much pedantry obtrudes itself, it does not overspread the pages with nonsense as in the Alchemist; the characters of Celia and Bonario excite some interest; the differences, one can hardly say the gradations, of villany are marked with the strong touches of Jonson's pen; the incidents succeed rapidly and naturally; the dramatic effect, above all, is perceptible to every reader, and rises in a climax through the last two acts to the conclusion.

59. The Silent Woman, which has been named by some with the Alchemist and the Fox, falls much below The Steam them in vigorous delineation and dramatic effect. Woman It has more diversity of manners than of character, the amusing scenes border sometimes on farce, as where two cowardly knights are made to receive blows in the dark, each supposing them to come from his adversary, and the catastrophe is neither pleasing nor probable. It is written with a great deal of spirit, and has a value as the representation of London life in the higher ranks at that time. But upon the whole I should be inclined to give to Every Man in his Humour a much superior place. It is a proof of Jonson's extensive learning, that the story of this play, and several particular passages, have been detected in a writer so much out of the beaten track as Libanius.*

60. The pastoral drama of the Sad Shepherd is the best testimony to the poetical imagination of Joason. Sat Shep. Superior in originality, liveliness, and beauty to the bent Faithful Shepherdess of Fletcher, it reminds us rather, in language and imagery, of the Midsummer Night's Dream, and perhaps no other poetry has come so near to that of Shakspeare. Jonson, like him, had an extraordinary command of English, in its popular and provincial idioms, as well as what might be gained from books; and though his invincible pedantry now and then obtrudes itself into the mouths of shepherds, it is compensated by numerous passages of the most natural and graceful expression. This beautiful drama is imperfect, hardly more than half remaining, or, more probably, having ever been written. It was also Jonson's last song; age and poverty had stolen upon him; but as one has said, who experienced the same destiny, " the life was in the leaf," and his laurel remained verdant amidst the snow of his honoured head. The beauties of the Sad

. G'fford discovered this. Dryden, have filled it up from the life. Dryden gives it as his op mion that there is more wit and acutioness of fame) in this play that in any of Ben Jonson s, and that no has described the conversation of gentlemen with more guesty and freedom than who has given an examination of the Spent Woman, in his Essay on Dramatic Poetry, tikes Morose for a real chararter, and says that he had so been infor red. It is possible it at there to ght be some foundation of truth, in this the in the rest of his considers, p. 107. skoleton is in L. bannes, but Jonson may Shepherd might be reckoned rather poetical than dramatic; yet the action is both diversified and interesting to a degree we seldom find in the pastoral drama; there is little that is low in the comic speeches, nothing that is inflated in the serious.

61. Two men once united by friendship, and for ever by fame, the Dioscuri of our zodiac, Beaumont and Beaumont Fletcher, rose upon the horizon as the star of Shakspeare, though still in its fullest brightness, was declining in the sky. The first in order of time among more than fifty plays published with their joint names, is the Woman-Hater, represented, according to Langbaine, in 1607, and ascribed to Beaumont alone by Seward, though, I believe, merely on conjecture. Beaumont died, at the age of thirty, in 1615; Fletcher in 1625. No difference of manner is perceptible, or, at least, no critic has perceived any, in the plays that appeared between these two epochs; in fact, the greater part were not printed till 1647, and it is only through the records of the play-house that we distinguish their dates. The tradition, however, of their own times, as well as the earlier death of Beaumont, give us reason to name Fletcher, when we mention one singly, as the principal author of all these plays; and of late years this has perhaps become more customary than it used to be. A contemporary copy of verses, indeed, seems to attribute the greater share in the Maid's Tragedy, Philaster, and King and No King, to Beaumont. But testimony of this kind is very precarious. It is sufficient that he bore a part in these such mangling by the printer as Beaumont and Fletcher. Their style is generally elliptical and not very perspicuous; they use words in peculiar senses, and there seems often an attempt at pointed expression, in which its meaning has deserted them. But after every effort to comprehend their language, it is continually so remote from all possibility of bearing a rational sense, that we can only have recourse to one hypothesis, that of an extensive and irreparable corruption of the text. Seward and Simpson, who, in 1750, published the first edition in which any endeavour was made at illustration or amendment, though not men of much taste, and too fond of extolling their authors, showed some acuteness, and have restored many passages in a probable manner, though often driven out at sea to conjecture something, where the received reading furnished not a vestige which they could trace. No one since has made any great progress in this criticism, though some have carped at these editors for not performing more. The problem of actual restoration in most places, where the printers or transcribers have made such strange havoc, must evidently be insoluble.

[•] Vol i p. 3. He also thinks The These two appear to me about the worst Nice Valour exchangely Beaumont's, in the collection,

68. The first play in the collected works of Beaumont and Fletcher, though not the earliest, is the Maid's The Maid's Tragedy, and it is among the best. None of their Tragedy. female characters, though they are often very successful in beautiful delineations of virtuous love, attaches our sympathy like Aspasia. Her sorrows are so deep, so pure, so unmerited, she sustains the breach of plighted faith in Amyntor, and the taunts of victous women with so much resignation, so little of that termagant resentment which these poets are apt to infuse into their heroines, the poetry of her speeches is so exquisitely imaginative, that, of those dramatic persons who are not prominent in the development of a story, scarce any, even in Shakspeare, are more interesting. Nor is the praise due to the Maid's Tragedy confined to the part of Aspasia. In Melantius we have Fletcher's favourite character, the brave honest soldier, incapable of suspecting evil, till it becomes impossible to be ignorant of it, but unshrinking in its punishment. That of Evadne well displays the audacious security of guilt under the safeguard of power; it is highly theatrical, and renders the success of this tragedy not surprising in times when its language and situations could be endured by the audience. We may remark in this tragedy, as in many others of these dramatists, that, while pouring out the unlimited loyalty fashionable at the court of James, they are full of implied satire, which could hardly escape observation. The warm cologies on military glory, the scorn of slothful peace, the pictures of dissolute baseness in courtiers, seem to spring from a sentiment very usual among the English gentry, a rank to which they both belonged, of dislike to that ignominious government; and though James was far enough removed from such voluptuous tyrants as Fletcher has pourtrayed in this and some other plays, they did not serve to exemplify the advantages of monarchy in the most attractive manner.

64. The Maid's Tragedy, unfortunately, beautiful and essentially moral as it is, cannot be called a tragedy for maids, and indeed should hardly be read by any respectable woman. It abounds with that studiously protracted indecency which distinguished Fletcher beyond all our early dramatists, and is so much incorporated with his plays, that very few of them can be so altered as to become tolerable at present on the stage. In this he is strikingly contrasted with Shakspeare, whose levities of this kind are so transitory, and so much confined to language, that he has borne the process of purification with little detriment to his genius, or even to his wit.

65. Philaster has been, in its day, one of the best known and most popular of Fletcher's plays.* This was owing to the pleasing characters of Philaster and Bellario, and to the frequent sweetness of the poetry. It is, nevertheless, not a first-rate play. The plot is most absurdly managed. It turns on the suspicion of Arethusa's infidelity. And the sole ground of this is that an abandoned woman, being detected herself, accuses the princess of unchastity. Not a shadow of presumptive evidence is brought to confirm this impudent assertion, which, however, the lady's father, her lover, and a grave sensible courtier, do not fail implicitly to believe. How unlike the chain of circumstance, and the devilish cunning by which the Moor is wrought up to think his Desdemona false! Bellario is suggested by Viola; there is more picturesqueness, more dramatic importance, not, perhaps, more beauty and sweetness of affection, but a more eloquent development of it in Fletcher; on the other hand, esteems, for h f re that they had written its representation. two or three very unsuccessfully." p 100.

Dryden says, but I know not how Philaster was not printed, according to truly, that I hilaster was "the first play Langbane, till 1620. I do not know that brought Beaum at and Fletcher in that we have any evilence of the date of

there is still more of that improbability which attends a successful concealment of sex by mere disguise of clothes, though no artifice has been more common on the stage. Many other circumstances in the conduct of Fletcher's story are ill-contrived. It has less wit than the greater part of his comedies; for among such, according to the old distinction, it is to be ranked, though the subject is elevated and serious.

66. King and No King is, in my judgment, inferior to Philaster. The language has not so much of poe- King and No tical beauty. The character of Arbaces excites no King. sympathy; it is a compound of vainglory and violence, which rather demands disgrace from poetical justice than reward. Panthea is innocent, but insipid; Mardonius a good specimen of what Fletcher loves to exhibit, the plain honest courtier. As for Bessus, he certainly gives occasion to several amusing scenes; but his cowardice is a little too glaring; he is neither so laughable as Bobadil, nor so sprightly as Parolles. The principal merit of this play, which rendered it popular on the stage for many years, consists in the effective scenes where Arbaces reveals his illicit desire. That especially with Mardonius is artfully and elaborately written. had less of this skill; and his tragedies suffer for it in their dramatic effect. The scene between John and Hubert is an exception, and there is a great deal of it in Othello; but in general he may be said not to have exerted the power of detaining the spectator in that anxious suspense, which creates almost an actual illusion, and makes him tremble at every word, lest the secret which he has learned should be imparted to the imaginary person on the stage. Of this there are several fine instances in the Greek tragedians, the famous scene in the Œdipus Tyrannus being the best; and it is possible that the superior education of Fletcher may have rendered him familiar with the resources of ancient tragedy. These scenes in the present play would have been more highly powerful if the interest could have been thrown on any character superior to the selfish braggart Arbaces. It may be said, perhaps, that his humiliation through his own lawless passions, after so much insolence of success, affords a moral; he seems, however, but imperfectly cured at the conclusion, which is also harried on with unsatisfactory rapidity.

67. The Elder Brother has been generally reckoned The Plater among the best of Fletcher's comedies. It displays in a new form an idea not very new in fiction, the power of love, on the first sight of a woman, to vivify a soul utterly ignorant of the passion. Charles, the Elder Brother, much unlike the Cymon of Dryden, is absorbed in study; a mere scholar without a thought beyond his books. His indifference, perhaps, and ignorance about the world are rather exaggerated and border on stunidity; but it was the custom of the dramatists in that age to produce effect in representation by very sudden developments, if not changes, of character. The other persons are not ill conceived; the honest testy Miramont, who admires learning without much more of it than enables him to sign his name, the two selfish worldly fathers of Charles and Angelina, believing themselves shrewd, yet the easy dupes of coxcomb manners from the court, the spirited Angelina, the spoiled but not worthless Eustace, show Fletcher's great talent in dramatic invention. In none of his mere comedies has he sustained so uniformly elegant and pleasing a style of poetry; the language of Charles is naturally that of a refined scholar, but now and then, perhaps, we find old Miramont talk above himself. The underplot hits to the life the licentious endeavours of an old man to seduce his inferior; but, as usual, it reveals vice too broadly. This comedy is of very simple construction, so that Cabber was obliged to blend it with another, The Custom of the Country, in order to compose from the two his Love Makes a Man, by no means the worst play of that age. The two plots, however, do not harmonise very well.

The Spanish Curate is in all probability taken from the Spanish one of those comedies of intrigue which the fame of Lope de Vega had made popular in Europe. It is one of the best specimens of that manner; the plot is full of incident and interest, without being difficult of comprehension, nor, with fair allowance for the conventions of the stage and manners of the country, improbable. The characters are in full relief without caricature. Fletcher, with an artifice of which he is very fond, has made the fierce resentment of Violante break out unexpectedly from the calmness she had shown in the first scenes; but it is so well accounted for, that we see nothing unnatural in the development of passions for which there had been no previous call. Ascanio is again one of Fletcher's favourite delineations; a kind of Bellario in his modest, affectionate disposition; one, in whose prosperity the reader takes so much pleasure that he forgets it is, in a worldly sense, inconsistent with that of the honest-hearted Don Jamie. The doting husband, Don Henrique, contrasts well with the jealous Bartolus; and both afford by their fate the sort of moral which is looked for in comedy. The underplot of the lawyer and his wife, while it shows how licentious in principle as well as indecent in language the stage had become, is conducted with incomparable humour and amusement. Congreye borrowed part of this in the Old Bachelor without by any means equalling it. Upon the whole, as a comedy of this class, it deserves to be placed in the highest rank.

69. The Custom of the Country is much deformed by obscenity, especially the first act. But it is full of nobleness in character and sentiment, of interesting to of the country, situations, of unceasing variety of action. Fletcher has never shown what he so much delights in drawing, the contrast of virtuous dignity with ungoverned passion in woman, with more success than in Zenocia and Hippolyta. Of these three plays we may say, perhaps, that there is more poetry in the Elder Brother, more interest in the Custom of the Country, more wit and spirit in the Spanish Curate.

70. The Loyal Subject ought also to be placed in a high rank among the works of Beaumont and Fletcher. The Loyal There is a play by Heywood, The Royal King and Subject, from which the general idea of several circumstances of this have been taken. That Heywood's was the original, though the only edition of it is in 1637, while the Loyal Subject was represented in 1615, cannot bear a doubt. The former is expressly mentioned in the epilogue as an old play, belonging to a style gone out of date, and not to be judged with rigour. Heywood has therefore the praise of having conceived the character of Earl Marshal, upon which Fletcher somewhat improved in Archas; a brave soldier of that disinterested and devoted loyalty, which bears all ingratitude and outrage at the hands of an unworthy and misguided sovereign. In the days of James there could be no more courtly moral. In each play the prince, after depriving his most deserving subject of honours and fortune, tries his fidelity by commanding him to send two daughters, whom he had educated in seclusion, to the court, with designs that the father may easily suspect. The loyalty, however, of these honest soldiers, like the hospitality of Lot, submits to encounter this danger; and the conduct of the young ladies soon proves that they might be trusted in the fiery trial. In the Loyal Subject, Fletcher has beautifully, and with his light touch of pencil, sketched the two virtuous sisters; one highspirited, intrepid, undisguised, the other shrinking with maiden modesty, a tremulous dew-drop in the cup of a violet. But unfortunately his original taint betrays itself, and the elder sister cannot display her scorn of licentiousness without borrowing some of its language. If Shakspeare had put these loose images into the mouth of Isabella, how differently we should have esteemed her character!

71. We find in the Loyal Subject what is neither pleasing nor probable, the disguise of a youth as a girl. This was of course not offensive to those who saw nothing else on the stage. Fletcher did not take this from Heywood. In the whole management of the story he is much superior; the nobleness of Archas and his injuries are still more displayed than those of the Earl Marshal; and he has several new characters, especially Theodore, the impetuous son of the Loyal Subject, who does not brook the insults of a prince as submissively as his father, which fill the play with variety and spirit. The language is in some places obscure and probably corrupt, but abounding with that kind of poetry which belongs to Fietcher.

72. Beggar's Bush is an excellent comedy; the serious parts interesting, the comic diverting. Every character supports itself well: if some parts of the plut have been suggested by As you Like It, they are managed so as to be original in spirit. Few of Fletcher's plays furnish more proofs of his characteristic qualities. It might be represented with no great curtailment.

73. The Scornful Lady is one of those comedies which exhibit English domestic life, and have therefore a value independent of their dramatic merit. It does not equal Beggar's Bush, but is full of effective scenes, which, when less regard was paid to decency, must have rendered it a popular play. Fletcher, in fact, is as much superior to Shakspeare in his knowledge of the stage, as he falls below him in that of human nature. His fertile invention was turned to the management of his plot (always with a view to representation), the rapid succession of incidents, the surprises and embarrassments which keep the spectator's attention alive. His characters are but vehicles to the story; they are distinguished, for the most part, by little more than the slight peculiarities of manner, which are easily caught by the audience; and we do not often meet, especially in his comedies, with the claborate delineations of Jonson, or the marked idiosyncracies of Shakspeare. Of these his great predecessors, one formed a deliberate conception of a character, whether taken from general nature or from manners, and drew his figure, as it were, in his mind before he transferred it to the canvas; with the other the idea sprang out of the depths of his soul, and though suggested by the story he had chosen, became so much the favourite of his genius as he wrote, that in its development he sometimes grew negligent of his plot.

74. No tragedy of Fletcher would deserve higher praise than Valentinian, if he had not, by an inconceivable want of taste and judgment, descended from beauty and dignity to the most preposterous absurdities. The matron purity of the injured Lucina, the ravages of unrestrained selfindulgence on a mind not wholly without glimpses of virtue in Valentinian, the vileness of his courtiers, the spirited contrast of unconquerable loyalty in Altius with the natural indignation at wrong in Maximus, are brought before our eyes in some of Fletcher's best poetry, though in a text that seems even more corrupt than usual. But after the admirable scene in the third act, where Lucina (the Lucretia of this story) reyeals her injury, perhaps almost the only scene in this dramatist, if we except the Maid's Tragedy, that can move us to tears, her husband Maximus, who even here begins to forfeit our sympathy by his ready consent, in the Spanish style of perverted honour, to her suicide, becomes a treacherous and ambitious villain; the loyalty of Ætius turns to downright folly, and the rest of the play is but such a series of murders as Marston or the author of Andronicus might have devised. If Fletcher meant, which he very probably did, to inculcate as a moral, that the worst of tyrants are to be obeyed with unflinching submission, he may have gained applause at court, at the expense of his reputation with posterity.

75. The Two Noble Kinsmen is a play that has been honoured by a tradition of Shakspeare's concern in

The Ton Noble Kins. it. The evidence as to this is the title-page of the first edition; which, though it may seem much at first sight, is next to nothing in our old drama, full of misnomers of this kind. The editors of Beaumont and Fletcher have insisted upon what they take for marks of Shakspeare's style; and Schlegel, after " seeing no reason for doubting so probable an opinion," detects the spirit of Shakspeare in a certain ideal purity which distinguishes this from other plays of Fletcher, and in the conscientious fidelity with which it follows the Knight's Tale in Chaucer. The Two Noble Kinsmen has much of that elevated sense of honour, friendship, fidelity, and love, which belongs, I think, more characteristically to Fletcher, who had drunk at the fountain of Castilian romance, than to one, in whose vast mind this conventional morality of particular classes was subordinated to the universal nature of man. In this sense Fletcher is always, in his tragic compositions, a very ideal poet. The subject itself is fitter for him than for Shakspeare. In the language and conduct of this play, with great deference to better and more attentive critics, I see imitations of Shakspeare rather than such resemblances as denote his powerful stamp. The madness of the gaoler's daughter, where some have imagined they saw the master-hand, is doubtless suggested by that of Ophelia, but with an inferiority of taste and feeling, which it seems impossible not to recognise. The painful and degrading symptom of female insanity, which Shakspeare has touched with his gentle hand, is dwelt upon by Fletcher with all his inpute impurity. Can any one believe that the former would have written the last scene in which the gaoler's daughter appears on the stage? Schlegel has too fine taste to believe that this character came from Shakspeare, and it is given up by the latest assertor of his claim to a participation in the play.

76. The Faithful Shepherdess, deservedly among the most celebrated productions of Fletcher, stands alone in its The Fatural class, and admits of no comparison with any other Shepberdess. play. It is a pastoral drama, in imitation of the Pastor Fido. at that time very popular in England. The Faithful Shepherdess, however, to the great indignation of all the poets, did not succeed on its first representation. There is nothing in this surprising; the tone of pastoral is too far removed from the possibilities of life for a stage which appealed, like ours, to the boisterous sympathies of a general audience. It is a play very characteristic of Fletcher, being a mixture of tenderness, purity, indecency, and absurdity. There is some justice in Schlegel's remark, that it is an immodest eulogy on modesty. But this critic, who does not seem to appreciate the beauty of Fletcher's poetry, should hardly have mentioned Guarini as a model whom he might have followed. It was by copying the Corisca of the Pastor Fido that Fletcher introduced the character of the vicious shepherdess Cloe; though, according to his times, and, we must own, to his disposition, he has greatly aggravated the faults to which just exception has been taken in his original,

77. It is impossible to withhold our praise from the poetical beauties of this pastoral drama. Every one knows that it contains the germ of Comus; the benevolent Satyr, whose last proposition to "stray in the middle air, and stay the between the two. But we might wish to have seen this displayed in longer extracts than such as the author of this Letter has generally given os. It widifficult to say of a man like Fletcher that he could not have written single lines in the spirit of his predecessor. A few instances, however, of lengte passages will be found, and I believe that it is a subject upon which there will long be a difference of opinion—[Coloridge has said, "I have no doubt whitever that the first act, and the first scane of the second act, of the Two Noble Kimmen, are Shakspeare's." Table Talk, vol. 119,—1842.]

The author of a "Letter on Shakspeare's Authorship of the Drama, entritied the I'wo Noble Ki micei," Edinburgh, 1844, notwithstanding this title, does not deny a considerable participation to Fletchar. He lays no great stress on the external evalence. But in arguing from the similarity of style in many passages to that of Shakspeare, the author. Mr Spidding of Edinburgh, shows so much take sed we competent a knowledge of the two competent a knowledge of the two commissis, that I should perhaps scrupte to set up my own doubte in opposition. His chief proofs are drawn from the force and condensation of language in particular passages, which doubtless is one of the great distructions sailing rack, or nimbly take hold of the moon," is not much in the character of these sylvans, has been judiciously metamorphosed by Milton to an attendant spirit; and a more austere, as well as more uniform language has been given to the speakers. But Milton has borrowed largely from the imagination of his predecessor; and by quoting the lyric parts of the Faithful Shepherdess, it would be easy to deceive any one not accurately familiar with the songs of Comus. They abound with that rapid succession of ideal scenery, that darting of the poet's fancy from earth to heaven, those picturesque and novel metaphors, which distinguish much of the poetry of this age, and which are ultimately, perhaps, in great measure referrible to Shakspeare.

78. Rule a Wife and Have a Wife is among the superior comedies of its class. That it has a prototype on the Spanish theatre must appear likely; but I should be surprised if the variety and spirit of character, the vivacity of humour, be not chiefly due to our own authors. Every personage in this comedy is drawn with a vigorous pencil; so that it requires a good company to be well represented. It is indeed a mere picture of roguery; for even Leon, the only character for whom we can feel any sort of interest, has gained his ends by stratagem; but his gallant spirit redeems this in our indulgent views of dramatic morality, and we are justly pleased with the discomfiture of fraud and effrontery in Estifania and Margarita.

79. The Knight of the Burning Pestle is very diverting, and some other more successful, perhaps, than any previous attempt to introduce a drama within a drama. I should hardly except the Induction to the Taming of a Shrew. The burlesque, though very ludicrous, does not transgress all bounds of probability. The Wild-goose Chase, The Chances, The Humorous Lieutenant, Women Pleased, Wit without Money, Monsieur Thomas, and several other comedies, deserve to be praised for the usual excellencies of Fletcher, his gaiety, his invention, his ever-varying rapidity of dialogue and incident. None are without his defects; and we may add, what is not in fairness to be called a defect of his, since it applies perhaps to every dramatic writer except Shakspeare and Moliere, that being cast as it were in a common mould.

we find both a monotony in reading several of these plays, and a difficulty of distinguishing them in remembrance.

80. The later writers, those especially after the Restoration, did not fail to appropriate many of the inventions of Fletcher. He and his colleague are the proper founders of our comedy of intrigue, which prevailed through the seventeenth century, the comedy of Wycherley, Dryden, Behn, and Shadwell. Their manuer, if not their actual plots, may still be observed in many pieces that are produced on our stage. But few of those imitators came up to the sprightliness of their model. It is to be regretted that it is rarely practicable to adapt any one of his comedies to representation without such changes as destroy their original raciness, and dilute the geniality of their wit.

81. There has not been much curiosity to investigate the sources of his humorous plays. A few are historical; but it seems highly probable that the Spanish Pickher's stage of Lope de Vega and his contemporaries often furnished the subject, and perhaps many of the scenes, to his comedies. These possess all the characteristics ascribed to the comedies of intrigue so popular in that country. The scene too is more commonly laid in Spain, and the costume of Spanish manners and sentiments more closely observed, than we should expect from the invention of Englishmen. It would be worth the leisure of some lover of theatrical literature to search the collection of Lope de Vega's works, and, if possible, the other Spanish writers at the beginning of the century, in order to trace the footsteps of our two dramatists. Sometimes they may have had recourse to novels. The Little French Lawver seems to indicate such an origin. Nothing had as yet been produced, I believe, on the French stage from which it could have been derived, but the story and most of the characters are manifestly of French derivation. The comic humour of La Writ in this play we may ascribe to the invention of Fletcher himself.*

which he mentions are little in the style Spann's Curate, the Chances, and Rule of tovels. But the Little French Lawyer a Wife and Have a Wife, among those has all the appearance of coming from which he supposes to be drawn from French movel, the scene lies in France, Spanish morels. Essay on Drametic and I see nothing Spanish about it. Pectry, p. 204. By exacts we should Dryden was seldom well-informed about probably understand plays, for those the early stage.

^{*} Dryden reckens the play with the

82. It is, however, not improbable that the entire plot was Defects of sometimes original. Fertile as their invention was, to an extraordinary degree, in furnishing the incidents of their rapid and animated comedies, we may believe the fable itself to have sometimes sprung from no other source. It seems, indeed, now and then, as if the authors had gone forward with no very clear determination of their catastrophe; there is a want of unity in the conception, a want of consistency in the characters, which appear sometimes rather intended to surprise by incongruity, than framed upon a definite model. That of Ruy Diaz in the Island Princess, of whom it is hard to say whether he is a brave man or a coward, or alternately one and the other, is an instance to which many more might easily be added. In the Bloody Brother, Rollo sends to execution one of his counsellors, whose daughter Edith vainly interferes in a scene of great pathos and effect. In the progress of the drama she arms herself to take away the tyrant's life; the whole of her character has been consistent and energetic; when Fletcher, to the reader's astonishment, thinks fit to imitate the scene between Richard and Lady Anne; and the ignominious fickleness of that lady, whom Shakspeare with wonderful skill, but in a manner not quite pleasing, sacrifices to the better display of the cunning crook-back, is here transferred to the heroine of the play, and the very character upon whom its interest ought to depend. Edith is on the point of giving up her purpose, when some others in the conspiracy coming in, she recovers herself enough to exhort them to strike the blow.

83. The sentiments and style of Fletcher, where not concealed by obscurity, or corruption of the text, are Their sentreeste and very dramatic. We cannot deny that the depths of Shakspeare's mind were often unfathomable by an audience; the bow was drawn by a matchless hand, but the shaft went out of sight. All might listen to Fletcher's

. Rotrou, in his Wenceslas, as we different view of their contentions with have already observed, has done some men. But lionesses are become very thing of the same kind; it may have good painters, and it is but through been means as an ungenerous and ca-luminous attack on the constance of the female sex. If hous were painters, the old fable says, they would exhibit a very pleasing, though not profound or vigorous, language; his thoughts are noble, and tinged with the ideality of romance, his metaphors vivid, though sometimes too forced; he possesses the idiom of English without much pedantry, though in many passages he strains it beyond common use; his versification, though studiously irregular, is often rhythmical and sweet. Yet we are seldom arrested by striking beauties; good lines occur in every page, fine ones but rarely; we lay down the volume with a sense of admiration of what we have read, but little of it remains distinctly in the memory. Fletcher is not much quoted, and has not even afforded copious materials to those who call the beauties of ancient lore.

84. In variety of character there can be no comparison between Fletcher and Shakspeare. A few types Their the. return upon us in the former; an old general, proud of his wars, faithful and passionate, a voluptuous and arbitrary king (for his principles of obedience do not seem to have inspired him with much confidence in royal virtues), a supple courtier, a high-spirited youth, or one more gentle in manners but not less stout in action, a lady, fierce and not always very modest in her chastity, repelling the solicitations of licentiousness, another impudently vicious, form the usual pictures for his canvas. Add to these, for the lighter comedy, an amorous old man, a gay spendthrift, and a few more of the staple characters of the stage, and we have the materials of Fletcher's dramatic world. It must be remembered that we compare him only with Shakspeare, and that as few dramatists have been more copious than Fletcher, few have been so much called upon for inventions, in which the custom of the theatre has not exacted much originality. The great fertility of his mind in new combinations of circumstance gives as much appearance of novelty to the personages themselves as an unreflecting audience requires. In works of fiction, even those which are read in the closet, this variation of the mere dress of a character is generally found sufficient for the public.

85. The tragedies of Beaumont and Fletcher, by which our ancestors seem to have meant only plays where-the spectator would wish to keep alive, dies on the stage, are not very numerous, but in them we have as copious an effusion of blood as any contemporary dramas supply. The conclusion indeed of these, and of the tragi-comedies, which form a larger class, is generally mismanaged. A propensity to take the audience by surprise leads often to an unnatural and unsatisfactory catastrophe; it seems their aim to disappoint common expectation, to baffle reasonable conjecture, to mock natural sympathy. This is frequently the practice of our modern novelists, who find no better resource in the poverty of their invention to gratify the jaded palate of the world.

86. The comic talents of these authors far exceeded their skill in tragedy. In comedy they founded a new referior to their come. dies. school, at least in England, the vestiges of which are still to be traced in our theatre. Their plays are at once distinguishable from those of their contemporaries by the regard to dramatic effect which influenced the writers' imagination. Though not personally connected with the stage, they had its picture ever before their eyes. Hence their incidents are numerous and striking, their characters sometimes slightly sketched, not drawn like those of Jonson, from a preconceived design, but preserving that degree of individual distinctness which a common audience requires, and often highly humorous without extravagance; their language brilliant with wit, their measure, though they do not make great use of prose, very lax and rapid, running frequently to lines of thirteen and fourteen syllables. Few of their comedies are without a mixture of grave sentiments or elevated characters; and though there is much to condemn in their indecency and even licentiousness of principle, they never descend to the coarse bufloonery not unfrequent in their age. Never were dramatic poets more thoroughly gentlemen, according to the standard of their times; and, when we consider the court of James I., we may say that they were above that standard.

and quickness of w.t in reporters, no poet before it cm could point as they have done. Humour, which Ben Jonson derived from particular persons, they made it not their bestieve to describe, they represented all the pusions very lively, but

^{} Their plots were generally more regular than Shakspeares especially those which were made before Brandmarted the conversation of gentlemen much better; whose wild debutcheries,

87. The best of Fletcher's characters are female; he wanted that large sweep of reflection and experience They female which is required for the greater diversity of the character other sex. None of his women delight us like Imogen and Desdemona; but he has many Imogens and Desdemonas of a fainter type. Spacelia, Zenocia, Celia, Aspasia, Evanthe, Lucina, Ordella, Oriana, present the picture that cannot be greatly varied without departing from its essence, but which never can be repeated too often to please us, of faithful, tender, self-denying female love, superior to every thing but virtue. Nor is he less successful, generally, in the contrast of minds stained by guilty passion, though in this he sometimes exaggerates the outline till it borders on caricature. vain to seek in Fletcher the strong conceptions of Shakspeare, the Sbylocks, the Lears, the Othellos. Schlegel has well said that " scarce any thing has been wanting to give a place to Beaumont and Fletcher among the great dramatists of Europe, but more of seriousness and depth, and the regulating judgment which prescribes the due limits in every part of composition." It was for want of the former qualities that they conceive nothing in tragedy very forcibly; for want of the latter that they spoil their first conception by extravagance and incongruity.

above all, love. I am apt to believe the English language in them arrived to its big ast perfection, what words have once there in, ore rather superfluous than ornamental. Their plays are now the most pleasant and frequent entertainments of the stage, two of theirs being acted through the year for one of Shakspeare's or Jonson's, the recomm is, because there is a certain gavety in their considers, and pather in their more serious plays, which onts generally with all mov's humours. Shakspeare's language is likewise a little obsolete, and Jonson's wit fals short of theirs." Dryden, p. 101.

den, p. 101.

"Nekspeare," says Dryden, "write-better between man und man, Fletcher betweet man und woman, consequently the one described fracialship better, the other love, yet Shakspeare taught Fletcher to write love, and Juliet and Desdemons are original. It is true the scholar had the softest soul, but the master had the kinder. . . . Shakspeare had an universal mind, which comprehended all characters and passions, lifet, cher a more confoed and limited; for though he treated lave in perfection, yet honour, ambition, revenge, and generally all the stronger passions, he either touched not, or not masterly. To conclude all, he was a limb of Shakspeare." p. 301. This comparison is rather generally than strailly just, as is often the case with the criticisms of Dryden. That Florisher wrote little than Shakspeare." between man and woman," or in displaying love, will be granted when he shall be shown to have case led Feethmand and Myranda, or Posthumus and Imagen. And, on the other hand, it is unjust to deny him credit for having sometimes touched the stronger emotions, especially honour and ambition, with great skill, though much inferior to that of Shakspeare.

88. The reputation of Beaumont and Fletcher was at its height, and most of their plays had been given to the stage, when a worthy inheritor of their mantle appeared in Philip Massinger. Of his extant dramas the Virgin Martyr, published in 1622, seems to be the earliest; but we have reason to believe that several are lost; and even this tragedy may have been represented some years before. The far greater part of his remaining pieces followed within ten years; the Bashful Lover, which is the latest now known, was written in 1636. Massinger was a gentleman, but in the service, according to the language of those times, of the Pembroke family; his education was at the university, his acquaintance both with books and with the manners of the court is familiar, his style and sentiments are altogether those of a man polished by intercourse of good society.

89. Neither in his own age nor in modern times does Massinger seem to have been put on a level with Fletcher or Jonson. Several of his plays, as has been just observed, are said to have perished in manuscript; few were represented after the restoration; and it is only in consequence of his having met with more than one editor, who has published his collected works in a convenient form, that he is become tolerably familiar to the general reader. He is, however, far more intelligible than Fletcher; his text has not given so much embarrassment from corruption, and his general style is as perspicuous as we ever find it in the dramatic poets of that age. The obscure passages in Massinger, after the care that Gifford has taken, are by no means frequent.

90. Five of his sixteen plays are tragedies, that is, are concluded in death; of the rest, no one belongs to the class of mere comedy, but by the depth of the interest, the danger of the virtuous, or the atrocity of the vicious characters, as well as the elevation of the general style, must be ranked with the serious drama, or as it was commonly termed, tragi-comedy. A shade of melancholy tinges the writings of Massinger; but he sacrifices less than his contemporaries to the public taste for superfluous bloodshed on the stage. In several of his plays, such as the Picture, or the Renegado, where it would have been easy to determine the catastrophe towards tragedy, he has preferred to break the clouds with the radiance of a setting sun. He consulted in this his own genius, not eminently pathetic, nor energetic enough to display the utmost intensity of emotion, but abounding in sweetness and dignity, apt to delineate the loveliness of virtue, and to delight in its recompence after trial. It has been surmised that the religion of Massinger was that of the church of Rome; a conjecture not improbable, though, considering the ascetic and imaginative piety, which then prevailed in that of England, we need not absolutely go so far for his turn of thought in the Virgin Martyr or the Renegado.

91. The most striking excellence of this poet is his conception of character; and in this I must incline to place him above Fletcher, and, if I may venture to the dotters of say it, even above Jonson. He is free from the hard outline of the one and the negligent looseness of the other. He has indeed no great variety, and sometimes repeats, with such bare modifications as the story demands, the type of his first design. Thus the extravagance of conjugal affection is pourtrayed, feeble in Theodosius, frantic in Domitian, selfish in Sforza, suspicious in Mathias; and the same impulses of doting love return upon us in the guilty eulogies of Mallefort on his daughter. The vindictive hypocrisy of Montreville in the Unnatural Combat has nearly its counterpart in that of Francesco in the Duke of Milan, and is again displayed with more striking success in Luke. This last villain, indeed, and that original, masterly, inimitable conception, Sir Giles Overreach, are sufficient to establish the rank of Massinger in this great province of dramatic art. But his own disposition led him more willingly to pictures of moral A peculiar refinement, a mixture of gentleness and benignity with noble daring, belong to some of his favourite characters, to Pisander in the Bondman, to Antonio in A Very Woman, to Charolois in the Fatal Dowry. It may be readily supposed that his female characters are not wanting in these graces. It seems to me that he has more variety in his women than in the other sex, and that they are less mannered than the heroines of Fletcher. A slight degree of error or passion in Sophia, Eudocia, Marcelia, without weakening our sympathy, serves both to prevent the monotony of perpetual rectitude, so often insipid in fiction, and to bring forward the development of the story.

1 2

92. The subjects chosen by Massinger are sometimes historical, but others seem to have been taken from Itasubjects. French or Italian novels, and those so obscure, that his editor Gifford, a man of much reading and industry, has seldom traced them. This indeed was an usual practice of our ancient dramatists. Their works have consequently a romantic character, presenting as little of the regular Plautine comedy as of the Greek forms of tragedy. They are merely novels in action, following probably their models with no great variation, except the lower and lighter episodes which it was always more or less necessary to combine with the story. It is from this choice of subjects, perhaps, as much as from the peculiar temper of the poets, that love is the predominant affection of the mind which they display; not cold and conventional, as we commonly find it on the French stage, but sometimes, as the novelists of the South were prone to delineate its emotions, fiery, irresistible, and almost resembling the fatalism of ancient tragedy; sometimes a subdued captive at the chariot-wheels of honour or religion. The range of human passion is consequently far less extensive than in Shakspeare; but the variety of circumstance, and the modifications of the paramount affection itself, compensated for this deliciency.

93. Next to the grace and dignity of sentiment in Masname of singer, we must praise those qualities in his style. Every modern critic has been struck by the peculiar beauty of his language. In his harmonious swell of numbers, in his pure and genuine idiom, which a text, by good fortune and the diligence of its last editor, far less corrupt than that of Fletcher, enables us to enjoy, we find an unceasing charm. The poetical talents of Massinger were very considerable, his taste superior to that of his contemporaries; the colouring of his imagery is rarely overcharged; a certain redundancy, as some may account it, gives fulness, or what the painters call impasto, to his style, and if it might not always conduce to effect on the stage, is on the whole suitable to the character of his composition.

^{* [}I quote the following criticism from to it. - "The styles of Massinger's plays Coloridge, without thoroughly assenting and the Samion Agonists are the two

94. The comic powers of this writer are not on a level with the serious; with some degree of humorous Intercently conception he is too apt to aim at exciting ridicule of his counter posses. by caricature, and his dialogue wants altogether the sparkling wit of Shakspeare and Fletcher. Whether from a consciousness of this defect, or from an unhappy compliance with the viciousness of the age, no writer is more contaminated by gross indecency. It belongs indeed chiefly, not perhaps exclusively, to the characters he would render odious; but upon them he has bestowed this flower of our early theatre with no sparing hand. Few, it must be said, of his plays are incapable of representation merely on this account, and the offence is therefore more incurable in

95. Among the tragedies of Massinger, I should incline to prefer the Duke of Milan. The plot horrows some of his enough from history to give it dignity, and to counterbalance in some measure the predominance of the passion of love which the invented parts of the drama exhibit. The characters of Sforza, Marcelia, and Francesco, are in Massinger's best manner; the story is skilfully and not improbably developed; the pathos is deeper than we generally find in his writings; the eloquence of language, especially in the celebrated speech of Sforza before the emperor, has never been surpassed by him. Many, however, place the Fatal Dowry still higher. This tragedy furnished Rowe with the story of his Fair Penitent. The superiority of the original, except in suitableness for representation, has long been acknowledged. In the Unnatural Combat, probably among the earliest of Massinger's works, we find a greater energy, a bolder strain of figurative poetry, more command of terror and perhaps of pity, than in any other of his dramas. But the dark shadows of crime and misery which overspread this tragedy belong to rather an earlier period of the English stage than that of Massinger, and were not congenial to his temper.

extremes of the are within which the distingue probable, in diction of dramatic portry may oscillate. Massinger the style ordifferenced, but differenced in the smallest degree possible, from animated consersation by the vein distance; yet something of it is preserved. ——1842)

In the Virgin Martyr, he has followed the Spanish model of religious Autos, with many graces of language and a beautiful display of Christian heroism in Dorothea; but the tragedy is in many respects unpleasing.

96. The Picture, The Bondman, and A Very Woman, may be reckoned among the occurrence may be reckoned among the occurrence dies of Massinger. But the general merits as well will be and the differmay be reckoned among the best of the tragi-comeas defects of this writer are perceptible in all; and the difference between these and the rest is not such as to be apparent to every reader. Two others are distinguishable as more English than the rest; the scene lies at home, and in the age; and to these the common voice has assigned a superiority. They are A New Way to Pay Old Debts, and The City Madam. A character drawn, as it appears from reality, and though darkly wicked, not beyond the province of the higher comedy, Sir Giles Overreach, gives the former drama a striking originality and an impressive vigour. It retains, alone among the productions of Mussinger, a place on the stage. Gifford inclines to prefer the City Madam; which, no doubt, by the masterly delineation of Luke, a villain of a different order from Overreach, and a larger portion of comic humour and satire than is usual with this writer, may dispute the palm. But there seems to be more violent improhability in the conduct of the plot, than in A New Way to Pay Old Debts.

97. Massinger, as a tragic writer, appears to me second only to Shakspeare; in the higher comedy, I can hardly think him inferior to Jonson. In wit and sprightly dialogue, as well as in knowledge of theatrical effect, he falls very much below Fletcher. These, however, are the great names of the English stage. At a considerable distance below Massinger, we may place his contemporary John Ford. In the choice of tragic subjects from obscure fictions which have to us the charm of entire novelty, they resemble each other; but in the conduct of their fable, in the delineation of their characters, each of these poets has his distinguishing excellencies. "I know," says Gifford, "few things more difficult to account for, than the deep and lasting impression made by the more tragic portions of Ford's poetry." He succeeds however pretty well in accounting for it; the situations are awfully interesting, the distress intense, the thoughts and language becoming the expression of deep sorrow. Ford, with none of the moral beauty and elevation of Massinger, has, in a much higher degree, the power over tears; we sympathise even with his vicious characters, with Giovanni and Annabella and Bianca. Love, and love in guilt or sorrow, is almost exclusively the emotion he pourtrays; no heroic passion, no sober dignity, will be found in his tragedies. But he conducts his stories well and without confusion; his scenes are often highly wrought and effective; his characters, with no striking novelty, are well supported; he is seldom extravagant or regardless of probability. The Broken Heart has generally been reckoned his finest tragedy; and if the last act had been better prepared, by bringing the love of Calantha for Ithocles more fully before the reader in the earlier part of the play, there would be very few passages of deeper pathos in our dramatic literature. "The style of Ford," it is said by Gifford, " is altogether original and his Without the majestic march which distinguishes the poetry of Massinger, and with little or none of that light and playful humour which characterises the dialogue of Fletcher, or even of Shirley, he is yet elegant, and easy, and harmonious; and though rarely sublime, yet sufficiently elevated for the most pathetic tones of that passion on whose romantic energies he chiefly delighted to dwell." Yet he censures afterwards Ford's affectation of uncouth phrases, and perplexity of language. Of comic ability this writer does not display one particle. Nothing can be meaner than those portions of his dramas which, in compliance with the prescribed rules of that age, he devotes to the dialogue of servants or buffoons.

98. Shirley is a dramatic writer much inferior to those who have been mentioned, but has acquired some degree of reputation, or at least notoriety of name, in consequence of the new edition of his plays. These are between twenty and thirty in number; some of them, however, written in conjunction with his fellow dramatists. A few of these are tragedies, a few are comedies drawn from English manners; but in the greater part we find the favourite style of that age, the characters foreign and of elevated rank, the interest serious, but not always of buskined dignity, the catastrophe fortunate; all, in short, that has gone under the vague appellation of tragi-comedy. Shirley has no originality, no force in conceiving or delineating character, little of pathos, and less, perhaps, of wit; his dramas produce no deep impression in reading, and of course can leave none in the memory. But his mind was poetical, his better characters, especially females, express pure thoughts in pure language; he is never turned or affected, and seldom obscure; the incidents succeed rapidly, the personages are numerous, and there is a general animation in the scenes, which causes us to read him with some pleasure. No very good play, nor, possibly, any very good scene could be found in Shirley; but he has many lines of considerable beauty. Among his comedies the Gamesters may be reckoned the best. Charles I, is said to have declared that it was "the best play he had seen these seven years;" and it has even been added that the story was of his royal suggestion. It certainly deserves praise both for language and construction of the plot, and it has the advantage of exposing vice to ridicule; but the ladies of that court, the fair forms whom Vandyke has immortalised, must have been very different indeed from their posterity if they could sit it through. The Ball, and also some more among the comedies of Shirley, are so far remarkable and worthy of being read, that they bear witness to a more polished elegance of manners, and a more free intercourse in the higher class, than we find in the comedies of the preceding reign. A queen from France, and that queen Henrietta Maria, was better fitted to give this tone than Anne of Denmark. But it is not from Shirley's pictures that we can draw the most favourable notions of the morals of that age.

between forty and fifty plays are ascribed to him. We have mentioned one of the best in the second volume, ante-dating, perhaps, its appearance by a few years. In the English Traveller he has returned to something like the subject of A Woman Killed with Kindness, but with less success. This play is written in verse, and with that case and perspicuity, seldom rising to passion or figurative poetry, which distinguishes this dramatist. Young Geraldine is a beau-lover whom the writers of this age delighted to pourtray. On the other hand, it is difficult to pronounce whether the lady is a thorough-paced hypocrite in the first acts, or falls from virtue, like Mrs. Frankfort, on the first solicitation of a stranger. In either case the character is unpleasing, and, we may hope, improbable. The underplot of this play is largely borrowed from the Mostellaria of Plautus, and is diverting, though somewhat absurd. Heywood seldom rises to much vigour of poetry; but his dramatic invention is ready, his style is easy, his characters do not trangress the boundaries of nature, and it is not surprising that he was popular in his own age.

100. Webster belongs to the first part of the reign of James. He possessed very considerable powers, and ought to be ranked, I think, the next below Ford. With less of poetic grace than Shirley, he had incomparably more vigour; with less of nature and simplicity than Heywood, he had a more elevated genius, and a bolder pencil. But the deep sorrows and terrors of tragedy were peculiarly his province, "His imagination," says his last editor, "had a fond familiarity with objects of awe and fear. The silence of the sepulchre, the sculptures of marble monnments, the knolling of church bells, the cearments of the corpse, the yew that roots itself in dead men's graves, are the illustrations that most readily present themselves to his imagination." I think this well-written sentence a little onesided, and hardly doing justice to the variety of Webster's power; but in fact he was as deeply tainted as any of his contemporaries with the savage taste of the Italian school, and in the Duchess of Maify, scarcely leaves enough on the stage to bury the dead.

The story is taken from Bandello, and has all that the Diches accumulation of wickedness and horror which the taken from Bandello, and our tragedians as perversely imitated. But the scenes are wrought up with skill, and produce a strong impression. Webster has a superiority in delineating character above many of the old dramatists; he is seldom extravagant beyond the limits of conceivable nature; we find the guilt, or even the atrocity, of human passions, but not that incarnation of evil spirits which some more ordinary dramatists loved to exhibit. In the character of the Duchess of Malfy herself there wants neither originality nor skill of management, and I do not know that any dramatist after Shakspeare would have succeeded better in the difficult scene where she discloses her love to an inferior. There is perhaps a little failure in dignity and delicacy, especially towards the close; but the Duchess of Malfy is not drawn as an Isabella or a Portia; she is a love-sick widow, virtuous and true-hearted, but more intended for our sympathy than our reverence.

102. The White Devil, or Vittoria Corombona, is not much inferior in language and spirit to the Duchess of Malfy; but the plot is more confused, less interesting, and worse conducted. Mr. Dyce, the late editor of Webster, praises the dramatic vigour of the part of Vittoria, but justly differs from Lamb, who speaks of "the innocenceresembling boldness" she displays in the trial scene. It is rather a delineation of desperate guilt, losing in a counterfeited audacity all that could seduce or conciliate the tribunal. Webster's other plays are less striking; in Appius and Virginia he has done perhaps better than any one who has attempted a subject not on the whole very promising for tragedy; several of the scenes are dramatic and effective; the language, as is usually the case with Webster, is written so as to display an actor's talents, and he has followed the received history sufficiently to abstain from any excess of slaughter at the close. Webster is not without comic wit, as well as a power of imagination; his plays have lately met with an editor of taste enough to admire his beauties, and not very over-partial in estimating them.

103. Below Webster we might enumerate a long list of dramatists under the first Stuarts. Marston is a tunid and ranting tragedian, a wholesale dealer in murders and ghosts. Chapman, who assisted Ben Jonson and some others in comedy, deserves but limited praise for his Bussy d'Amboisc. The style in this, and in all his tragedies, is extravagantly hyperbolical; he is not very dramatic, nor has any power of exciting emotion except in those who sympathise with a tumid pride and self-confidence. Yet he has more thinking than many of the old dramatists; and the praise of one of his critics, though strongly worded, is not without some foundation, that we "seldom find richer contemplations on the nature of man and the world." There is also a poetic impetuosity in Chapman, such as has redeemed his translation of Homer, by which we are hurried along. His tragi-comedies, All Fools and The Gentleman Usher, are perhaps superior to his tragedies.* Rowley and Le Tourneur, especially the former, have occasionally good lines, but we cannot say that they were very superior dramatists. Rowley, however, was often in comic partnership with Massinger. Dekker merits a higher rank; he co-operated with Massinger in some of his plays, and manifests in his own some energy of passion and some comic humour. Middleton belongs to this lower class of dramatic writers; his tragedy entitled "Women beware Women" is founded on the story of Bianca Cappello; it is full of action, but the characters are all too vicious to be interesting, and the language does not rise much above mediocrity. In comedy, Middleton deserves more praise. "A Trick to catch the Old One" and several others that bear his name are amusing and spirited. But Middleton wrote chiefly in conjunction with others, and sometimes with Jonson and Massinger.

Chapman is well reviewed and at Review, vol. iv. p. 888., and again in length, in an article of the Retrospective vol. v.

CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF POLITE LITERATURE IN PROSE FROM 1600 to 1650.

SECT. I.

Italian Writers — Boccalini —Grammatical and Critical Works — Gracian — French Writers — Balzac —Voiture — French Academy — Vaugelas — Patru and Le Maistre — Style of English Prose — Earl of Essex — Knolles — Several other English Writers.

1. It would be vain probably to inquire from what general causes we should deduce the decline of taste in Italy. None at least have occurred to my mind. relating to political or social circumstances, upon which we could build more than one of those sophistical theories, which assume a casual relation between any concomitant events. Bad taste, in fact, whether in literature or the arts, is always ready to seize upon the public, being in many cases no more than a pleasure in faults which are really fitted to please us, and of which it can only be said that they hinder or impair the greater pleasure we should derive from beauties. Among these critical sins, none are so dangerous as the display of ingenious and novel thoughts or turns of phrase. For as such enter into the definition of good writing, it seems very difficult to persuade the world that they can ever be the characteristics of bad writing. The metes and bounds of ornament, the fine shades of distinction which regulate a judicious choice, are only learned by an attentive as well as a naturally susceptible mind; and it is no rare case for an unprepared multitude to prefer the worse picture, the worse building, the worse poem, the worse speech to the better. Education, an acquaintance with just criticism, and still more the habitual observation of what is truly beautiful in nature or art, or in the literature of taste, will sometimes generate almost a national tact that rejects the temptations of a meretricious and false style; but experience has shown that this happy state of public feeling will not be very durable. Whatever might be the cause of it, this age of the Italian seicentisti has been reckoned almost as inauspicious to good writing in prose as in verse. "If we except," says Tiraboschi, "the Tuscans and a very few more, never was our language so neglected as in this period. We can scarce bear to read most of the books that were published, so rude and full of barbarisms is their style. Few had any other aim than to exercise their wit in conceits and metaphors; and so long as they could scatter them profusely over their pages, cared nothing for the choice of phrases or the purity of grammar. Their eloquence on public occasions was intended only for admiration and applause, not to persuade, or move." And this, he says, is applicable alike to their Latin and Italian, their sacred and profane barangues. The academical discourses, of which Dati has collected many in his Prose Fiorentine, are poor in comparison with those of the sixteenth.

2. A later writer than Tiraboschi has thought this sentence against the seicentisti a little too severe, and condemning equally with him the bad taste characteristic of that age, endeavours to rescue a few from the general censure. It is at least certain that the insipidity of the cinque cento writers, their long periods void of any but the most trivial meaning, their affectation of the faults of Cicero's manner in their own language, ought not to be overlooked or wholly pardoned, while we dwell on an opposite defect of their successors, the perpetual desire to be novel, brilliant, or profound. These may doubtless be the more offensive of the two; but they are, perhaps, not less likely to be mingled with something really

3. It will not be expected that we can mention many worth reading.

Italian books, after what has been said, which come very precisely within the class of polite literature, or claim any praise on the ground of style. Their greatest luminary, Galileo, wrote with clearness, elegance, and spirit; no one among the moderns had so entirely rejected a dry and technical manner of teaching, and thrown such attractions round the form of truth. Himself a poet, and a critic, he did not hesitate to ascribe his own philosophical perspicuity to the constant perusal of Ariosto. This I have mentioned in another place; but we cannot too much remember that all objects of intellectual pursuit are as bodies acting with reciprocal forces in one system, being all in relation to the faculties of the mind, which is itself but one; and that the most extensive acquaintance with the various provinces of literature will not fail to strengthen our dominion over those we more peculiarly deem our own. The school of Galileo. especially Torricelli and Redi, were not less distinguished than himself for their union of elegance with philosophy.

4. The letters of Bentivoglio are commonly known. This epistolary art was always cultivated by the Italians, first in the Latin tongue, and afterwards in their own. Bentivoglio has written with equal dignity and ease. Galileo's letters are also esteemed on account of their style as well as of what they contain. In what is more peculiarly called eloquence, the Italians of this age are rather emulous of success than successful; the common defects of taste in themselves, and in those who heard or read them, as well as, in most instances, the uninteresting nature of their subjects, exclude them from our notice.

5. Trajan Boccalini was by his disposition inclined to political satire, and possibly to political intrigue; but we have here only to mention the work by which he is best known. Advices from Parnassus (Ragguagh di Parnaso). If the idea of this once popular and celebrated book is not original, which I should rather doubt, though without immediately recognising a similarity to any thing earlier, (Lucian, the common prototype, excepted,) it has at least been an original source. In the general turn of Boccaliui's fictions, and perhaps in a few particular instances, we may sometimes perceive what a much greater man has imitated; they bear a certain resemblance to those of Addison, though the vast superiority of the latter in felicity of execution and variety of invention may almost conceal it. The Ragguagli are a series of despatches from the court of Apollo on Parnassus, where he is surrounded by eminent men of all ages. This fiction becomes in itself very cold and monotonous; yet there is much variety in the subjects of the decisions made by the god with the advice of his counsellors, and some strokes of satire are well hit, though more perhaps fail of But we cannot now catch the force of every passage. Boccalini is full of allusions to his own time, even where the immediate subject seems ancient. This book was published at Venice in 1612; at a time when the ambition of Spain was regarded with jealousy by patriotic Italians, who thought that pacific republic their bulwark and their glory. He inveighs therefore against the military spirit and the profession of war, "necessary sometimes, but so fierce and inhuman that no fine expressions can make it honourable." Nor is he less severe on the vices of kings, nor less ardent in his eulogies of liberty; the government of Venice being reckoned, and not altogether untruly, an asylum of free thought and action in comparison with that of Spain. Aristotle, he reports in one of his despatches, was besieged in his villa on Parnassus by a number of armed men belonging to different princes, who insisted on his retracting the definition he had given of a tyraut, that he was one who governed for his own good and not that of the people, because it would apply to every prince, all reigning for their own good. The philosopher, alarmed by this demand, altered his definition; which was to run thus, that tyrants were certain persons of old time, whose race was now quite extinct.† Boccalini, however, takes care, in general, to mix something of playfulness with his sattre, so that it could not be resented without apparent ill-nature. It seems, indeed, to us free from savective, and rather meant to sting than to wound. But this, if a common rumour be true, did not secure him against a beating of which he died. The style of Boccalini is said by the critics to be clear and fluent, rather than correct or elegant; and he displays the taste of his times by extravagant metaphors. But to foreigners, who regard this less, his Advices from Parnassus, unequal, of course, and occasionally tedious, must appear to contain many ingenious allusions, judicious criticisms, and acute remarks.

6. The Pietra del Paragone by the same author is an odd, and rather awkward, mixture of reality and fiction, all levelled at the court of Spain, and designed to keep alive a jealousy of its ambition. It is a kind of episode or supplement to the Ragguagh di Parnaso, the leading invention being preserved. Boccalini is an interesting writer on account of the light he throws on the history and sentiments of Italy. He is in this work a still bolder writer than in the former; not only censuring Spain without mercy, but even the Venetian aristocracy, observing upon the insolence of the young nobles towards the citizens, though he justitles the senate for not punishing the former more frequently with death by public execution, which would lower the nobility in the eyes of the people. They were, however, he says, as severely punished, when their conduct was bad, by exclusion from offices of trust. The Pietra del Paragone is a kind of political, as the Ragguagli is a critical miscellany.

7. About twenty years after Boccalini, a young man appeared, by name Ferrante Pallavicino, who, with a fame more local and transitory, with less respectability of character, and probably with inferior talents, trod to a certain degree in his steps. As Spain had been the object of satire to the one, so was Rome to the other. Urban VIII., an ambitious pontiff, and vulnerable in several respects, was attacked by an improdent and self-confident enemy, safe, as he imagined, under the shield of Venice. But Pallavicino, having been trepanned into the power of the pope, lost his head at Avignon. None of his writings have fallen in my way; that most celebrated at the time, and not wholly dissimilar in the conception to the Advices from Parnassus, was entitled The Courier Robbed; a series of imaginary letters which such a fiction gave him a pretext for bringing together. Perhaps we may consider Pallayicino as rather a counterpart to Jordano Bruno, in the satirical character of the latter, than to Boecalini. .

8. The Italian language itself, grammatically considered, was still assiduously cultivated. The Academicians of Florence published the first edition of their cele- Decisionary brated Vocabolario della Crusca in 1613. It was avowedly founded on Tuscan principles, setting up the fourteenth century as the Augustan period of the language, which they disdained to call Italian; and though not absolutely excluding the great writers of the sixteenth age whom Tuscany had not produced, giving in general a manifest preference to their own. Italy has rebelled against this tyranny of Florence, as she did, in the Social War, against that of Rome. Her Lombard and Romagnol and Neapolitan writers have claimed the rights of equal citizenship, and fairly won them in the field of literature. The Vocabulary itself was not received as a legislative code. Beni assailed it by his Anti-Crusca the same year; many invidiously published marginal notes to point out the inaccuracies; and in the frequent revisions and enlargements of this dictionary the exclusive character which it affected has, I believe, been nearly lost.

9. Buonmattei, himself a Florentine, was the first who completed an extensive and methodical grammar, Gramma-"developing," says Tiraboschi, "the whole eco- Bookmattel, nomy and system of our language." It was published entire, after some previous impressions of parts, with the title, Della Lingua Toscana, in 1643. This has been reckoned a standard work, both for its authority, and for the clearness, precision, and elegance with which it is written; but it betrays something of an academical and Florentine spirit in the rigour of its grammatical criticism. + Bartoli, a Ferrarese Jesuit, and a man of extensive learning, attacked that dogmatic school, who were accustomed to proscribe common phrases with a Non si può (It cannot be used), in a treatise entitled Il torto ed il diritto del Non si può. His object was to justify many expressions thus authoritatively condemned, by the examples of the best writers. This book was a little later than the middle of the century.

Corniant, viii. 205. Salá, xiv. 46
 Tirabaschi, st. 409. Salá, xiu. 398

¹ Cornism, vii. 259. Sal6, xid, 417.

10. Petrarch had been the idol, in general, of the preceding age; and, above all, he was the peculiar divinity of the Florentines. But this seventeenth century was in the productions of the mind a period of revolutionary innovation; men dared to ask why, as well as what, they ought to worship; and sometimes the same who rebelled against Aristotle, as an infallible guide, were equally contumacious in dealing with the great names of literature. Tassoni published in 1609 his Observations on the poems of Petrarch. They are not written, as we should now think, adversely to one whom be professes to honour above all lyric poets in the world, and though his critical remarks are somewhat minute, they seem hardly unfair. A writer like Petrarch, whose fame has been raised so high by his style, is surely amenable to this severity of examination. The finest sonnets Tassoni generally extols, but gives a preference, on the whole, to the odes; which, even if an erroneous judgment, cannot be called unfair upon the author of both. He produces many parallel passages from the Latin poems of Petrarch himself, as well as from the ancients and from the earlier Italians and Provencals. The manner of Tassoni is often humorous, original, intrepid, satirical on his own times; he was a man of real taste, and no servile worshipper of names.

They are written with severity and sometimes an Galleo's insulting tone towards the great poet, passing over generally the most beautiful verses, though he sometimes bestows praise. The object is to point out the imitassome riority. The Observations on the Art of Writing by Sforza Pallavicino, the historian of the council of Trent, published at Rome, 1646, is a work of general criticism containing many good remarks. What he says of imitation is worthy of being compared with Hurd; though he will be found not to have analysed the subject with any thing like so much acuteness, nor was this to be expected in his age.

Tutte le rime, tutti i versi in genequelle, che poeta grande e famoso lo rale del Petrarea lo feerro poeta, ma lo feerro, p. 46.
 canzoni, per quanto a mi ne pare, furono

Pallavicino has an ingenious remark, that elegance of style is produced by short metaphors, or metaforette as he calls them. which give us a more lively apprehension of an object than its proper name. This seems to mean only single words in a figurative sense, as opposed to phrases of the same kind. He writes in a pleasing manner, and is an accomplished critic without pedantry. Salfi has given rather a long analysis of this treatise. The same writer, treading in the steps of Corniani, has extolled some Italian critics of this period, whose writings I have never seen; Beni, author of a prolix commentary in Latin on the poetics of Aristotle; Peregrino, not inferior, perhaps, to Pallavicino, though less known, whose theories are just and deep, but not expressed with sufficient perspicuity; and Fioretti, who assumed the fictitious name of Udeno Nisieli, and presided over an academy at Florence denominated the Apatisti. The Progymnasmi Poetici of this writer, if we may believe Salfi, ascend to that higher theory of criticism which deduces its rules, not from precedents or arbitrary laws, but from the nature of the human mind, and has, in modern times, been distinguished by the name of æsthetic. † 12. In the same class of polite letters as these Italian writings we may place the Prolusiones Academicas Prolusiones of Famianus Strada. They are agreeably written, and bespeak a cultivated taste. The best is the sixth of the second book, containing the imitations of six Latin poets, which Addison has made well known (as I hope) to every reader in the 115th and 119th numbers of the Guardian. is here that all may judge of this happy and graceful fiction; but those who have read the Latin imitations themselves, will perceive that Strada has often caught the tone of the ancients with considerable felicity. Lucan and Ovid are, perhaps, best counterfeited, Virgil not quite so well, and Lucretius worst of the six. The other two are Statius and Claudian, ‡ In almost every instance the subject chosen is appropriated to the characteristic peculiarities of the poet.

13. The style of Gongora which deformed the poetry of

Vol. xii. p. 440.
 † Corp.ani, vu. 156. Salfi, xiii. 425.
 † A writer quoted in Blount's Central of Claudian above the rest, but thinks all excellent.

Spain extended its influence over prose. A writer named Gracian, (it seems to be doubtful which of two Spanish brothers, Lorenzo and Balthazar,) excelled Gongora himself in the affectation, the refinement, the obscurity of his style. "The most voluminous of his works," says Bouterwek, "bears the affected title of El Criticon. It is an allegorical picture of the whole course of human life divided into Crises, that is, sections, according to fixed points of view, and clothed in the formal garb of a pompous romance. It is scarcely possible to open any page of this book without recognising in the author a man who is in many respects far from common, but who from the ambition of being entirely uncommon in thinking and writing studiously and ingeniously, avoids nature and good taste. A profusion of the most ambiguous subtilties expressed in ostentatious language are scattered throughout the work; and these are the more offensive, in consequence of their union with the really grand view of the relationship of man to nature and his Creator, which forms the subject of the treatise. Gracian would have been an excellent writer, had he not so anxiously wished to be an extraordinary one." .

14. The writings of Gracian seem in general to be the quintessence of bad taste. The worst of all, probably, is El Eroe, which is admitted to be almost unintelligible by the number of far-fetched expressions, though there is more than one French translation of it. El politico Fernando, a panegyric on Ferdinand the Catholic, seems as empty as it is affected and artificial. The style of Gracian is always pointed, emphatic, full of that which looks like profundity or novelty, though neither deep nor new. He seems to have written on a maxim he recommends to the man of the world; " if he desires that all should look up to him, let him permit himself to be known, but not to be understood,"† His treatise entitled Agudeza y arte di ingenio is a system of concetti, digested under their different heads, and selected from Latin, Italian, and Spanish writers of that and the preceding age. It is said in the Biographic Universelle that this work, though too metaphysical, is useful in the critical history of literature.

Hut of Spanish Latersture, p. 543.
 pernutam al conocimiento, no à la com quiere que le veneren todos, prebension.

Gracian obtained a certain degree of popularity in France and England.

15. The general taste of French writers in the sixteenth century, as we have seen, was simple and lively, full of sallies of natural wit and a certain archness of observation, but deficient in those higher qualities of language which the study of the ancients had taught men to admire. In public barangues, in pleadings, and in sermons, these characteristics of the French manner were either introduced out of place, or gave way to a tiresome pedantry. Du Vnir was the first who endeavoured to bring in a more elaborate and elevated diction. Nor was this confined to the example be gave. In 1607 he published a treatise on French eloqueuce, and on the causes through which it had remained at so low a point. This work relates chiefly to the eloquence of the bar, or at least that of public speakers, and the causes which he traces are chiefly such as would operate on that kind alone. But some of his observations are applicable to style in the proper sense; and his treatise has been reckoned the first which gave France the rules of good writing, and the desire to practise them. A modern critic who censures the Latinisms of Du Vair's style, admits that his treatise on eloquence makes an epoch in the language.

16. A more distinguished era, however, is dated from 1625, when the letters of Balzac were published. There had indeed been a few intermediate works,

† Neufensteau, preface aux Œurres de Pascal, p. 181

devoient etre suspectes, où il asoit à se défice du tous les mastres et de tous les exempley; et ou il ne pousoit arriver a son but qu'en a clorgerant de tons les chemme battos, ni marcher dans la bonne coute qu'apres se l'être ouverte à los-meme. Il l'a curvete en effet, et pour lui et pour les autres; il y a fait entrer un grand nombre d'heureux gennes, dont il etest le guide et le modèle et si la France soit anjourd'hui que ses écrivains sont plus policiet plus reguliers que ceux d'Espagne et d'Italie, il fant qu'elle en rende l'honneur à ce grand homme, dont la mémoire las doit etre en veneration. . La même obligation que nous avons a M. de Malherbe pour la poésie, nous l'avons a M de Baltac pour la ptine, il lui a present des tornes et des régles ; il lui a donné [.] Gibert, Jugemens des Savans mir les auteurs qui ont traité de la rhétorapar. This work is annexed to some ed from of Badlet. Go get has copied or abridged Gibert, without distinct seknowledgment, and not always carefully promering the work.

[?] The same writer fixes on this as an epoch, and it was generally admitted in the seventeenth century. The editor of Balmes Works in 1865 says, after speaking of the unforced state of the French language, full of provincial dama and incorrect phrases. If de Balanc est venu in ce temps de confusion et de des-ontre, où toutes les lectures qu'il fassoit, et toutes les actions qu'il entendoit lui which contributed, though now little known, to the improvement of the language. Among these the translation of Florus by Coeffeteau was reckoned a masterpiece of French style, and Vaugelas refers more frequently to this than to any other book. The French were very strong in translations from the classical writers; and to this they are certainly much indebted for the purity and correctness which they reached in their own language. These translators, however, could only occupy a secondary place. Balzac himself is hardly read. "The polite world," it was said a hundred years since, charactered to knows nothing now of these works, which were once its delight." But his writings are not formed to delight those, who wish either to be merry or wise, to laugh or to learn; yet he has real excellencies, besides those which may be deemed relative to the age in which he came. His language is polished, his sentiments are just, but sometimes common, the cadence of his periods is harmonious, but too artificial and uniform; on the whole he approaches to the tone of a languid sermon, and leaves a tendency to yawn. But in his time superficial truths were not so much proscribed as at present; the same want of depth belongs to almost all the moralists in Italian and in modern Latin. Balzac is a moralist with a pure heart, and a love of truth and virtue, (somewhat alloyed by the spirit of flattery towards persons, however he may declaim about courts and courtiers in gede la douceur et de la force, il a montré que l'ésoquence doit avair des accords, atosé bien que la must-jue, et il a seu meler ai subrotennent eette diversité de nois et de cadrices, qu'il n'est point du plus délicieux concert que celui de ses parules. C'est en plaçant tous les mots avec tant d'ordre et de justesse qu'il me laisse rien de moi in de faiillu dans son discours, éve. This regard to the cadence of his periods is characteristic of Bolme, it has not, in general, been much praetised in France, notwithstanding some aptendid exceptions, especially in Homerite. Olivet observes, that it was the peculiar glory of Balanc to bave shown the capacity of the language for this rhythm. If sit, do l'Acad, Française, p. 84. But has not Du Vair some claim also? Neukhateau gives a much more hunted culogy of Balanc. Il avoit pris à la lettro les reflections de De Vair sur la trop grande bassesse de notre elo-quence. Il s'en forms une haute idée; man il so trompe d'abord dans l'application, car il porte dinis le style contoluire qui doit etre familier et leger, l'enflare hyperbolique, la pompe, et le nombre, que no convient qu'eux grandes déclamations et aux harangues oratoires . . . C'a defaut de Balzac contribua poutêtre a son succest, car le gout n'était pas forme ; man il se corrigea dans la suite, et en parcontant un recueil on superçoit des progres sensibles qu'il fusoit avec l'agre-Ce recueil si précieux pour l'histeure de notre litterature a ou long temps une ruque extraordinare. Nos plus grands auteurs l'avo ent bien étudie. Molisses lui a empruntó quelques ideas. · Goujet, I. 426.

neral,) a competent erudition and a good deal of observation of the world. In his Aristippe, addressed to Christina, and consequently a late work, he deals much in political precepts and remarks, some of which might be read with advantage. But he was accused of borrowing his thoughts from the aucients, which the author of an Apology for Balzac seems not wholly to deny. This apology indeed had been produced by a book on the Conformity of the eloquence of M. Balzac with that of the ancients.

17. The letters of Balzac are in twenty-seven books; they begin in 1620, and end about 1653; the first portion having appeared in 1625. "He passed all his life," says Vigneul-Marville, "in writing letters, without ever catching the right characteristics of that style." . This demands a peculiar ease and naturalness of expression, for want of which they seem no genuine exponents of friendship or gallantry, and hardly of polite manners. His wit was not free from pedantry, and did not come from him spontaneously. Hence he was little fitted to address ladies, even the Rambouillets; and indeed he had acquired so laboured and artificial a way of writing letters, that even those to his sister, though affectionate, smell too much of the lamp. His advocates admit that they are to be judged rather by the rules of oratorical than epistolary composition.

18. In the moral dissertations, such as that entitled the Prince, this elaborate manner is of course not less discernible, but not so unpleasant or out of place. Balzac has been called the father of the French language, the master and model of the great men who have followed him. But it is confessed by all that he wanted the fine taste to regulate his style according to the subject. Hence he is pompous and inflated upon ordinary topics; and in a country so quick to seize the ridiculous as his own, not all his pobleness, purity, and vigour of style, not the passages of eloquence which we often find, have been sufficient to redeem him from the sarcasms of those who have had more power to amuse. The stateliness had "un talent particulars pour embellir notre langue." The writer whom I quote Mélanges de Lattérature, vol i, under the name of Vignetil-Marville, p. 126. He adds, however, that Balanc which he assumed, was D Argonne, a Benedictine of Rosen.

however, of Balzac is less offensive and extravagant than the affected intensity of language which distinguishes the style of the present age on both sides of the Channel, and which is in fact a much worse modification of the same fault.

19. A contemporary and rival of Balzac, though very unlike in most respects, was Voiture. Both one and the other were received with friendship and admiration in a celebrated society of Paris, the first which, on this side of the Alps, united the aristocracy of rank and of genius in one circle, that of the Hotel Rambouillet. Catherine de Vivonne, widow of the Marquis de Rambouillet, was the owner of this mansion. It was frequented, during the long period of her life, by all that was distinguished in France, by Richelieu and Condé, as much as by Corneille, and a long host of inferior men of letters. The heiress of this family, Julie d'Angennes, beautiful and highly accomplished, became the central star of so bright a galaxy. The love of intellectual attainments, both in mother and daughter, the sympathy and friendship they felt for those who displayed them, as well as their moral worth, must render their names respectable; but these were in some measure sullied by false taste, and what we may consider an habitual affectation even in their conduct. We can scarcely give another name to the caprice of Julia, who, in the fashion of romance, compelled the Duke of Montausier to carry on a twelve years' courtship, and only married him in the decline of her beauty. This patient lover, himself one of the most remarkable men in the court of Louis XIV., had many years before, in 1633, presented her with what has been called The Garland of Julia, a collection to which the poets and wits of Paris had contributed. Every flower, represented in a drawing, had its appropriate little poem, and all conspired to the praise of Julia,*

20. Voiture is chiefly known by his letters; his other writings, at least, are inferior. These begin about 1627, and are addressed to Madame de Rambomllet and to several other persons of both sexes. Though much too laboured and affected, they are evidently the original type of the French epistolary school, including those in England who have formed themselves upon it. Pope very frequently imitated Voiture; Walpole not so much in his general correspondence, but he knew how to fall into it. The object was to say what meant little, with the utmost novelty in the mode, and with the most ingenious compliment to the person addressed; so that he should admire himself, and admire the writer. They are of course very tiresome after a short time; yet their ingenuity is not without merit. Balzac is more solemn and dignified, and it must be owned that he has more meaning. Voiture seems to have fancied that good sense spoils a man of wit. But he has not so much wit as esprit; and his letters serve to exemplify the meaning of that word. Pope, in addressing ladies, was nearly the ape of Voiture. It was unfortunately thought necessary, in such a correspondence, either to affect despairing love, which was to express itself with all possible gaiety, or where love was too presumptuous, as with the Rambouillets, to pour out a torrent of nonsensical flattery, which was to be rendered tolerable by far-fetched turns of thought. Voiture has the honour of having rendered this style fashionable. But if the bad taste of others had not perverted his own, Voiture would have been a good writer, His letters, especially those written from Spain, are sometimes truly witty, and always vivacious. Voltaire, who speaks contemptuously of Voiture, might have been glad to have been the author of some of his jeux d'esprit; that, for example, addressed to the Prince of Condé in the character of a pike, founded on a game where the prince had played that fish. We should remember, also, that Voiture held his place in good society upon the tacit condition that he should always strive to be witty.

^{• [}Two copies were made of the admitted to see either, but as a remark-Gunlande de Julie, but, in the usual able favour. Huet, who tells in this, style of the Hambouilleta, no one was was one. Huetava, p. 104. — 1842]

21. But the Hotel Kambouillet, with its false theories of taste, derived in a great measure from the romances button the of Scudery and Calprenede, and encouraged by the seem to agreeably artificial manner of Voiture, would have Acedemy.

* Nothing, says Olivet, could be more imagination enjoure, qui faisoit prendre opposite than Bilize and Verture. L'un apposite than Bilize and Verture. L'un accourse se penses un air de gallacterie, toujours su debest. L'un aroit une imagnation élèves qui jetoit de la noblesse occasioni incrne stricuses, trouvoit a rire. dans les moundres choses; l'autre, une Hut de l'Académie, p. 83.

produced, in all probability, but a transient effect. A far more important event was the establishment of the French Academy. France was ruled by a great minister, who loved ber glory and his own. This indeed has been common to many statesmen, but it was a more peculiar honour to Richelieu, that he felt the dignity which letters confer on a nation. He was himself not deficient in literary taste; his epistolary style is manly and not without elegance; he wrote theology in his own name, and history in that of Mezeray; but, what is most to the present purpose, his remarkable fondness for the theatre led him not only to invent subjects for other poets, but, as it has been believed, to compose one forgotten tragi-comedy, Mirame, without assistance. * He availed himself, fortunately, of an opportunity which almost every statesman would have disregarded, to found the most illustrious institution in the annals of polite literature.

22. The French Academy sprang from a private society of men of letters at Paris, who, about the year 1629, agreed to meet once a week, as at an ordinary visit, conversing on all subjects, and especially on literature. Such among them as were authors communicated their works, and had the advantage of free and fair criticism. This continued for three or four years with such harmony and mutual satisfaction, that the old men, who remembered this period, says their historian, Pelisson, looked back upon it as a golden age. They were but nine in number, of whom Gombauld and Chapelain are the only names by any means famous, and their meetings were at first very private. More by degrees were added, among others Boisrobert, a favourite of Richelieu, who liked to hear from him the news of the town. The Cardinal, pleased with the account of this society, suggested their public establishment. This, it is said, was unpleasing to every one of them, and some proposed to refuse it; but the consideration that the offers of such a man were not to be slighted overpowered their modesty; and they consented to become a royal institution. They now enlarged their numbers, created officers, and began to keep registers of their proceedings. These records commence on March 13, 1631, and are the basis of Pelisson's history. The name of French Academy was chosen after some deliberation. They were established by letters patent in January, 1635; which the parliament of Paris enregistered with great reluctance, requiring not only a letter from Richelieu, but an express order from the king; and when this was completed in July, 1637, it was with a singular proviso that the Academy should meddle with nothing but the embellishment and improvement of the French language, and such books as might be written by themselves, or by others who should desire their interference. This learned body of lawyers had some jealousy of the innovations of Richelieu; and one of them said it reminded him of the satire of Juvenal, where the senate, after ceasing to bear its part in public affairs, was consulted about the sauce for a turbot.

^{*} Fontenelle, Hist. du Theatre, p. 96.

23. The professed object of the Academy was to purify the language from vulgar, technical, or ignorant usages, and to establish a fixed standard. The and corast-tation Academicians undertook to guard scrupulously the correctness of their own works, examining the arguments, the method, the style, the structure of each particular word. It was proposed by one that they should swear not to use any word which had been rejected by a plurality of votes. They soon began to labour in their vocation, always bringing words to the test of good usage, and deciding accordingly. decisions are recorded in their registers. Their number was fixed by the letters patent at forty, having a director, chancellor, and secretary; the two former changed every two, afterwards every three months, the last chosen for life. They read discourses weekly; which by the titles of some that Pelisson has given us, seem rather trifling and in the style of the Italian Academies; but this practice was soon disused. Their more important and ambitious occupations were to compile a dictionary and a grammar: Chapelam drew up the scheme of the former, in which it was determined, for the sake of brevity, to give no quotations, but to form it from about twenty-six good authors in prose, and twenty in verse. Vaugelas was entrusted with the chief direction of this work.

Pelamon, Hist, de l'Académie Française.

24. The Academy was subjected, in its very infancy, to a severe trial of that literary integrity without which It publishes such an institution can only escape from being peron the Cld. nicious to the republic of letters, by becoming too despicable and odious to produce mischief. On the appearance of the Cid, Richelieu, who had taken up a strong prejudice against it, insisted that the Academy should publish their opinion on this play. The more prudent part of that body were very loth to declare themselves at so early a period of their own existence; but the Cardinal was not apt to take excuses; and a committee of three was appointed to examine the Cid itself and the observations upon it which Scudery had already published. Five months elapsed before the Sentimens de l'Académie Française sur la Tragédie du Cid were made public in November, 1687. These are expressed with much respect for Corneille, and profess to be drawn up with his assent, as well as at the instance of Scudery. It has been not uncommon to treat this criticism as a servile homage to power. But a perusal of it will not lead us to confirm so severe a reproach. The Sentimens de l'Académie are drawn up with great good sense and dignity. The spirit indeed of critical orthodoxy is apparent; yet this was surely pardonable in an age when the violation of rules had as yet produced nothing but such pieces as those of Hardy. It is easy to sneer at Aristotle when we have a Shakspeare; but Aristotle formed his rules on the practice of Sophocles. The Academy could not have done better than by inculcating the soundest maxims of criticism, but they were a little too narrow in their application. The particular judgments which they pass on each scene of the play, as well as those on the style, seem for the most part very just, and such as later critics have generally adopted; so that we can really see little ground for the allegation of undue compliance with the Cardinal's prejudices, except in the frigid tone of their praise, and in their omission to proclaim that a great dramatic genius had arisen in France. † But the date of 1638 et la de catesse de plumeurs de ses pen-† They conclude by saying that in sées, et eet agrament inexplicable qui se spite of the faults of this play, la naïveté mêle dans tous ses défauts lui ont acquis this is so much the common vice or blindness of critics, that it may have sprung less from baseness, than from a fear to compromise their own superiority by vulgar admiration. The Academy had great pretensions, and Corneille was not yet the Corneille of France and of the world.

[·] Pelisson. The printed edition bears et la vebémence de les passions, la force the date of 1638

25. Gibert, Goujet, and other writers enumerate several works on the grammar of the French language in Vancture this period. But they were superseded, and we the trook may almost say that an era was made in the national literature, by the publication of Vaugelas, Rémarques sur la Langue Française, in 1649. Thomas Corneille, who, as well as Patru, published notes on Vaugelas, observes that the language has only been written with politeness since the appearance of these remarks. They were not at first received with general approbation, and some even in later times thought them too scrupulous; but they gradually became of established authority. Vaugelas is always clear, modest, and ingenuous in stating his opinion. His remarks are 547 in number, no gross fault being noticed, nor any one which is not found in good authors. He seldom mentions those whom he censures. His test of correct language is the manner of speaking in use with the best part (la plus saine partie) of the court, conformably with the manner of writing in the best part of contemporary authors. But though we must have recourse to good authors in order to establish an indisputably good usage, yet the court contributes incomparably more than books; the consent of the latter being as it were the seal and confirmation of what is spoken at court, and deciding what is there doubtful. And those who study the best authors get rid of many faults common at court, and acquire a peculiar purity of style. None, however, can dispense with a knowledge of what is reckoned good language at court, since much that is spoken there will il ne la doit pes toute a son bonheur, et la nature but a éte assex aberale pour exouver la festime it che lai a cté prot gue. The Academy justly, in my opinion, dhumanite, &c. p. 49.

un rang considérable entre les poèmes blame Corneille for making Chimène Français de ce genre qui ont le plus consent to marry Rodrigue the same day dound do satrefaction. Se lauteur ne that he had killed her father. Cela surdout pas toute sa repulation a son mérite passe toute sorie de crémice, et ne past vrasemblablement tomber dans lame non scalement done sage fale, man d'une qui sereit le plus depoudé d'honneur et hardly be found in books. In writing it is otherwise, and he admits that the study of good authors will enable us to write well, though we shall write still better by knowing how to speak well. Vaugelas tells us that his knowledge was acquired by long practice at court, and by the conversation of Cardinal Perron and of Coeffetonu.

26. La Mothe le Vayer in his Considérations sur l'EloLA Mothe quence Française, 1647, has endeavoured to steer a in Vayer middle course between the old and the new schools of French style, but with a marked desire to withstand the latter. He blames Du Vair for the strange and barbarous words he employs. He laughs also at the nicety of those who were beginning to object to a number of common French words. One would not use the conjunction Car; against which folly Le Vayer wrote a separate treatise. He defends the use of quotations in a different language, which some purists in French style had in horror. But this treatise seems not to contain much that is valuable, and it is very diffuse.

27. Two French writers may be reckoned worthy of a place in this chapter, who are, from the nature of be of their works, not generally known out of their own Para, country, and whom I cannot refer with absolute propriety to this rather than to the ensuing period, except by a certain character and manner of writing, which belongs more to the antecedent than the later moiety of the seventeenth century. These were two lawyers, Patru and Le Maistre. The pleadings of Patru appear to me excellent in their particular line of forensic eloquence, addressed to intelligent and experienced judges. They greatly resemble what are called the private orations of Demosthenes, and those of Lysias and Iseus, especially, perhaps, the last. No ambitious ornament, no appeal to the emotions of the beart, no bold figures of rhetoric, are permitted in the Attic severity of this style; or, if they ever occur, it is to surprise us as things rather uncommon in the place where they appear than in themselves. Patru does not even employ the exordium usual in speeches, but rushes instantaneously, though always perspicuously, into his statement of the case. In the eyes of many this is no eloquence at all, and it requires perhaps some taste for legal reasoning to enter fully into its merit. But the Greek orators are masters whom a modern lawyer need not blush to follow, and to follow, as Patru did, in their respect for the tribunal they addressed. They spoke to rather a numerous body of judges; but those were Athenians, and, as we have reason to believe, the best and most upright, the salt of that vicious city. Patru again spoke to the parliament of Paris, men too well versed in the ways of law and justice to be the dupes of tinkling sound. He is therefore plain, lucid, well arranged, but not emphatic or impetuous; the subjects of his published speeches would not admit of such qualities; though Patru is said to have employed on some occasions the burning words of the highest oratory. His style has always been reckoned purely and rigidly French; but I have been led rather to praise what has struck me in the substance of his pleadings; which, whether read at this day in France or not, are, I may venture to say, worthy to be studied by lawyers, like those to which I have compared them, the strictly forensic portion of Greek oratory. In some speeches of Patru which are more generally praised, that on his own reception in the Academy, and one complimentary to Christina, it has seemed to me that he falls very short of his judicial style; the ornaments are common-place, and such as belong to the panegyrical department of oratory, in all ages less important and valuable than the other two. It should be added, that Patru was not only one of the purest writers, but one of the best critics whom France possessed.

^{*} This was Gomberville, in whose a discovery which does sust honour to immense runnines, Poleanodre, it is said the person who took the pains to make that this word only occurs three times; it.

28. The forensic speeches of Le Maistre are more eloquent, in a popular sense of the word, more ardent, and of Le more imaginative, than those of Patru; the one Mustre. addresses the judges alone, the other has a view to the audience; the one seeks the success of his cause alone, the other that and his own glory together. The one will be more prized by the lovers of legal reasoning, the other by the majority of mankind. The one more reminds us of the orations of Demosthenes for his private clients, the other of those of Cicero. Le Maistre is fervid and brilliant, he hurries us with him; in all his pleadings, warmth is his first characteristic, and a certain elegance is the second. In the power of statement, I do not perceive that he is inferior to Patru; both are excellent. Wherever great moral or social topics, or extensive views of history and human nature can be employed, Le Maistre has the advantage. Both are concise, relatively to the common verbosity of the bar; but Le Maistre has much more that might be retrenched; not that it is redundant in expression, but unnecessary in substance. This is owing to his ambitious display of general erudition; his quotations are too frequent and too ornamental, partly drawn from the aucients, but more from the fathers. Ambrose, in fact, Jerome and Augustin, Chrysostom, Basil, and Gregory, were the models whom the writers of this age were accustomed to study; and hence they are often, and Le Maistre among the rest, too apt to declaim where they should prove, and to use arguments from analogy, rather striking to the common hearer, than likely to weigh much with a tribunal. He has less simplicity, less purity of taste than Patru; his animated language would, in our courts, be frequently effective with a jury, but would seem too indefinite and common-place to the judges; we should crowd to hear Le Maistre, we should be compelled to decide with Patru. They are both, however, very superior advocates, and do great honour to the French bar.

[.] Permult says of Patru in his Hommes langue. Let they were not much above Illustres de France, vol. u. p. 66. Ses thirty years old—so much had the lan-plandoyers servent excere aujourd'hur de guige elonged, as to rules of writing, models pour tente correctement ou notre within that time.

29. A sensible improvement in the general style of English writers had come on before the expiration of the sixteenth century; the rude and rough phrases, sometimes almost requiring a glossary, which lie as spots of rust on the pages of Latimer, Grafton, Aylmer, or even Ascham, had been chiefly polished away; if we meet in Sidney, Hooker, or the prose of Spenser, with obsolete expressions or forms, we find none that are in the least unintelligible, none that give us offence. But to this next period belong most of those whom we commonly reckon our old English writers; men often of such sterling worth for their sense, that we might read them with little regard to their language, yet, in some instances at least, possessing much that demands praise in this respect. They are generally pervous and effective, copious to redundancy in their command of words, apt to employ what seemed to them ornament with much imagination rather than judicious taste, yet seldom degenerating into common-place and indefinite phraseology. They have, however, many defects; some of them, especially the most learned, are full of pedantry, and deform their pages by an excessive and preposterous mixture of Latinisms unknown before *; at other times we are disgusted by colloquial and even vulgar idioms or proverbs; nor is it uncommon to find these opposite blemishes not only in the same author, but in the same passages. Their periods, except in a very few, are ill-constructed and tediously prolonged; their ears (again with some exceptions) seem to have been insensible to the beauty of rhythmical prose; grace is commonly wanting, and their notion of the artifices of style, when they thought at all about them, was not congenial to our own language. This may be deemed a general description of the English writers under James and Charles; we shall now proceed to mention some of the most famous, and who may, in a certain degree, be deemed to modify this censure.

30. I will begin with a passage of very considerable beauty, which is here out of its place, since it was written in the year 1598. It is found in the Apology for the Earl of Essex, published among the works of Lord Bacon, and passing, I suppose, commonly for his. It seems nevertheless, in my judgment, far more probably genuine. We have nowhere in our early writers a flow of words so easy and graceful, a structure so harmonious, a series of antitheses so spirited without affectation, an absence of quaintness, pedantry, and vulgarity so truly gentlemanlike, a paragraph so worthy of the most brilliant man of his age. This could not have come from Bacon, who never divested himself of a certain didactic formality, even if he could have counterfeited that chivalrous generosity which it was not in his nature to feel. It is the language of a soldier's heart, with the unstudied grace of a puble courtier.

The Pratt's edition of Bishop Hall's to more than eleven handred, the greater works, we have a gleasary of anomal part being of Latin or Greek origin; words employed by him. They amount some are Galliciams.

31. Knolles, already known by a spirited translation of Bodin's Commonwealth, published in 1610 a copious Roober's History of the Turks, bringing down his narrative to the most recent times. Johnson, in a paper of the Rambler, has given him the superiority over all English historians. " He has displayed all the excellencies that narration can admit. His style, though somewhat obscured by time, and vitiated by false wit, is pure, nervous, elevated, and clear. . . . Nothing could have sunk this author into obscurity but the remoteness and barbarity of the people whose story he relates. It seldom happens that all circumstances concur to happiness or fame. The nation which produced this great historian has the grief of seeing his genus employed upon a foreign and uninteresting subject; and that writer who might have secured perpetuity to his name by a history of his own country, has exposed himself to the danger

• * A word for my friendship with the chief men of action, and favour generally to the men of war; and then I come to their main objection, which is my crowing of the treaty in hand. For most of them that are accounted the chief men of action, I do confess. I do enterely love them. They have been my companions both abroad and at home; some of them began the wars with me, most have had place under me, and many have had me a witness of their resing from captains, lieutenants, and private men to those charges, which since by their tirtue they have obtained. Now that I have tried them, I would choose them for friends, if I had them not; before I had tried thom, God by his pro-vidence chose them for me. I love them for mine own sake; for I find sweetness in their conversation, strong amplance in their engloyments with me, and happi-ness in their friendship. I love them for their virtues' take, and for their greatness of mind, (for little minds, though never so full of virtue, can be but a little virtuous.) and for their great under-standing; for to understand little things or things not of use, is little better than to understand nothing at all, I love service they have done."

them for their affections; for self-loving men love ease, pleasure, and profit, but they that love pains, danger, and fame, show that they love public profit more than themselves. I love them for my country's aske; for they are England's best armour of defence and weapons of offence. If we may have peace, they have purchased it; if we must have war, they must manage it. Yet while we are doubtful and in tresty we must value ourselves by what may be done, and the enemy will value us by what hath been done by our e .nf men of action.

"That generally I am affected to the men of war, it should not seem strange to any reasonable man. Every wan doth love them of his own profession. The grave judges favour the students of the law, the reverend hishops the libourers in the mmotry, and I (tines her Majesty hath yearly used my service in her late actions) must reckon myself in the number of her men of war. Before action, prevalence tanker me chernly them for what they can do, in action, necessity makes my value them for the service they do, and after action, experience and thankfalness make me love them for the

of oblivion by recounting enterprises and revolutions of which none desire to be informed." . The subject, however, appeared to Knolles, and I know not how we can say erroneously, one of the most splendid that he could have selected. It was the rise and growth of a mighty nation, second only to Rome in the constancy of success, and in the magnitude of empire; a nation fierce and terrible, the present scourge of half Christendom, and though from our remoteness not very formidable to ourselves, still one of which not the bookish man in his closet or the statesman in council had alone heard, but the smith at his anvil, and the husbandman at his plough. A long decrepitude of the Turkish empire on one hand, and our frequent alliance with it on the other, have since obliterated the apprehensions and interests of every kind which were awakened throughout Europe by its youthful fury and its mature strength. The subject was also new in England, yet rich in materials; various, in comparison with ordinary history, though not perhaps so fertile of philosophical observation as some others, and furnishing many occasions for the peculiar talents of Knolles. These were displayed, not in depth of thought, or copiousness of collateral erudition, but in a style and in a power of narration which Johnson has not too highly extolled. His descriptions are vivid and animated; circumstantial, but not to feebleness; his characters are drawn with a strong pencil. It is indeed difficult to estimate the merits of an historian very accurately without having before our eyes his original sources; he may probably have translated much that we admire, and he had shown that he knew how to translate. In the style of Knolles there is sometimes, as Johnson has hinted, a slight excess of desire to make every phrase effective; but he is exempt from the usual blemishes of his age; and his command of the language is so extensive, that we should not err in placing him among the first of our elder writers. Comparing, as a specimen of Knolles's manner, his description of the execution of Mustapha, son of Solyman, with that given by Robertson, where the latter historian has been as circumstantial as his limits would permit, we shall perceive that the former paints better his story, and deepens better its interest.*

^{*} Rambler, No. 199.

32. Raleigh's History of the World is a proof of the respect for laborious learning that had long distinrespect for laborious learning that had long distinprison-hours of a soldier, a courtier, a busy inriguer in state affairs, a poet and man of genius, something well worth our notice; but hardly a prolix history of the ancient world, hardly disquisitions on the site of Paradise and the travels of Cain. These are probably translated with little alteration from some of the learned writings of the Continent; they are by much the least valuable portion of Raleigh's work. The Greek and Roman story is told more fully and exactly than by any earlier English author, and with a plain eloquence, which has given this book a classical reputation in our language, though from its length, and the want of that critical sifting of facts which we now justly demand, it is not greatly read. Raleigh has intermingled political reflections, and illustrated his history by episodes from modern times, which perhaps are now the most interesting passages. It descends only to the second Macedonian war; the continuation might have been more generally valuable: but either the death of Prince Henry, as Raleigh himself tells us, or the new schemes of ambition which unfortunately opened upon his eyes, prevented the execution of the large plan he had formed. There is little now obsolete in the words of Raleigh, nor, to any great degree, in his turn of phrase; the periods, when pains have been taken with them, show that artificial structure which we find in Sidney and Hooker; he is less pedantic than most of his contemporaries, seldom low, never affected, † passage without acknowledgment; and Dr. Parr, though a man of very extensive reading, extebed it is Wartorton's, not knowing, what he afterwards discovered, the original source. The passage is a follows in Raleigh, Warburton of course having altered some of the expressions.

^{*} Knolles, p. 515. Robertson's Charles the Fifth, book at. [The principal authority for this description appears to be Busheq ins, in his excellent Legations Turcies Epistole. It has been justly observed, that I might have mentioned Bushequins in a former volume among the good Latin writers of the sixteenth contury. — 1842.]

contury. — 1842]
† Raleigh a History was so little known, that Warburton, us the proface to his Julian, took from it a remarkable

[&]quot;We baseleft it (the Roman empire) flourishing to the middle of the field, basing rooted up or cut down all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance,

33. Daniel's History of England from the Conquest to the Reign of Edward III., published in 1618, is deserving of some attention on account of its lan- Bastel's guage. It is written with a freedom from all stiffness, and a purity of style which hardly any other work of so early a date exhibits. These qualities are indeed so remarkable that it would require a good deal of critical observation to distinguish it even from writings of the reign of Anne; and where it differs from them, (I speak only of the secondary class of works, which have not much individuality of manner,) it is by a more select idiom, and by an absence of the Gallicism or vulgarity which are often found in that age. It is true that the merits of Daniel are chiefly negative; he is never pedantic, or antithetical, or low, as his contemporaries were apt to be; but his periods are ill constructed, he has little vigour or elegance; and it is only by observing how much pains he must have taken to reject phrases which were growing obsolete, that we give him credit for having done more than follow the common stream of easy writing. A slight tinge of archaism, and a certain majesty of expression, relatively to colloquial usage, were thought by Bacon and Raleigh congenial to an elevated style; but Daniel, a gentleman of the king's household, wrote as the court spoke, and his facility would be pleasing if his sentences had a less negligent structure. As an historian, he has recourse only to common authorities; but his narration is fluent and perspicuous, with a regular vein of good sense, more the characteristic of his mind, both in verse and prose, than any commanding vigour.

34. The style of Bacon has an idiosyncracy which we might expect from his genius. It can rarely indeed happen, and only in men of secondary talents, that the language they use is not, by its very choice and collocation, as well as its meaning, the representative of an indiustions enter the field and cut her down." Raleigh's History, ad finem

Notwithstanding the praise that has admirable, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; been bestowed on this sentence, it is the storms of ambition shall best hor open to some comme; the simile and great boughs and branches one against subject are too much confounded; a rab-another, her leaves shall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of harbarous quired to subsert the Roman empire, but make an odd figure in cutting down a tree. The rhythm and spirit indeed are viduality that distinguishes their turn of thought. Bacon is elaborate, sententious, often witty, often metaphorical; nothing could be spared; his analogies are generally striking and novel; his style is clear, precise, forcible; yet there is some degree of stiffness about it, and in mere language he is inferior to Raleigh. The History of Henry VII., admirable as many passages are, seems to be written rather too ambitiously, and with too great an absence of simplicity.

35. The polemical writings of Milton, which chiefly fall within this period, contain several bursts of his splendid imagination and grandeur of soul. They are, however, much inferior to the Areopagitica, or Plea for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing. Many passages in this famous tract are admirably eloquent; an intense love of liberty and truth glows through it, the majestic soul of Milton breathes such high thoughts as had not been uttered before; yet even here he frequently sinks in a single instant, as is usual with our old writers, from his highest flights to the ground; his intermixture of familiar with learned phraseology is unpleasing, his structure is affectedly elaborate, and he seldom reaches any harmony. If he turns to invective, as sometimes in this treatise, and more in his Apology for Smectymnus, it is mere ribaldrous vulgarity blended with pedantry; his wit is always poor and without ease. An absence of idiomatic grace, and an use of harsh inversions violating the rules of the language, distinguish, in general, the writings of Milton, and require in order to compensate them such high beauties as will sometimes occur.

36. The History of Clarendon may be considered as belonging rather to this than to the second period of the century, both by the probable date of composition and by the nature of its style. He is excellent in every thing that he has performed with care; his characters are beautifully delineated, his sentiments have often a noble gravity, which the length of his periods, far too great in itself, seems to befit; but in the general course of his narration he is negligent of grammar and perspicuity, with little choice of words, and therefore sometimes idiomatic without case or elegance. The official papers on the royal side, which are generally attributed to him, are written in a masculine and majestic tone, far superior to those of the parliament. The latter had, however, a writer who did them honour: May's History of the Parliament is a good model of genuine English; he is plain, terse, and vigorous, never slovenly, though with few remarkable passages, and is, in style as well as substance, a kind of contrast to Clarendon.

37. The famous Icon Basilice, ascribed to Charles I., may deserve a place in literary history. If we could The Icon trust its panegyrists, few books in our language Bankos have done it more credit by dignity of sentiment and beauty of style. It can hardly be necessary for me to express my unhesitating conviction that it was solely written by Bishop Gauden, who after the Restoration unequivocally claimed it as his own. The folly and impudence of such a claim, if it could not be substantiated, are not to be presumed as to any man of good understanding, fair character, and high station, without stronger evidence than has been alleged on the other side; especially when we find that those who had the best means of inquiry, at a time when it seems impossible that the falsehood of Gauden's assertion should not have been demonstrated, if it were false, acquiesced in his pretensions. We have very little to place against this, except secondary testimony, vague, for the most part, in itself, and collected by those whose veracity has not been put to the test like that of Gauden. The style also of the Icon Basilice has been identified by Mr. Todd with that of Gauden by the use of several phrases so peculiar that we can hardly conceive them to have auggested themselves to more than one person. It is pevertheless superior to his acknowledged writings. A strain of majestic melancholy is well kept up; but the per-

. There is only one claimant, in a by himself, but universally ascribed to another, and which had never been in his possession: A story is told, and I believe truly, that a young man assumed the credit of Mackenge's Man of Feeting, while it was still anonymous. But this is widely different from the case of the Icon Ban ice We have list an intermitable discussion as to the Letters of Junion.

proper sense, for the Icon Baultee, which in Gauden himself, the king neither appears by lamself or representative. And, though we may find several instances of plaguarism in literary history, (one of the gressort being the publication by a Spamish friar, under another title, of a book. Bau see. We have had an interminable already in print with the name of Hyperius of Marping, its real author,) yet. But no one has ever claused this develot. I cannot call to mind any, where a man property to bisself, or told the world, I known to the world has asserted in terms and Junior. has own authorship of a book not written sonated sovereign is rather too theatrical for real nature, the language is too rhetorical and amplified, the periods too artificially elaborated. None but scholars and practised writers employ such a style as this.

38, Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy belongs, by its systematic divisions and its accumulated quotations, to the class of mere erudition; it seems at first sight like those tedious Latin folios, into which scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries threw the materials of their Adversaria, or common-place books, painfully selected and arranged by the labour of many years. But writing fortunately in English, and in a style not by any means devoid of point and terseness, with much good sense and observation of men as well as of books, and having also the skill of choosing his quotations for their rareness, oddity, and amusing character, without losing sight of their pertinence to the subject, he has produced a work of which, as is well known, Johnson said, that it was the only one which had ever caused him to leave his bed earlier than he had intended. Johnson, who seems to have had some turn for the singularities of learning which fill the Anatomy of Melancholy, may perhaps have raised the credit of Burton higher than his desert. He is clogged by excess of reading, like others of his age, and we may peruse entire chapters without finding more than a few lines that belong to himself. This becomes a wearisome style, and, for my own part, I have not found much pleasure in glancing over the Anatomy of Melancholy. It may be added that he has been a collector of stories far more strange than true, from those records of figments, the old medical writers of the sixteenth century, and other equally deceitful sources. Burton lived at Oxford, and his volumes are apparently a great sweeping of miscellaneous literature from the Bodleian library.

39. John Earle, after the Restoration bishop of Worcester, and then of Salisbury, is author of "Microcosmographia, or a Piece of the Worlde discovered in Essays and Characters," published anonymously in 1628. In some of these short characters, Earle is worthy of comparison with La Bruyère; in others, perhaps the greater part, he has contented himself with pictures of ordinary manners, such as the varieties of occupation, rather than of intrinsic character, supply. In all, however, we find an acute observation and a happy humour of expression. The chapter entitled the Sceptic is best known; it is witty, but an insult throughout on the honest searcher after truth, which could have come only from one that was content to take up his own opinions for ease or profit. Earle is always gay and quick to catch the ridiculous, especially that of exterior appearances; his style is short, describing well with a few words, but with much of the affected quaintness of that age. It is one of those books which give us a picturesque idea of the manners of our fathers at a period now become remote, and for this reason, were there no other, it would deserve to be read.

40. But the Microcosmography is not an original work in its plan or mode of execution; it is a close imitation of the Characters of Sir Thomas Overbury. They characters of the Characters of Sir Thomas Overbury. They character both belong to the favourite style of apophthegm, in which every sentence is a point or a witticism. Yet the entire character so delineated produces a certain effect; it is a Dutch picture, a Gerard Dow, somewhat too elaborate. Earle has more natural humour than Overbury, and hits his mark more neatly; the other is more satirical, but often abusive and vulgar. The "Fair and Happy Milkmaid," often quoted, is the best of his characters. The wit is often trivial and flat; the sentiments have nothing in them general or worthy of much remembrance; praise is only due to the graphic skill in delineating character. Earle is as clearly the better, as Overbury is the more original writer.

41. A book by Ben Jonson, entitled "Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter"," is altogether miscellaneous, the greater part being general discoveries.

moral remarks, while another portion deserves notice as the only book of English criticism in the first part of the seventeenth century. The observations are unconnected, judicious, sometimes witty, frequently severe. The style is what was called pregnant, leaving much to be filled up by the reader's reflection. Good sense and a vigorous manner of grappling with every subject will generally be found in Jonson, but he does not reach any very profound criticism. His English Grammar is said by Gifford to have been destroyed in the conflagration of his study. What we have therefore under that name is, he thinks, to be considered as properly the materials of a more complete work that is lost. We have, as I apprehend, no carlier grammar upon so elaborate a plan; every rule is illustrated by examples, almost to redundance; but he is too copious on what is common to other languages, and perhaps not full enough as to our peculiar idiom.

 ^{[&}quot; Timber," I suppose, is meant as a ludicrous translation of Sylva. — 1842.]

SECT. II .- ON FICTION.

Cervantes — French Romances — Calprenède — Scuderi — Latin and English Works of Faction.

42. THE first part of Don Quixote was published in 1605.

We have no reason, I believe, to suppose that it was written long before. It became immediately popular; and the admiration of the world raised up envious competitors, one of whom, Avellenada, published a continuation in a strain of invective against the author. Cervantes, who cannot be imagined to have ever designed the leaving his romance in so unfinished a state, took time about the second part, which did not appear till 1615.

43. Don Quixote is almost the only book in the Spanish language which can now be said to possess so much of an European reputation as to be popularly read in every country. It has, however, enjoyed enough to compensate for the neglect of the rest. It is to Europe in general what Ariosto is to Italy, and Shakspeare to England; the one book to which the slightest allusions may be made without affectation, but not missed without discredit. Numerous translations and countless editions of them, in every language, bespeak its adaptation to mankind; no critic has been paradoxical enough to withhold his admiration, no reader has ventured to confess a want of relish for that in which the young and old, in every climate, have age after age taken delight.

They have doubtless believed that they understood the author's meaning; and, in giving the reins to the gaiety that his fertile invention and comic humour inspired, never thought of any deeper meaning than he announces, or delayed their enjoyment for any metaphysical investigation of his plan.

44. A new school of criticism, however, has of late years arisen in Germany, acute, ingenious, and sometimes eminently successful in philosophical, or, as they denominate it, æsthetic analysis of works of taste, but gliding too much into refinement and conjectural hypothesis, and with a tendency to mislead men of inferior capacities for this kind of investigation into mere paradox and absurdity. An instance is supplied, in my opinion, by some remarks of Bouterwek, still more explicitly developed by Sismondi, on the design of Cervantes in Don Quixote, and which have been repeated in other publications. According to these writers, the primary idea is that of a "man of elevated character, excited by heroic and enthusiastic feelings to the extravagant pitch of wishing to restore the age of chivalry; nor is it possible to form a more mistaken notion of this work than by considering it merely as a satire, intended by the author to ridicule the absurd passion for reading old romances." " "The fundamental idea of Don Quixote," says Sismondi, " is the eternal contrast between the spirit of poetry and that of prose. Men of an elevated soul propose to themselves as the object of life to be the defenders of the weak, the support of the oppressed, the champions of justice and innocence. Like Don Quixote they find on every side the image of the virtues they worship; they believe that disinterestedness, nobleness, courage, in short, knight-errantry, are still prevalent; and with no calculation of their own powers, they expose themselves for an ungrateful world, they offer themselves as a sacrifice to the laws and rules of an imaginary state of society."

15. If this were a true representation of the scheme of Don Quixote, we cannot wonder that some persons should, as M. Sismondi tells us they do, consider it as the most melancholy book that has ever been written. They consider it also, no doubt, one of the most immoral, as chilling and pernicious in its influence on the social converse of mankind, as the Prince of Machiavel is on their political intercourse. "Cervantes," he proceeds, "has shown us in some measure the vanity of greatness of soul and the delusion of heroism. He has drawn in Don Quixote a perfect man (un homme accompli), who is nevertheless the constant object of ridicule. Brave beyond the fabled knights he imitates, disinterested, honourable, generous, the most faithful and respectful of lovers, the best of masters, the most accomplished and well educated of gentlemen, all his enterprises end in discomfiture to himself, and in mischief to others." M. Sismondi descants upon the perfections of the Knight of La Mancha with a gravity which it is not quite easy for his readers to preserve.

^{*} Bouterwek, p. 334.

[†] Littérature du Midi, vol. üi. p. 359.

46. It might be answered by a phlegmatic observer, that a mere enthusiasm for doing good, if excited by vanity, and not accompanied by common sense, will seldom be very serviceable to ourselves or to others; that men who in their heroism and care for the oppressed would throw open the cages of lions, and set galley-slaves at liberty, not forgetting to break the limbs of harmless persons whom they mistake for wrong-doers, are a class of whom Don Quixote is the real type; and that the world being much the worse for such heroes, it might not be immoral, notwithstanding their benevolent enthusiasm, to put them out of countenance by a little ridicule. This however is not, as I conceive, the primary aim of Cervantes; nor do I think that the exhibition of one great truth, as the predominant, but concealed, moral, of a long work, is in the spirit of his age. He possessed a very thoughtful mind and a profound knowledge of humanity; yet the generalisation which the hypothesis of Bouterwek and Sismondi requires for the leading conception of Don Quixote, besides its being a little inconsistent with the valorous and romantic character of its author, belongs to a more advanced period of philosophy than his own. It will at all events, I presume, be admitted that we cannot reason about Don Quixote except from the book, and I think it may be shown in a few words that these ingenious writers have been chiefly misled by some want of consistency which circumstances produced in the author's delineation of his hero.

47. In the first chapter of this romance, Cervantes, with a few strokes of a great master, sets before us the a few strokes of a great master, sets before us the Difference pauper gentleman, an early riser and keen sportsman, who "when he was idle, which was most part of the year," gave himself up to reading books of chivalry till he lost his wits. The events that follow are in every one's recollection; his lunary consists no doubt only in one idea; but this is so absorbing that it perverts the evidence of his senses, and predominates in all his language. It is to be observed, therefore, in relation to the nobleness of soul ascribed to Don Quixote, that every sentiment he utters is borrowed with a punctilious rigour from the romances of his library; he resorts to them on every occasion for precedents; if he is intrepidly brave, it is because his madness and vanity have made him believe himself unconquerable; if he bestows kingdoms it is because Amadis would have done the same; if he is honourable, courteous, a redresser of wrongs, it is in pursuance of these prototypes, from whom, except that he seems rather more scrupulous in chastity, it is his only boast not to diverge. Those who talk of the exalted character of Don Quixote seem really to forget that, on these subjects, he has no character at all; he is the echo of romance; and to praise him is merely to say, that the tone of chivalry, which these productions studied to keep up, and, in the hands of inferior artists, foolishly exaggerated, was full of moral dignity, and has, in a subdued degree of force, modelled the character of a man of honour in the present day. But throughout the first two volumes of Don Quixote, though in a few unimportant passages he talks rationally, I cannot find more than two in which he displays any other knowledge or strength of mind than the original delineation of the character would lead us to expect.

48. The case is much altered in the last two volumes. Cervantes had acquired an immense popularity, and perceived the opportunity, of which he had already availed himself, that this romance gave for displaying his own mind. He had become attached to a hero who had made him illustrious, and suffered himself to lose sight of the clear outline he had once traced for Quixote's personality. Hence we find in all this second part that, although the lunacy as to knights errant remains unabated, he is, on all other subjects, not only rational in the low sense of the word, but clear, acute, profound, sarcastic, cool-headed. His philosophy is elevated but not enthusiastic, his imagination is poetical, but it is restrained by strong sense. There are, in fact, two Don Quixotes; one, whom Cervantes first designed to draw, the foolish gentleman of La Mancha, whose foolishness had made him frantic; the other, a highly gifted, accomplished model of the best chivalry, trained in all the court, the camp, or the college could impart, but scathed in one portion of his mind by an inexplicable visitation of monomania. One is inclined to ask why this Don Quixote, who is Cervantes, should have been more likely to lose his intellects by reading romances than Cervantes himself. As a matter of bodily disease, such an event is doubtless possible; but nothing can be conceived more improper for fiction, nothing more incapable of affording a moral lesson, than the insanity which arises wholly from disease. Insanity is, in no point of view, a theme for ridicule; and this is an inherent fault of the romance (for those who have imagined that Cervantes has not rendered Quixote ridiculous have a strange notion of the world); but the thoughtlessness of mankind, rather than their insensibility (for they do not connect madness with misery), furnishes some apology for the first two volumes. In proportion as we perceive below the veil of mental delusion a noble intellect, we feel a painful sympathy with its humiliation; the character becomes more complicated and interesting, but has less truth and naturalness; an objection which might also be made, comparatively speaking, to the incidents in the latter volumes, wherein I do not find the admirable probability that reigns through the former. But this contrast of wisdom and virtue with insanity in the same subject would have been repulsive in the primary delineation; as I think any one may judge by supposing that Cervantes had, in the first chapter, drawn such a picture of Quixote as Bouterwek and Sismondi have drawn for him.

49. I must therefore venture to think as, I believe, the world has generally thought for two centuries, that Cervantes limit could be found save the author's discretion, or sense that he had drawn sufficiently on his imagination; but the death of Quixote, which Cervantes has been said to have determined upon, lest some one else should a second time presume to continue the story, is in fact the only possible termination that could be given, after he had clevated the character to that pitch of mental dignity which we find in the last two volumes. 50. Few books of moral philosophy display as deep an insight into the mechanism of the mind as Don Quixote. And when we look also at the fertility of invention, the general probability of the events, and the great simplicity of the story, wherein no artifices are practised to create suspense, or complicate the action, we shall think Cervantes fully deserving of the glory that attends this monument of his genius. It is not merely that he is superior to all his predecessors and contemporaries. This, though it might account for the European fame of his romance, would be an inadequate testimony to its desert. Cervantes stands on an eminence, below which we must place the best of his successors. We have only to compare him with Le

CHAP. VII.)

Sage or Fielding, to judge of his vast superiority. To Scott, indeed, he must yield in the variety of his power; but in the line of comic romance, we should hardly think Scott his equal.

51. The moral novels of Cervantes, as he calls them Minor novels (Novellas Exemplares), are written, I believe, in a of Cervantes good style, but too short, and constructed with too little artifice to rivet our interest. Their simplicity and truth, as in many of the old novels, have a certain charm; but in the present age our sense of satiety in works of fiction cannot be overcome but by excellence. Of the Spanish comic romances, in the picaresque style, several remain: Justina was the most famous. One that does not strictly belong to this lower class is the Marcos de Obregon of Espinel. This is supposed to have suggested much to Le Sage in Gil Blas; in fact, the first story we meet with is that of Mergellina the physician's wife. The style, though not dull, wants the grace and neatness of Le Sage. This is esteemed one of the best novels that Spain has produced. Italy was no longer the seat of this literature. A romance of chivalry by Marini (not the poet of that name), entitled Il Caloandro (1640), was translated but indifferently into French by Scuderi, and has been praised by Salfi as full of imagination, with characters skilfully diversified, and an interesting, well-conducted story.

52. France in the sixteenth century, content with Amadis de Gaul and the numerous romances of the Spanish school, had contributed very little to that literature. But now she had native writers of both kinds, the pastoral and heroic, who completely superseded the models they had before them. Their earliest essay was the Astrée of D'Urfé. Of this pastoral romance the first volume was published in 1610; the second in 1620; three more came slowly forth, that the world might have due leisure to admire. It contains about 5500 pages. It would be almost as discreditable to have read such a book through at present, as it was to be ignorant of it in the ages of Louis XIII. Allusions, however, to real circumstances served in some measure to lessen the insipidity of a love-story, which seems to equal any in absurdity and want of interest. The style, and I can judge no farther, having read but a few pages, seems easy and not unpleasing; but the pastoral tone is insufferably puerile, and a monotonous solemnity makes us almost suspect that one source of its popularity was its gentle effect, when read in small portions before retiring to rest. It was nevertheless admired by men of erudition, like Camus and Huct, or even by men of the world like Rochefoucault.

^{*} Salfi, vol. xiv. p. 88.

53. From the union of the old chivalrous romance with this newer style, the courtly pastoral, sprang another Book to kind of fiction, the French heroic romance. Three forthernearly contemporary writers, Gomberville, Calpre- "ole nede, Scuderi, supplied a number of voluminous stories, frequently historical in some of their names, but utterly destitute of truth in circumstances, characters, and manners. Gomberville led the way in his Polexandre, first published in 1682, and reaching in later editions to about 6000 pages. "This," says a modern writer, "seems to have been the model of the works of Calprenède and Scuderi. This ponderous work may be regarded as a sort of intermediate production between the later compositions and the ancient fables of chivalry. It has indeed a close affinity to the heroic romance; but many of the exploits of the hero are as extravagant as those of a paladin or knight of the round table." † No romance in the language has so complex an intrigue, insomuch that it is followed with difficulty; and the author has in successive editions capriciously remodelled parts of his story, which is wholly of his own invention, $

54. Calprenède, a poet of no contemptible powers of imagination, poured forth his stores of rapid invention in several romances more celebrated than that of Capronide Gomberville. The first, which is contained in ten octavovolumes, is the Cassandra. This appeared in 1642, and was followed by the Cleopatra, published, according to the custom of romancers, in successive parts, the earliest in 1646. La Harpe thinks this unquestionably the best work of Calprenède; Bouterwek seems to prefer the Cassandra. Phara-

[·] Dunlop's History of Fiction, vol ni p. 184 Bingrig! e Universelle. Booterwek, vol. v. p. 295.

[†] Danlop, in 230, ! Bog Liv.

mond is not wholly his own; five out of twelve volumes belong to one De Vaumorière, a continuator. Calprenède, like many others, had but a life-estate in the temple of fame, and more happy, perhaps, than greater men, lived out the whole favour of the world, which, having been largely showered on his head, strewed no memorials on his grave. It became, soon after his death, through the satire of Boileau and the influence of a new style in fiction, a matter of course to turn him into ridicule. It is impossible that his romances should be read again; but those who, for the purposes of general criticism, have gone back to these volumes find not a little to praise in his genius, and in some measure to explain his popularity. "Calprenede," says Bouterwek, "belonged to the extravagant party, which endeavoured to give a triumph to genius at the expense of taste, and by that very means played into the hands of the opposite party, which saw nothing so laudable as the observation of the rules which taste prescribed. We have only to become acquainted with any one of the prolix romances of Calprenede, such, for instance, as the Cassandra, to see clearly the spirit which animates the whole invention. We find there again the beroism of chivalry, the enthusiastic raptures of love, the struggle of duty with passion, the victory of magnanimity, smeerity, and humanity, over force, fraud, and barbarism, in the genuine characters and circumstances of romance. The events are skilfully interwoven, and a truly poetical keeping belongs to the whole, however extended it may be. The diction of Calprenede is a little monotonous, but not at all trivial, and seldom affected. It is like that of old romance, grave, circumstantial, somewhat in the chronicle style, but picturesque, agreeable, full of sensibility and simplicity. Many passages might, if versified, find a place in the most beautiful poem of this class." †

55. The honours of this romantic literature have long been shared by the female sex. In the age of Richelieu and Mazarin, this was represented by Mademoiselle de Scuderi, a name very glorious for a season, but which unfortunately did not, like that of Calprenede, continue to be such during the whole lifetime of her who bore it. The old age of Mademoiselle de Scuderi was ignominiously treated by the pitiless Boileau; and reaching more than her ninetieth year, she almost survived her only offspring, those of her In her youth she had been the associate of the Rambouillet circle, and caught perhaps in some measure from them what she gave back with interest, a tone of perpetual affectation, and a pedantic gallautry, which could not withstand the first approach of ridicule. Her first romance was Ibrahim, published in 1635; but the more celebrated were the Grand Cyrus and the Clelic. Each of these two romances is in ten volumes. The persons chiefly connected with the Hotel Rambouillet sat for their pictures, as Persians or Babylonians, in Cyrus. Julie d'Angennes herself bore the name of Artenice, by which she was afterwards distinguished among her friends; and it is a remarkable instance not only of the popularity of these romances, but of the respectful sentiment, which, from the elevation and purity no one can deny them to exhibit, was always associated in the gravest persons with their fictions, that a prelate of eminent fame for cloquence, Flechier, in his funeral sermon on this lady, calls her "the incomparable Artenice." † Such an allusion would appear to us misplaced; but we may presume that it was not Scuderi's romances seem to have been remarkably the favourites of the clergy; Huet, Mascaron, Godeau, as much as Flechier, were her ardent admirers. "I find," says the second of these, one of the chief ornuments of the French pulpit, in writing to Mademoiselle de Scuderi, "so much in your works calculated to reform the world, that in the sermons I am now preparing for the court, you will often be on my table by the side of St. Augustin and St. Bernard."1 In the writings of this lady we see the last footstep of the old chivalrous romance. She, like Calprenède, had derived from this source the predominant characteristics

Dunlop, ni. 259.

Biogr. Univ. Dunlop. Bouterwek. † Sermon de Fléchuer, n. 325, (edit 1690). But probably Hammet would not have stooped to this allowan † B. gr. Univ. Mademoscolle de

She would probably have wished this to have been otherwise, but carried off the matter very well, as appears by her epigram on her own picture by Nanteud

f Bage, Univ. Mademoselle de Soders was not gifted by nestere with bessety, or, as this baggapher more thandy says, étoit d'une extreme laideur.

National on his and make in age. A she say a day is a say a he in produced by the braining and support of the produced by the same and support of the produced by the same and support.

of her personages, an exalted generosity, a disdain of all selfish considerations, a courage which attempts impossibilities and is rewarded by achieving them, a love outrageously hyperbolical in pretence, yet intrinsically without passion, all, in short, that Cervantes has bestowed on Don Quixote. Love, however, or its counterfeit, gallantry, plays a still more leading part in the French romance than in its Castilian prototype; the feats of heroes, though not less wonderful, are less prominent on the canvass, and a metaphysical pedantry replaces the pompous metaphors in which the knight of sorrowful countenance had taken so much delight. The approbation of many persons, far superior judges to Don Quixote, makes it impossible to doubt that the romances of Calprenede and Scuderi were better than his library. But as this is the least possible praise, it will certainly not tempt any one away from the rich and varied repast of fiction which the last and present century have spread before him. Mademoiselle de Scuderi has perverted history still more than Calprenède, and changed her Romans into languishing Parisians. It is not to be forgotten that the taste of her party, though it did not, properly speaking, infect Corneille, compelled him to weaken some of his tragedies. And this must be the justification of Boileau's cutting ridicule upon this truly estimable She had certainly kept up a tone of severe and high morality, with which the aristocracy of Paris could ill dispense; but it was one not difficult to feign, and there might be Tartufles of sentiment as well as of religion. Whatever is false in taste is apt to be allied to what is insincere in character.

56. The Argenis of Barclay, a son of the defender of royal authority against republican theories, is a barclay. Latin romance, superior to those which the Spanish or French language could boast. It has indeed always been reckoned among political allegories. That the state of France in the last years of Henry III. is partially shadowed in it, can admit of no doubt; several characters are faintly veiled either by anagram or Greek translation of their names; but whether to avoid the insipidity of servile allegory, or to excite the reader by perplexity, Barclay has mingled so much of mere fiction with his story, that no attempts at a regular key to the whole work can be successful, nor in fact does the fable of this romance run in any parallel stream with real events. His object seems in great measure to have been the discussion of political questions in feigued dialogue. But though in these we find no want of acuteness or good sense, they have not at present much povelty in our eyes; and though the style is really pleasing, or, as some have judged, excellent, and the incidents not ill contrived, it might be hard to go entirely through a Latin romance of 700 pages, unless indeed we had no alternative given but the perusal of the similar works in Spanish or French. The Argenis was published at Rome in 1622; some of the personages introduced by Barclay are his own contemporaries; a proof that he did not intend a strictly historical allegory of the events of the last age. The Euphormio of the same author resembles in some 18th Eq. degree the Argenis, but, with less of story and phorunto. character, has a more direct reference to European politics. It contains much political disquisition, and one whole book is employed in a description of the manners and laws of different countries with no disguise of names.

57. Campanella gave a loose to his fanciful humour in a fiction, entitled the City of the Sun, published at Frankfort in 1623, in imitation, perhaps, of the Constitution Utopia. The City of the Sun is supposed to stand upon a mountain situated in Ceylon, under the equator. A community of goods and women is established in this republic; the principal magistrate of which is styled Sun, and is elected after a strict examination in all kinds of science. Campanella has brought in so much of his own philosophical system, that we may presume that to have been the object of this romance. The Solars, he tells us, abstained at first from flesh, because they thought it cruel to kill animals. "But afterwards considering that it would be equally cruel to kill plants, which are not less endowed gauge of the Argenia, preferring it to enough sequented with it is writer to that of Livy or Tactins. Coloridges upon acquisited with it is writer to that of Livy or Tactins. Coloridges upon the confidently. The same observation any means go this length; it has exock with sensation, so that they must perish by famine, they understood that ignoble things were created for the use of nobler things, and now eat all things without scruple." Another Latin romance had some celebrity in its day, the Monarchia Solipsorum, a satire on the Jesuits in the fictitious name of Lucius Cornelius Europeus. It has been ascribed to more than one person; the probable author is one Scotti, who had himself belonged to the order. This book did not seem to me in the least interesting; if it is so in any degree, it must be not as mere fiction, but as a revelation of secrets.

58. It is not so much an extraordinary as an unfortunate deficiency in our own literary annals, that England Few books should have been destitute of the comic romance, or that derived from real life, in this period; since in fact we may say the same, as has been seen, of France. The picaresque novels of Spain were thought well worthy of translation; but it occurred to no one, or no one had the gift of genius, to shift the scene, and imitate their delineation of native manners. Of how much value would have been a genuine English novel, the mirror of actual life in the various ranks of society, written under Elizabeth or under the Stuarts! We should have seen, if the execution had not been very coarse, and the delineation absolutely confined to low characters, the social habits of our forefathers better than by all our other sources of that knowledge, the plays, the letters, the traditions and anecdotes, the pictures or buildings of the time. Notwithstanding the interest which all profess to take in the history of manners, our notions of them are generally meagre and imperfect; and hence modern works of fiction are but crude and inaccurate designs when they endeavour to represent the living England of two centuries since. Even Scott, who had a fine instinctive percention of truth and nature, and who had read much, does not appear to have seized the genuine tone of conversation, and to have been a little misled by the style of Shakspeare. This is rather elaborate and removed from vulgar use by a sort of archaism in phrase, and by a pointed turn in the dialogue, [.] Biogr. Univ. arts. Scotti and Inchoffer. Niceron, vols. xxxv. and xxxix.

adapted to theatrical utterance, but wanting the ease of ordinary speech.

59. I can only produce two books by English authors in this first part of the seventeenth century which fall name of properly under the class of novels or romances; and class of these one is written in Latin. This is the Mundus Alter et Idem of Bishop Hall, an imitation of the latter and weaker volumes of Rabelais. A country in Terra Australis is divided into four regions, Crapulia, Viraginia, Moronea, and Lavernia. Maps of the whole land and of particular regions are given; and the nature of the satire, not much of which has any especial reference to England, may easily be collected. It is not a very successful effort.

60. Another prelate, or one who became such, Francis

Godwin, was the author of a much more curious story. It is called the Man in the Moon, and re- Juney in lates the journey of one Domingo Gonzalez to that planet. This was written by Godwin, according to Antony Wood, while he was a student at Oxford. By some internal proofs, it must have been later than 1599, and before the death of Elizabeth in 1603. But it was not published till 1638. It was translated into French, and became the model of Cyrano de Bergerac, as he was of Swift. Godwin himself had no prototype, as far as I know, but Lucian. He resembles those writers in the natural and veracious tone of his lies. The fiction is rather ingenious and amusing throughout; but the most remarkable part is the happy conjectures, if we must say no more, of his philosophy. Not only does the writer declare positively for the Copernican system, which was uncommon at that time, but he has surprisingly understood the principle of gravitation, it being distinctly supposed that the earth's attraction diminishes with the distance. Nor is the following passage less curious : -"I must let you understand that the globe of the moon is not altogether destitute of an attractive power; but it is far weaker than that of the earth; as if a man do but spring upwards with all his force, as dancers do when they show their activity by capering, he shall be able to mount fifty or sixty feet high, and then he is quite beyond all attraction of the moon." By this device Gonzalez returns from his sojourn in the latter, though it required a more complex one to bring him thither. "The moon," he observes, "is covered with a sea, except the parts which seem somewhat darker to us, and are dry land." A contrary hypothesis came afterwards to prevail; but we must not expect every thing from our ingenious young student.

^{*} Atherse Oxonismos, vol. ii. cal. 558. work, and takes Dominic Gonzalez for It is remarkable that Mr Dankop has the real author. Hist, of Fiction, nilbern ignorant of Godwin's claim to thiv. 294.

61. Though I can mention nothing else in English which comes exactly within our notions of a romance, we may advert to the Dodona's Grove of James Howell. This is a strange allegory, without any ingenuity in maintaining the analogy between the outer and inner story, which alone can give a reader any pleasure in allegorical writing. The subject is the state of Europe, especially of England, about 1640, under the guise of animated trees in a forest. The style is like the following: -"The next morning the royal olives sent some prime elms to attend Prince Rocolino in quality of officers of state; and a little after he was brought to the royal palace in the same state Elaiana's kings use to be attended the day of their coronation." The contrivance is all along so clumsy and unintelligible, the invention so poor and absurd, the story, if story there be, so dull an echo of well-known events, that it is impossible to reckon Dodona's Grove any thing but an entire failure. Howell has no wit, but he has abundance of conceits, flat and commonplace enough. With all this he was a man of some sense and observation. His letters are entertaining, but they scarcely deserve consideration in this volume.

12. It is very possible that some small works belonging to this extensive class have been omitted, which my readers, or myself on second consideration, might think not unworthy of notice. It is also one so miscellaneous that we might fairly doubt as to some which have a certain claim to be admitted into it. Such are the Adventures of the Baron de Fæneste, by the famous Agrippa d'Aubigné (whose autobiography, by the way, has at least the hyeliness of fiction); a singular book written in dialogue, where an imaginary Gascon baron recounts his tales of the camp and the court. He is made to speak a patois not quite easy for us to understand, and not perhaps worth the while; but it seems to contain much that illustrates the state of France about the beginning of the seventeenth century. Much in this book is satirical; and the satire falls on the Catholica, whom Fæneste, a mere foolish gentleman of Gascony, is made to defend against an acute Huguenot.

169

1

CHAPTER VIII.

HISTORY OF MATHEMATICAL AND PHYSICAL SCIENCE, FROM 1600 TO 1650.

SECT. I.

- Invention of Logarithms by Napier New Geometry of Kepler and Cavalieri Algebra Harriott Descartes Astronomy Kepler Galileo Copernican System begins to prevail Cartesian Theory of the World Mechanical Discoveries of Galileo Descartes Hydrostatics Optics.
- 1. In the last part of this work we have followed the progress of mathematical and physical knowledge down to the State of close of the sixteenth century. The ancient geometers had done so much in their own province of lines and figures, that little more of importance could be effected, except by new methods extending the limits of the science, or derived from some other source of invention. Algebra had yielded a more abundant harvest to the genius of the sixteenth century; yet something here seemed to be wanting to give that science a character of utility and reference to general truth; nor had the formulæ of letters and radical signs that perceptible beauty which often wins us to delight in geometrical theorems of as little apparent usefulness in their results. Meanwhile the primary laws, to which all mathematical reasonings, in their relation to physical truths, must be accommodated, lay hidden, or were erroneously conceived; and none of these latter sciences, with the exception of astronomy, were beyond their mere infancy, either as to observation or theory.
- * In this chapter my obligations to Montucla are so numerous that I shall be understood to be my principal authoseldom make particular references to bis rity as to facts.

2. Astronomy, cultivated in the latter part of the sixteenth century with much industry and success, was repressed, among other more insuperable obstacles, by of calculations that it required. The trigonometrical tables of sines, tangents, and secants, if they were to produce any tolerable accuracy in astronomical observation, must be computed to six or seven places of decimals, upon which the regular processes of multiplication and division were perpetually to be employed. The consumption of time, as well as risk of error which this occasioned, was a serious evil to the practical astronomer.

3. John Napier, laird of Merchiston, after several attempts to diminish this labour by devices of his invention, was happy enough to discover his famous method of logarithms. This he first published at Edinburgh in 1614, with the title, Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio, sen Arithmeticarum Supputationum Mirabilis Abbreviatio. He died in 1618, and in a posthumous edition, entitled Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Constructio, 1619, the method of construction, which had been at first withheld, is given; and the system itself, in consequence perhaps of the suggestion of his friend Briggs, underwent some change.

- 4. The invention of logarithms is one of the rarest instances of sagacity in the history of mankind; and Their it has been justly noticed as remarkable, that it since issued complete from the mind of its author, and has not received any improvement since his time. It is hardly necessary to say, that logarithms are a series of numbers, arranged in tables parallel to the series of natural numbers, and of such a construction, that by adding the logarithms of two of the latter we obtain the logarithm of their product; by subtracting the logarithm of one number from that of another we obtain that of their quotient. The longest processes therefore of multiplication and division are spared, and reduced to one of mere addition or subtraction.
- 5. It has been supposed that an arithmetical fact, said to be mentioned by Archimedes, and which is certainly pointed out in the work of an early German writer, Michael Stifelius, put Napier in the right course for this invention. It will at least serve to illustrate the principle of logarithms. Stifelius shows that if in a geometrical progression we add the indices of any terms in the series, we shall obtain the index of the products of those terms. Thus if we compare the geometrical progression, 1, 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, 64, with the arithmetical one which numbers the powers of the common ratio, namely, 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, we see that by adding two terms of the latter progression, as 2 and 3, to which 4 and 8 correspond in the geometrical series, we obtain 5, to which 32, the product of 4 by 8, corresponds; and the quotient would be obtained in a similar manner. But though this, which becomes self-evident, when algebraical expressions are employed for the terms of a series, seemed at the time rather a curious property of numbers in geometrical progression, it was of little value in facilitating calculation.

6. If Napier had simply considered numbers in them-Extended to selves, as repetitions of unity, which is their only intelligible definition, it does not seem that he could ever have carried this observation upon progressive series any farther. Numerically understood, the terms of a geometrical progression proceed per saltum; and in the series 2, 4, 8, 16, it is as unmeaning to say that 3, 5, 6, 7, 9, in any possible sense, have a place, or can be introduced to any purpose, as that &, 1, 1, 1, or other fractions, are true numbers at all. The case, however, is widely different when we use numbers as merely the signs of something capable of continuous increase or decrease; of space, of duration, of velocity. These are, for our convenience, divided by arbitrary intervals, to which the numerical unit is made to correspond. But as these intervals are indefinitely divisible, the unit is supposed capable of division into fractional parts, each of them a representation of the ratio which a portion of the fractor vocant, sive fractiones, esse quidam uni et nulli quisi intermedios. Sed addo, quod jam transitur er akko yeros, llespondetur cum non de quot, sed de quanto. Pertinet igitur hae responsituren propriu inquento, non tam ad quantitaten discretam, sen univerum, quam ad continuum, prout hom appointur esse qui d'continuum partes discabile, quam-tis quadem harute partinim ad totou ratio numero exprimatur. Matheus Umertanio, e. l.

^{*} Few books of arithmetic, or even algebra, draw the reader's attention at the outset to this essential distinction between discrete and continuous quantity, which is almost increto be everlooked in all their subsequent reasonings. Walls has done it properly, after stating very clearly that there are no proper numbers but integers, he meets the objection, that fractions are called in terminate numbers. Concede quriem we responder posse; concede chain mineral quos interval bears to the whole. And thus also we must see, that as fractions of the unit bear a relation to uniform quantity, so all the integral numbers, which do not enter into the terms of a geometrical progression, correspond to certain portions of variable quantity. If a body falling down an inclined plane acquires a velocity at one point which would carry it through two feet in a second, and at a lower point one which would carry it through four feet in the same time. there must, by the nature of a continually accelerated motion. be some point between these where the velocity might be represented by the number three. Hence, wherever the numbers of a common geometrical series, like 2, 4, 8, 16, represent velocities at certain intervals, the intermediate numbers will represent velocities at intermediate intervals; and thus it may be said that all numbers are terms of a geometrical progression, but one which should always be considered as what it is -a progression of continuous, not discrete quantity. capable of being indicated by number, but not number itself.

7. It was a necessary consequence, that if all numbers could be treated as terms of a progression, and if their indices could be found like those of an ordinary By Naplee. series, the method of finding products of terms by addition of indices would be universal. The means that Napier adopted for this purpose were surprisingly ingenious; but it would be difficult to make them clear to those who are likely to require it, especially without the use of lines. It may suffice to say that his process was laborious in the highest degree, consisting of the interpolation of 6931472 mean proportionals between I and 2, and repeating a similar and still more tedious operation for all prime numbers. The logarithms of other numbers were easily obtained, according to the fundamental principle of the invention, by adding their factors. Logarithms appear to have been so called, because they are the sum of these mean ratios, Loyan apillus;.

8. In the original tables of Napier the logarithm of 10 was 2.3025850. In those published afterwards (1618), he changed this for 1.0000000, making special of course that of 100, 2.0000000, and so forth.

This construction has been followed since; but those of the first method are not wholly neglected; they are called hyper-bolical logarithms, from expressing a property of that curve. Napier found a coadjutor well worthy of him in Henry Briggs, professor of geometry at Gresham college. It is uncertain from which of them the change in the form of logarithms proceeded. Briggs, in 1018, published a table of logarithms up to 1000, calculated by himself. This was followed in 1624 by his greater work, Arithmetica Logarithmica, containing the logarithms of all natural numbers as high as 20,000, and again from 90,000 to 100,000. These are calculated to fourteen places of decimals, thus reducing the error, which, strictly speaking, must always exist from the principle of logarithmical construction, to an almost infinitesimal fraction. He had designed to publish a second table, with the logarithms of sines and tangents to the 100th part of a degree. This he left in a considerably advanced state; and it was published by Gellibrand in 1633. Gunter had as early as 1620 given the logarithms of sines and tangents on the sexagesimal scale, as far as seven decimals. Vlacy, a Dutch bookseller, printed in 1628 a translation of Briggs's Arithmetica Logarithmica, filling up the interval from 20,000 to 90,000 with logarithms calculated to eleven decimals. He published also in 1683 his Trigonometrica Artificialis, the most useful work, perhaps, that had appeared, as it incorporated the labours of Briggs and Gellibrand. Kepler came like a master to the subject; and observing that some foreign mathematicians disliked the theory upon which Napier had explained the nature of logarithms, as not rigidly geometrical, gave one of his own to which they could not object. But it may probably be said that the very novelty to which the disciples of the ancient geometry were averse, the introduction of the notion of velocity into mathematical reasoning, was that which linked the abstract science of quantity with nature, and prepared the way for that expansive theory of infinites, which bears at once upon the subtlest truths that can exercise the understanding, and the most evident that can fall under the senses.

9. It was indeed at this time that the modern geometry, which, if it deviates something from the clearness and precision of the ancient, has incomparably the advantage over it in its reach of application, took its rise. Kepler was the man that led the way. He published in 1615 his Nova Stereometria Doliorum, a treatise on the capacity of casks. In this he considers the various solids which may be formed by the revolution of a segment of a conic section round a line which is not its axis, a condition not unfrequent in the form of a cask. Many of the problems which he starts he is unable to solve. But what is most remarkable in this treatise is that he here suggests the bold idea, that a circle may be deemed to be composed of an infinite number of triangles, having their bases in the circumference, and their common apex in the centre; a cone, in like manner, of infinite pyramids, and a cylinder of infinite prisms. The ancients had shown, as is well known, that a polygon inscribed in a circle, and another described about it, may, by continual bisection of their sides, be made to approach nearer to each other than any assignable differences. The circle itself lay of course between them. Euclid contents himself with saying that the circle is greater than any polygon that can be inscribed in it, and less than any polygon that can be described about it. The method by which they approximated to the curve space by continual increase or diminution of the rectilineal figure was called exhaustion, and the space itself is properly called by later geometers the limit. As curvilineal and rectilineal spaces cannot possibly he compared by means of superposition, or by showing that their several constituent portions could be made to coincide, it had long been acknowledged by the best geometers impossible to quadrate by a direct process any curve surface. But Archimedes had found, as to the parabola, that there was a rectilineal space, of which he could indirectly demonstrate that it was equal, that is, could not be unequal, to the curve itself.

10. In this state of the general problem, the ancient methods of indefinite approximation having prepared the way, keepler came to his solution of questions which regarded the capacity of vessels. According to Fabroni he supposed solids to consist of an infinite number of surfaces, surfaces of an infinity of lines, lines of infinite points.† If this he strictly true he must have left little, in point of invention, for Cavalieri. So long as geometry is employed as a method of logic, an exercise of the understanding on those modifications of quantity which the imagination cannot grasp, such as points, lines, infinites, it must appear almost an offensive absurdity to speak of a circle as a polygon with an infinite number of sides. But when it becomes the handmaid of practical art, or even of physical science, there can be no other objection, than always arises from incongruity and incorrectness of language. It has been found possible to avoid the expressions attributed to Kepler; but they seem to denote, in fact, nothing more than those of Euclid or Archimedes; that the difference between a magnitude and its limit may be regularly diminished, till without strictly vanishing it becomes less than any assignable quantity, and may consequently be disregarded in reasoning upon actual bodies.

Fabroni, Vita Italorum, i. 278.
 Idem quoque sobila cognavit ex inperhena autem ex linea inhantis, ad

11. Galileo, says Fabroni, trod in the steps of Kepler, and Adopted by in his first dialogue on mechanics, when treating of a cylinder cut out of an hemisphere, became conversant with indivisibles (familiarem habere coepit cum indivisibilibus usum). But in that dialogue he confused the metaphysical notions of divisible quantity, supposing it to be composed of unextended indivisibles; and not venturing to affirm that infinites could be equal or unequal to one another, he preferred to say, that words denoting equality or excess could only be used as to finite quantities. In his fourth dialogue on the centre of gravity, he comes back to the exhaustive method of Archimedes.

12. Cavalieri, professor of mathematics at Bologna, the generally reputed father of the new geometry, though Extended Kepler seems to have so greatly anticipated him, beet. had completed his method of indivisibles in 1626. The book was not published till 1035. His leading principle is that solids are composed of an infinite number of surfaces placed one above another as their indivisible elements. Surlineis ex infinitis punetis. Oster dit ipne quantum ca ratione brevior fieri via possit solidis, que mensuranda essent, da de-ad vera quedam esta cafaruera, cum el narentur. Fabrona, l'un Italorum, antiquarum demonstratement circuttus i. 272 ac methodus inter se comparandi figuras "Ibid.

circumeciptas et inscriptas lis planls aut

faces are formed in like manner by lines, and lines by points. This, however, he asserts with some excuse and explanation; declaring that he does not use the words so strictly, as to have it supposed that divisible quantities truly and literally consist of indivisibles, but that the ratio of solids is the same as that of an infinite number of surfaces, and the ratio of surfaces the same as that of an infinite number of lines; and to put an end to cavil, he demonstrated that the same consequences would follow if a method should be adopted, horrowing nothing from the consideration of indivisibles. This explanation seems to have been given after his method had been attacked by Guldin in 1640.

13. It was a main object of Cavalieri's geometry to demonstrate the proportions of different solids. This is partly done by Euclid, but generally in an indirect the ration manner. A cone, according to Cavalieri, is composed of an infinite number of circles decreasing from the base to the summit, a cylinder of an infinite number of equal circles. He seeks therefore the ratio of the sum of all the former to that of all the latter. The method of summing an infinite series of terms in arithmetical progression was already known. The diameters of the circles in the cone decreasing uniformly were in arithmetical progression, and the circles would be as their squares. He found that when the number of terms is infinitely great, the sum of all the squares described on lines in arithmetical progression is exactly one third of the greatest square multiplied by the number of terms. Hence the cone is one third of a cylinder of the same base and altitude, and similar proof may be given as to the ratios of other solids.

Il n'est aucun cas dans la géométrie des indiviribles, qu'on ne puisse facilement reduire à la forme ancienne de dimonitrat in. Aimi, c'est suiter i l'inserte que de chienner sur le moi d'insertes. Il est impropre ai l'on veut, mais il n'en résulte à cun dioger peur la geométrie, et loin de conduire à l'erreut, cette méthode, au contrarte, a d'entres, cette méthode, au contrarte, a des veutés qu'i avoient échappé jusqu'ains aux efforts des géometres. Montucla, vol. n. p. 39.

Non ea rigure a se voces adhiberi, so si dividios quantitatis vers se propriè ex indevish-libes contevent; recumiamen id obt lintavat velle, ut proportio solidorum entan escetae ratio superficienta omonom numero infortavato, et proportio appreficienta dengae atsantas, que contra des poterant, in radice prisocale de neustravit, cardem omono consecutiones erm, si methidi ant rationes adhibitentar omnino diverso, que midi ab induisibilium consideratione penderent. Fabraca.

14. This bolder geometry was now very generally applied in difficult investigations. A proof was given in the celebrated problems relative to the cycloid, which served as a test of skill to the mathematicians of that age. The cycloid is the curve described by a point in a circle, while it makes one revolution along an horizontal base, as in the case of a carriage wheel. It was far more difficult to determine its area. It was at first taken for the segment of a circle. Galileo considered it, but with no success. Mersenne, who was also unequal to the problem, suggested it to a very good geometer, Roberval, who after some years, in 1634, demonstrated that the area of the cycloid is equal to thrice the area of the generating circle. Mersenne communicated this discovery to Descartes, who, treating the matter as easy, sent a short demonstration of his own. On Roberval's intimating that he had been aided by a knowledge of the solution, Descartes found out the tangents of the curve, and challenged Roberval and Fermat to do the same. Fermat succeeded in this; but Roberval could not achieve the problem, in which Galileo also and Cavalieri failed; though it seems to have been solved afterwards by Viviani. "Such," says Montucla, " was the superiority of Descartes over all the geometers of his age, that questions which most perplexed them cost him but an ordinary degree of attention." In this problem of the tangents (and it might not perhaps have been worth while to mention it otherwise in so brief a sketch) Descartes made use of the principle introduced by Kepler, considering the curve as a polygon of an infinite number of sides, so that an infinitely small are is equal to its chord. The cycloid has been called by Montucla the Helen of geometers. This beauty was at least the cause of war, and produced a long controversy. The Italians claim the original invention as their own; but Montucla seems to have vindicated the right of France to every solution important in geometry. Nor were the friends of Roberval and Fermat disposed to acknowledge so much of the exclusive right of Descartes as was challenged by his disciples. Pascal, in his history of the cycloid, enters the lists on the side of Roberval. This was not published till 1658.

15. Without dwelling more minutely on geometrical treatises of less importance, though in themselves valuable, such as that of Gregory St. Vincent in 1617, or the progress of Cyclometricus of Willebrod Snell in 1621, we come algorithm to the progress of analysis during this period. The works of Victa, it may be observed, were chiefly published after the year 1600. They left, as must be admitted, not much in principle for the more splendid generalisations of Harriott and Descartes. It is not unlikely, that the mere employment of a more perfect notation would have led the acute mind of Victa to truths which seem to us who are acquainted with them but a little beyond what he discovered.

16. Briggs, in his Arithmetica Logarithmica, was the first who clearly showed what is called the Binomial Theorem, or a compendious method of involution, by means of the necessary order of co-efficients in the successive powers of a binomial quantity. Cardan had partially, and Vieta more clearly, seen this, nor, as far as his notation went, was it likely to escape the profound mind of the latter. Albert Girard, a Dutchman, in his Invention Nouvelle en Algebre, 1629, conceived a better notion of negative roots than his predecessors. Even Vieta had not paid attention to them in any solution. Girard, however, not only assigns their form, and shows that in a certain class of cubic equations there must always be one or two of this description, but uses this remarkable expression: "A negative solution means in geometry that the minus recedes as the plus advances." It seems manifest that till some such idea suggested itself to the minds of analysts, the consideration of negative roots, though they could not possibly avoid perceiving their existence, would merely have confused their solutions. It cannot therefore be surprising that not only Cardan and Vieta, but Harriott himself, should have paid little attention to them.

17. Harriott, the companion of Sir Walter Raleigh in Virginia, and the friend of the Earl of Northumberland, in whose house he spent the latter part of his life, was destined to make the last great discovery in the pure science of algebra. Though he is mentioned here after

N 2

⁹ La solution par moim s'explique recule ou le plus symee. Montuela, en geometrie en retrogradant, et le moim p. 112.

Girard, since the Artis Analyticae Praxis was not published till 1631, this was ten years after the author's death. Harriott arrived at a complete theory of the genesis of equations, which Cardan and Vieta had but partially conceived. bringing all the terms on one side, so as to make them equal to zero, he found out that every unknown quantity in an equation has as many values as the index of its powers in the first term denotes; and that these values, in a necessary sequence of combinations, form the co-efficients of the succeeding terms into which the decreasing powers of the unknown quantity enter, as they do also, by their united product, the last or known term of the equation. This discovery facilitated the solution of equations, by the necessary composition of their terms which it displayed. It was evident, for example, that each root of an equation must be a factor, and consequently a divisor, of the last term.

18. Harriott introduced the use of small letters instead of capitals in algebra; he employed vowels for unknown, consonants for known quantities, and joined them to express their product. † There is certainly not much in this; but its evident convenience renders it wonderful that it should have been reserved for so late an æra. Wallis, in his History of Algebra, ascribes to Harriott a long list of discoveries, which have been reclaimed for Cardan and Vieta, the great founders of the higher algebra, by Cossali and Montucla.1 The latter of these writers has been charged, even by foreigners, with similar injustice towards our countryman; and that he has been provoked by what he thought the unfairness of Wallis to something like a depreciation of ¹⁵⁰ pages, with very little besides examples; for his principles are shertly and obscurely laid down. Whoever is the author of the preface to this work car not be said to have suppressed or exclaimed any thoug for Harrist but what he is allowed to have deserved. Montucls justly observes, that Harriott erry rarely names an equation equal to sero, by but iging all the quantities to one side of the equation.

⁺ Oughtred, in his Clavis Mathematies, published in 1631, abbreviated the Harriott's book is a thin folio of rules of Vieta, though he still used ea-to pages, with very little bindes expital latters. He also gave succeeding uples; for his principles are shortly the praise of algebra, or the clementary rules we find in our common books, which, though what are now first had sed, were, from the angular course of a grtermined the ments of Vieta, or to have brazed lastory, discovered late. They are however given also by Harmott Wallisii Algebra.

[†] These may be found in the article Harrott of the Boguphia Brdannica. Wallis however does not suppress the honour due to Vieta quite as much as is intimated by Montuela.

Harriott, seems as clear as that he has himself robbed Cardan of part of his due credit in swelling the account of Vieta's discoveries. From the general integrity, however, of Montucla's writings, I am much inclined to acquit him of any wilful partiality.

19. Harriott had shown what were the hidden laws of algebra, as the science of symbolical notation. But Descentes. one man, the pride of France, and wonder of his contemporaries, was destined to flash light upon the labours of the analyst, and to point out what those symbols, so darkly and painfully traced, and resulting commonly in irrational or even impossible forms, might represent and explain. The use of numbers, or of letters denoting numbers, for lines and rectangles capable of division into aliquot parts, had long been too obvious to be overlooked, and is only a compendious abbreviation of geometrical proof. The next step made was the perceiving that irrational numbers, as they are called, represent incommensurable quantities; that is, if unity be taken for the side of a square, the square root of two will represent its diagonal. Gradually the application of numerical and algebraical calculation to the solution of problems respecting magnitude became more frequent and refined.* It is certain, however, that no one before Descartes had employed algebraic formulæ in the construction of curves; that is, had taught the inverse process, not only how to express diagrams by algebra, but how to turn algebra into diagrams. The ancient geometers, he observes, were scrupulous about using the language of arithmetic in geometry, which could only proceed from their not perceiving the relation between the two; and this has produced a great deal of obscurity and embarrassment in some of their demonstrations. †

20. The principle which Descartes establishes is that every curve, of those which are called geometrical, has its Harmonia fundamental equation expressing the constant reladitions tion between the absciss and the ordinate. Thus correspond to the rectangle under the abscisses of a diameter of the circle is equal to the square of the ordinate, and the other conic sections, as well as higher curves, have each their leading property, which determines their nature, and shows how they may be generated. A simple equation can only express the relation of straight lines; the solution of a quadratic must be found in one of the four conic sections; and the bigher powers of an unknown quantity lead to curves of a superior order. The beautiful and extensive theory developed by Descartes in this short treatise displays a most consummate felicity of genius. That such a man, endowed with faculties so original, should have encroached on the just rights of others, is what we can only believe with reluctance.

See note in Vol. 11, p. 220.

21. It must, however, he owned that, independently of suspected the suspicions of an unacknowledged appropriation from the of what others had thought before him, which unfortunately hang over all the writings of Descartes, he has taken to himself the whole theory of Harriott on the nature of equations in a manner which, if it is not a remarkable case of simultaneous invention, can only be reckoned a very unwarrantable plagiarism. For not only he does not name Harriott, but he evidently introduces the subject as an important discovery of his own, and in one of his letters asserts his originality in the most positive language. Still

Tant s'en faut que les choses que que je n'avois jamais fait auparavant, j'ai écrites passeut être ausment trees. Layant trouve les par hasard entre les de Viéte, qu'au contraire ce qui est cause que mon traits est difficile à entendes, e estique partaché a ny rion mettre que ce que j'ai crà n'avotr point été su ni par ha at pur ancien nutre, countre ou peut voir si on confire er que in cert da nombre des racines que sont en chaque équation, dans la page 37 4 qui est l'endrust on a commence a doncer les regles de mon algebre, avec ce que Victe en a beest tout a la fin de son livre, De Einendatione F-quatienum; ext on verra que je le determine genéralement en toutes équations, su beu que lui o'en syant thome que quel per exemples partienlarse dont il fact toutefors at grand ctat qu'il a voulu conclure son levre par la, il a montre qual ne le pouvoit determiner mains d'un do mes amis, et entre nous, ju ne trouve pas qu'i) eu nit fant su que Je pensous non obstant quis fut fert habile. This is in a letter to Merseeme in 1637. Chaven do Doscartes, vol. vi.

p. 5422. The charge of plagiarism from Harriott was brought against Deseartes in his lifetime. Robertal, when an English gentleman showed him the Artis Analytica Praxis, exchanged eagerly, It Ix via il Ia via 'It is also a very sespicoms circumstance, if true, as it appears to be, that Descrites was in England the year (16%) that Harra tt's work appeared. Carence, a friend of Robertal, in a letter to Descartes in 1649, plantly intimates to him that he has only ea, and en gentral. Et sinsi J'ai commoné où Harriott se to the nature of equations, il avoit achevé, ce que j'ai fait toutefois Gausses de Descartes, vol x p 1725, sam y penser; car j'ai plus feadleté To this accusation Descartes made no Viete depuis que j'ai reçu votre dermere reply. See Biographia Bittannica, art. Charges de Descartes, vol x p 474. To this accusation Descartes made no it is quite possible that, prepared as the way had been by Vieta, and gifted as Descartes was with a wonderfully intuitive acuteness in all mathematical reasoning, he may in this, as in other instances, have divined the whole theory by himself. Montucla extols the algebra of Descartes, that is, so much of it as can be fairly claimed for him without any precursor, very highly; and some of his inventions in the treatment of equations have long been current in books on that science. He was the first who showed what were called impossible or imaginary roots, though he never assigns them, deeming them no quantities at all. He was also, perhaps, the first who fully understood negative roots, though he still retains the appellation, false roots, which is not so good as Harriott's epithet, privative. According to his panegyrist, he first pointed out that in every equation (the terms being all on one side) which has no imaginary roots, there are as many changes of signs as positive roots, as many continuations of them as negative.

22. The geometer next in genius to Descartes, and perhaps nearer to him than to any third, was Fermat, a man of various acquirements, of high rank in the parliament of Toulouse, and of a mind incapable of envy, forgiving of detraction, and delighting in truth, with almost too much indifference to praise. The works of Fermat were not published till long after his death in 1665; but his frequent discussions with Descartes, by the intervention of their common correspondent Mersenne, render this place more appropriate for the introduction of his name. In these controversies Descartes never behaved to Fermat with the respect due to his talents; in fact, no one was ever more jealous of his own pre-eminence, or more unwilling to acknowledge the claims of those who scrupled to follow him implicitly, and who might in any manner be thought rivals of his fame. Yet it is this unhappy temper of Descartes which ought to render us more slow to credit the suspicions of his designed plagiarism from the discoveries of others; since this, combined with his unwillingness to acknowledge their merits, and affected ignorance of their writings, would form a character we should not readily ascribe to a man of great genius, and whose own writings give many apparent indications of sincerity and virtue. But in fact there was in this age a great probability of simultaneous invention in science, from developing principles that had been partially brought to light. Thus Roberval discovered the same method of indivisibles as Cavalieri, and Descartes must equally have been led to his theory of tangents by that of Kepler. Fermat also, who was in possession of his principal discoveries before the geometry of Descartes saw the light, derived from Kepler his own celebrated method, de maximis et minimis: a method of discovering the greatest or least value of a variable quantity, such as the ordinate of a curve. It depends on the same principle as that of Kepler. From this he deduced a rule for drawing tangents to curves different from that of Descartes. This led to a controversy between the two geometers, carried on by Descartes, who yet is deemed to have been in the wrong, with his usual quickness of resentment. Several other discoveries, both in pure algebra and geometry, illustrate the name of Fermat.

Harriott. The Biographic Universelle See Leibnite's catalogue of the sup-unfairly suppresses all mention of this, posed thefts of Descartes in Vol. 11. and labours to deprequate Harriott.

p. 460, of this work,

Algebraic the universal admiration it deserved. Besides its conciseness and the inroad it made on old prejudices as to geometrical methods, the general boldness of the author's speculations in physical and metaphysical philosophy, as well as his indiscreet temper, ahenated many who ought to have appreciated it; and it was in his own country, where he had ceased to reside, that Descartes had the fewest admirers. Roberval made some objections to his rival's algebra, but with little success. A commentary on the treatise of Descartes by Schooten, professor of geometry at Leyden, first appeared in 1619.

21. Among those who devoted themselves ardently and successfully to astronomical observations at the end of the sixteenth century, was John Kepler, a native of Wirtemburg, who had already shown that he was likely to inherit the mantle of Tycho Brahe. He published some astronomical treatises of comparatively small importance in the first years of the present period. But in 1609 he made an epoch in that science by his Astronomia Nova arrealoggers, or Commentaries on the Planet Mars. It had been always assumed that the heavenly bodies revolve in circular orbits round their centre, whether this were taken to be the sun or the earth. There was, however, an apparent eccentricity or deviation from this circular motion, which it had been very difficult to explain, and for this Ptolemy had devised his complex system of epicycles. No planet showed more of this eccentricity than Mars; and it was to Mars that Kepler turned his attention. After many laborious researches he was brought by degrees to the great discovery, that the motion of the planets, among which, having adopted the Copernican system, he reckoned the earth, is not performed in circular but in elliptical orbits, the sun not occupying the centre but one of the foci of the curve; and, secondly, that it is performed with such a varying velocity, that the areas described by the radius vector, or line which joins this focus to the revolving planet, are always proportional to the times. A planet, therefore, moves less rapidly as it becomes more distant from the sun. These are the first and second of the three great laws of Kepler. The third was not discovered by him till some years afterwards. He tells us himself that, on the 8th of May, 1618, after long toil in investigating the proportion of the periodic times of the planetary movements to their orbits, an idea struck his mind, which, chancing to make a mistake in the calculation, he soon rejected. But a week after, returning to the subject, he entirely established his grand discovery, that the squares of the times of revolution are as the cubes of the mean distances of the planets. This was first made known to the world in his Mysterium Cosmographicum, published in 1619; a work mingled up with many strange offusions of a mind far more eccentric than any of the planets with which it was engaged. In the Epitome Astronomiae Copernicanae, printed the same year, he endeayours to deduce this law from his theory of centrifugal forces. He had no small insight into the principles of universal gravitation, as an attribute of matter; but several of his assumptions as to the laws of motion are not consonant There seems indeed to have been a considerable degree of good fortune in the discoveries of Kepler; yet this may be deemed the reward of his indefatigable laboriousness, and of the ingenuousness with which he renounced any hypothesis that he could not reconcile with his advancing knowledge of the phenomena.

^{*} A good article on Fernat by M. Maurice, will be found in the Biographic Universelle.

25. The appearance of three comets in 1618 called once Constant more the astronomers of Europe to speculate on us to court. the nature of those anomalous bodies. They still passed for harbingers of worldly catastrophes; and those who feared them least could not interpret their apparent irregularity. Gableo, though Tycho Brahe had formed a juster notion, unfortunately took them for atmospheric meteors. Kepler, though he brought them from the far regions of space, did not suspect the nature of their orbits, and thought that, moving in straight lines, they were finally dispersed and came to nothing. But a Jesuit, Grassi, in a treatise, De Tribus Cometis, Rome, 1619, had the honour of explaining what had baffled Galileo, and first held them to be planets moving in vast ellipses round the sun.

26. But long before this time the name of Galileo had nother due become immortal by discoveries which, though they would certainly have soon been made by some other, perhaps far inferior, observer, were happily reserved for the most philosophical genius of the age. Galileo assures us that, having heard of the invention of an instrument in Holland which enlarged the size of distant objects, but knowing nothing of its construction, he began to study the theory of refractions till be found by experiment, that by means of a convex and concave glass in a tube he could magnify an object threefold. He was thus encouraged to make another which magnified thirty times; and this he exhibited in the autumn of 1609 to the inhabitants of Venice. Having made a present of his first telescope to the senate, who rewarded him with a pension, he soon constructed another; and in one of the first nights of January, 1610, directing it towards the moon, was astonished to see her surface and edges covered with inequalities. These he considered to be mountains, and judged by a sort of measurement that some of them must exceed those of the earth. His next observation was of the milky way; and this he found to derive its nebulous lustre from myriads of stars not distinguishable, through their remoteness, by the unassisted sight of man. The nebulæ in the constellation Orion he perceived to be of the same character. Before his delight at these discoveries could have subsided, he turned his telescope to Jupiter, and was surprised to remark three small stars, which, in a second night's observation, had changed their places. In the course of a few weeks, he was able to determine by their revolutions, which are very rapid, that these are secondary planets, the moons or satellites of Jupiter; and he had added a fourth to their number. These marvellous revelations of nature he hastened to announce in a work, aptly entitled Sidereus Nuncius, published in March, 1610. In an age when the fascinating science of astronomy had already so much excited the minds of philosophers, it may be guessed with what eagerness this intelligence from the heavens was circulated. A few, as usual, through envy or prejudice, affected to contemn it. But wisdom was justified of her children. Kepler, in his Narratio de observatis a se Quatuor Jovis Satellitibus, 1610, confirmed the discoveries of Galileo. Peiresc, an inferior name, no doubt, but deserving of every praise for his zeal in the cause of knowledge, having with difficulty procured a good telescope, saw the four satellites in November, 1610, and is said by Gassendi to have conceived at that time the ingenious idea that their occultations might be used to ascertain the longitude. *

[.] The Biographie Universelle, art. Grassi, ascribes this opinion to Tycho.

27. This is the greatest and most important of the discoveries of Galileo. But several others were of the deepest interest. He found that the planet Venus case by had phases, that is, periodical differences of apparent form like the moon; and that these are exactly such as would be produced by the variable reflection of the sun's light on the Copernican hypothesis; ascribing also the faint light on that part of the moon which does not receive the rays of the son, to the reflection from the earth, called by some late writers earth-shine; which, though it had been suggested by Mastlin, and before him by Leonardo da Vinci, was not generally received among astronomers. Another striking phanomenon, though he did not see the means of explaining it, was the triple appearance of Saturn, as if smaller stars were conjoined as it were like wings to the planet. This of course was the ring.

a Gassendi Vita Pekrescii, p. 77.

28. Meantime the new auxiliary of vision which had re-Spots of the vealed so many wonders could not lie unemployed in the hands of others. A publication by John Fabricovered. cius at Wittenberg in July, 1611, De Macuhs in Sole visis, announced a phænomenon in contradiction of common prejudice. The sun had passed for a body of liquid flame, or, if thought solid, still in a state of perfect ignition. Kepler had some years before observed a spot, which he unluckily mistook for the orb of Mercury in its passage over the solar orb. Fabricius was not permitted to claim this discovery as his own. Scheiner, a Jesuit, professor of mathematics at Ingolstadt, asserts in a letter dated 12th of November, 1611, that he first saw the spots in the month of March in that year, but he seems to have paid little attention to them before that of October. Both Fabricius, however, and Scheiner may be put out of the question. We have evidence, that Harriott observed the spots on the sun as early as December 8th, 1610. The motion of the spots suggested the revolution of the sun round its axis, completed in twenty-four days, as it is now determined; and their frequent alterations of form as well as occasional disappearance could only be explained by the hypothesis of a luminous atmosphere in commotion, a sea of flame, revealing at intervals the dark central mass of the sun's body which it envelops.

29. Though it cannot be said, perhaps, that the discoveries of Galileo would fully prove the Copernican system of the world to those who were already insensible to reasoning from its sufficiency to explain the phenomena, and from the analogies of nature, they served to familiarise the mind to it, and to break down the strong rampart of prejudice which stood in its way. For eighty years, it has been said, this theory of the earth's motion had been maintained without censure; and it could only be the greater boldness of Galileo in its assertion which drew down upon him the notice of the church. But, in these eighty years since the publication of the treatise of Copernicus, his proselytes had been surprisingly few. They were now becoming more numerous: several had written on that side; and Galileo had begun to form a school of Copernicans who were spreading over Italy. The Lincean society, one of the most useful and renowned of Italian academies, founded at Rome by Frederic Cesi, a young man of noble birth, in 1603, had as a fundamental law to apply themselves to natural philosophy; and it was impossible that so attractive and rational a system as that of Copernicus could fail of pleasing an acute and ingenious nation strongly bent upon science. The church, however, had taken alarm; the motion of the earth was conceived to be as repugnant to Scripture as the existence of antipodes had once been reckoned; and in 1616 Galileo, though respected, and in favour with the court of Rome, was compelled to promise that he would not maintain that doctrine in any manner. Some letters that he had published on the subject were put, with the treatise of Coperaicus and other works, into the Index Expurgatorius, where, I believe, they still remain.

Montacla, ii, 108. Hutton's Decriott and been established by Zach, in tionary, art. Harrsott. The claim of Har-Berlin Transactions for 1788. — 1842.]

So. He seems, notwithstanding this, to have flattered bimself that, after several years had elapsed, be might clude the letter of this prohibition by throw-bases, and ing the arguments in favour of the Ptolemaic and Copernican systems into the form of a dialogue. This was published in 1632; and he might, from various circum-consumptioned statem, and subtilize and versus and stam accuration explication explication expectari poducit, p. 118. It versus in fact, to have been this over-desire to prove his theory orthodox, which increased the church against it. See are extraordinary article on this subject in the eighth reproduct of the Dublin Researe (1838). Many will tolerate propositions unconsistent with orthodoxy, when they are not brought into immediate juxtaposition with it.

Drinkwater's Life of Galileo. Fabron, Vilk Ital stam, vol. i. The former seems to be installed in supposing that Galileo did not redemon to prove his system compatible with Sensitive. In a letter to Crossion, the Grand Duchess of Lascany, the author (Bronn) of the Lafe in Fabronia work tells us, he argued very elaboritrily for that purpose. In ca. v. delived epittals philosophics reader its videoet epittals philosophics reader its dissert, ut mind exam at homishus, qui omnem in secrarum literarum studio.

stances, not unreasonably hope for impunity. But his expectations were deceived. It is well known that he was compelled by the Inquisition at Rome, into whose hands he fell, to retract in the most solemn and explicit manner the propositions he had so well proved, and which he must have still believed. It is unnecessary to give a circumstantial account, especially as it has been so well done in a recent work, the Life of Galileo, by Mr. Drinkwater Bethune. The papal court meant to humiliate Galileo, and through him to strike an increasing class of philosophers with shame and terror; but not otherwise to punish one, of whom even the inquisitors must, as Italians, have been proud; his confinement, though Montucla says it lasted for a year, was very short. He continued, nevertheless, under some restraint for the rest of his life, and though he lived at his own villa near Florence, was not permitted to enter the city.

should intimidate the Copernicans, but very much should intimidate the Copernicans, but very much started so in expecting to suppress the theory. Descartes was so astomshed at hearing of the sentence on Galileo, that he was almost disposed to burn his papers, or at least to let no one see them. "I cannot collect," he says, "that he who is an Italian, and a friend of the pope, as I understand, has been criminated on any other account than for having attempted to establish the motion of the earth. I know that this opinion was formerly censured by some cardinals, but I thought I had since heard that no objection was now made to its being publicly taught even at Rome."† It seems not at all unlikely that Descartes was induced, on this account, to pretend a greater degree of difference from Copernicus than he really felt, and even to deny, in a certain Fatroni. His Life is written in good Latin, with knowledge and spirit, more than Tiraboscus has centured to display.

It appears from some of Grotius's Epostics, that Galileo had thoughts, also it is it, of weeking the protession of the United Provinces. But on account of his advanced age he gave this upfectus some constitute mancre in qualities extlocis, it potents que the sunt meoments.

mode perpeti, quan make a toti migrandi omes, et novas parandi amientas imponere. The very idea shows that he must have deeply felt the restraint imposed upon him in his country. Epist. Grot. 407, 430.

[†] Vol vs p. 239. he says here of the snotion of the earth, Ju confesse que vil est faox, tous les fondemens du ma philosophie le sont sussi.

sense of his own, the obnoxious tenet of the earth's motion. He was not without danger of a sentence against truth nearer at hand; Cardinal Richelieu having had the intention of procuring a decree of the Sorbonne to the same effect, which through the good sense of some of that society fell to the ground. †

32. The progress, however, of the Copernican theory in Europe, if it may not actually be dated from its condemnation at Rome, was certainly not at all exercise slower after that time. Gassendi rather cautiously took that side; the Cartesians brought a powerful reinforcement; Bouillaud and several other astronomers of note avowed themselves favourable to a doctrine which, though in Italy it lay under the ban of the papal power, was readily saved on this side of the Alps by some of the salutary distinctions long in use to evade that authority. I But in the middle of the seventeenth century and long afterwards, there were mathematicians of no small reputation, who struggled staunchly for the immobility of the earth; and except so far as Cartesian theories might have come in vogue, we have no reason to believe that any persons unacquainted with astronomy, either in this country or on the Continent, had embraced the system of Copernicus. Hume has censured Bacon for rejecting it; but if Bacon had not done so, he would have anticipated the rest of his countrymen by a full quarter of a century.

33. Descartes, in his new theory of the solar system, aspired to explain the secret springs of nature, while people Kepler and Galileo had merely showed their effects. "Herards By what force the heavenly bodies were impelled, by what law they were guided, was certainly a very different question from that of the orbit they described or the period of their revolution. Kepler had evidently some notion of that universally mutual gravitation which Hooke saw more clearly, and Newton established on the basis of his geometry. §

Vol. vi. p. 50.

[†] Montucla, it 297.

^{5 &}quot; If the earth and moon," he says, moving about H of the way, the earth the rest, suppose g them equally dense." By this attriction of the mean Le se-counts for tides. He compares the st-" were not retained in their orbits, they traction of the planets towards the sun to would fail one on another, the moon that of heavy bodies towards the earth

But Descartes rejected this with contempt. "For," he says, "to conceive this we must not only suppose that every portion of matter in the universe is animated, and animated by several different souls which do not obstruct one another, but that those souls are intelligent and even divine; that they may know what is going on in the most remote places without any messenger to give them notice, and that they may exert their powers there." Kepler, who took the world for a single animal, a leviathan that roared in caverus and breathed in the ocean-tides, might have found it difficult to answer this, which would have seemed no objection at all to Campanella. If Descartes himself had been more patient towards opinions which he had not formed in his own mind, that constant divine agency, to which he was, on other occasions apt to resort, could not but have suggested a sufficient explanation of the gravity of matter, without endowing it with self-agency. He had, however, fallen upon a complicated and original scheme, the most celebrated, perhaps, though not the most admirable, of the novelties which Descartes brought into philosophy.

34. In a letter to Mersenne, Jan. 9th, 1639, he shortly states that notion of the material universe, which he afterwards published in the Principia Philosophiae, states that notion of the material universe, which he "I will tell you," he says, "that I conceive, or rather I can demonstrate, that besides the matter which composes terrestrial bodies, there are two other kinds; one very subtle, of which the parts are round or nearly round like grains of sand, and this not only occupies the pores of terrestrial bodies, but constitutes the substance of all the heayeas; the other incomparably more subtle, the parts of which are so small and move with such velocity, that they have no determinate figure, but readily take at every instant that which is required to fill all the little intervals which the other does not occupy." † To this hypothesis of a double wther he was driven by his aversion to admit any vacuum in nature; the rotundity of the former corpuscles having been produced. as he fancied, by their continual circular motions, which had rubbed off their angles. This seems at present rather a clumsy hypothesis, but it is literally that which Descartes presented to the world.

35. After having thus filled the universe with different sorts of matter, he supposes that the subtler particles, formed by the perpetual rubbing off of the angles of the larger in their progress towards sphericity, increased by degrees till there was a superfluity that was not required to fill up the intervals; and this, flowing towards the centre of the system, became the sun, a very subtle and liquid body, while in like manner the fixed stars were formed in other systems. Round these centres the whole mass is whirled in a number of distinct vortices, each of which carries along with it a planet. The centrifugal motion impels every particle in these vortices at each instant to fly off from the sun in a straight line; but it is retained by the pressure of those which have already escaped and form a denser sphere beyond it. Light is no more than the effect of particles seeking to escape from the centre, and pressing one on another, though perhaps without actual motion. The planetary vortices contain sometimes smaller vortices, in which the satellites are whirled round their principal.

36. Such, in a few words, is the famous Cartesian theory, which, fallen in esteem as it now is, stood its ground on the continent of Europe for nearly a century, till the simplicity of the Newtonian system, and above all, its conformity to the reality of things, gained an undisputed predominance. Besides the arbitrary suppositions of Descartes, and the various objections that were raised against the absolute plenum of space and other parts of his theory, it has been urged that his vortices are not reconcilable, according to the laws of motion in fluids, with the relation, ascertained by Kepler, between the periods and distances of the planets; nor does it appear why the sun should be in the focus, rather than in the centre of their orbits. Yet within a few years it has seemed not impossible that a part of his bold conjectures will enter once more with soberer steps into the schools of philosophy. His doctrine as to the nature of light, improved as it was by Huygens, is daily gaining ground over that of Newton; that of a subtle æther pervading space, which in fact is nearly the same thing, is becoming a tavourite speculation, if we are not yet to call it an established truth; and the affirmative of a problem which an eminent writer has started, whether this æther has a vorticose motion round the sun, would not leave us very far from the philosophy which it has been so long our custom to turn into ridicule.

tapporter a cette propersion; d'ou il est in infeste que selon mos fonce de tientendre tatre chose par les conheurs que

[.] D'ai souvent averti que par la lumiere je c'enteral is pas tant le menvement que cette melastica on propersion que ces petits compriore a su mariar, et her collecentes sur eles que arrisent en ers que et que je dit es de tro ive acri, pour properations vol via p 193 etro plus assemnst entenda, se devod

37. The pressage of Mercury over the sun was witnessed by Gassendi in 1681. This phænomenon, though the strong of it excited great interest in that age, from its having been previously announced, so as to furnish a test of astronomical accuracy, recurs too frequently to be now considered as of high importance. The transit of Venus is much more rare. It occurred on Dec. 4. 1689, and was then only seen by Horrox, a young Englishman of extraordinary mathematical genius. There is reason to ascribe an invention of great importance, though not perhaps of extreme difficulty, that of the micrometer, to Horrox.

38. The satellites of Jupiter and the phases of Venus are have of the true principles of mechanics. These, as we have seen in the preceding volume, were very imperfectly known till he appeared; nor had the additions to that science since the time of Archimedes been important. The treatise of Galileo, Della Scienza Mecanica, has been said, I know not on what authority, to have been written in 1592. It was not published, however, till 1631, and then only in a French translation by Mersenne, the original not appearing till 1049. This is chiefly confined to statics, or the doctrine of equilibrium; it was in his dialogues on motion, Della Nuova Scienza, states of published in 1638, that he developed his great principles of the science of dynamics, the moving forces of bodies. Galileo was induced to write his treatise on mechanics, as he tells us, in consequence of the fruitless attempts he witnessed in engineers to raise weights by a small force, "as if with their machines they could cheat nature, whose instinct as it were by fundamental law is that no resistance can be overcome except by a superior force." But as one man may raise a weight to the height of a foot by dividing it into equal portions, commensurate to his power, which many men could not raise at once, so a weight, which raises another greater than itself, may be considered as doing so by successive instalments of force, during each of which it traverses as much space as a corresponding portion of the larger weight. Hence the velocity, of which space uniformly traversed in a given time is the measure, is inversely as the masses of the weights; and thus the equilibrium of the straight lever is maintained, when the weights are inversely as their distance from the fulcrum. As this equilibrium of unequal weights depends on the velocities they would have if set in motion, its law has been called the principle of virtual velocities. No theorem has been of more important utility to mankind. It is one of those great truths of science, which combating and conquering enemies from opposite quarters, prejudice and empiricism, justify the name of philosophy against both classes. The waste of labour and expense in machinery would have been incalculably greater in modern times, could we imagine this law of nature not to have been discovered; and as their misapplication prevents their employment in a proper direction, we owe, in fact, to Galileo the immense effect which a right application of it has produced. It is possible, that Galileo was ignorant of the demonstration given by Stevinus of the law of equilibrium in the inclined plane. His own is different; but he seems only to consider the case when the direction of the force is parallel to that of the plane.

30. Still less was known of the principles of dynamics than of those of statics, till Gableo came to invest the propartigate them. The acceleration of falling bodies, make whether perpendicularly or on inclined planes, was evident; but in what ratio this took place, no one had succeeded in determining, though many had offered conjectures. He showed that the velocity acquired was proportional to the time from the commencement of falling. This might now be demonstrated from the laws of motion; but Galileo, who did not perhaps distinctly know them, made use of experiment. He then proved by reasoning that the spaces traversed in falling were as the squares of the times or velocities; that their increments in equal times were as the uneven numbers, 1, 3, 5, 7, and so forth; and that the whole space was half what would have been traversed uniformly from the beginning with the final velocity. These are the great laws of accelerated and retarded motion, from which Galileo deduced most important theorems. He showed that the time in which bodies roll down the length of inclined planes is equal to that in which they would fall down the height, and in different planes is proportionate to the height; and that their acquired velocity is in the same ratios. In some propositions he was deceived; but the science of dynamics owes more to Galileo than to any one philosopher. The motion of projectiles had never been understood; be showed it to be parabolic; and in this he not only necessarily made use of a principle of vast extent, that of compound motion, which though it is clearly mentioned in one passage by Aristotle*, and may probably be implied, or even asserted, in the reasonings of others, as has been observed in another place with respect to Jordano Bruno, does not seem to have been explicitly laid down by modern writers on mechanical science, but must have seen the principle of curvilinear deflection by forces acting in infinitely small portions of time. The ratio between the times of vibration in pendulums of unequal length had early attracted Galileo's attention. But he did not reach the geometrical exactness of which this subject is capable.† He developed a new principle as to the resistance of solids to the fracture of their parts, which, though Descartes as usual treated it with scorn, is now established in philosophy. "One forms, however," says Playfair, " a very imperfect idea of this philosopher from considering the discoveries and inventions, numerous and splendid as they are, of which he was the undisputed author. It is by following his reasonings, and by pursuing the train of his thoughts, in his own elegant, though somewhat diffuse exposition of them, that we become acquainted with the fertility of his genius, with the sagacity, penetration, and comprehensiveness of his mind. The service which he rendered to real knowledge is to be estimated not only from the truths which he discovered, but from the errors which be detected; not merely from the sound principles which he established, but from the pernicious idols which he overthrew. Of all the writers who have lived in an age which was yet only emerging from ignorance and burbarism, Galileo has most entirely the tone of true philosophy, and is most free from any contamination of the times, in taste, sentiment, and opinion."

Drinkwater's Life of Galileo, p. 80.

40. Descartes, who left nothing in philosophy untouched, turned his acute mind to the science of mechanics, sometimes with signal credit, sometimes very un- of hear successfully. He reduced all statics to one principle, that it requires as much force to raise a body to a given height, as to raise a body of double weight to half the height. This is the theorem of virtual velocities in another form. In many respects he displays a jealousy of Galileo, and an unwillingness to acknowledge his discoveries, which puts himself often in the wrong. "I believe," he says, "that the velocity of very heavy bodies which do not move very quickly in descending increases nearly in a duplicate ratio; but I deny that this is exact, and I believe that the contrary is the case when the movement is very rapid."† This recourse to the air's resistance, a circumstance of which Galileo was well aware, in order to diminish the credit of a mathematical theorem, is unworthy of Descartes; but it occurs more than once in his letters. He maintained also, against the theory of Gableo, that bodies do not begin to move with an infinitely small velocity, but have a certain degree of motion at the first instance, which is afterwards accelerated. In this too, as he meant to extend his theory to falling bodies, the consent of philosophers has decided the question against him. It was a corollary from these notions that he demes the increments of spaces to be according to the progression of uneven numbers. § mente après de bequeoup, et c'est de cytte augmentation que sient la force de la percussion sur 181.

[·] Preliminary Dissertation to Enevclop. Bretan.

[†] Charres de Descartes, vol. v. n. p. 24. Il faut seront, quanque Galden et quelques autres disent au contraire, que les o spir qui con mentrat à descer fre, ou d se monerair en quelque facou que ce sort, ne passent point par tou les digres de tardirete; mais que des le premier moment ils ont certaine viteser qui s'ang-

⁴ Cette proportion d'augmentation selon les con les impaire, 1, 3, 1, ", &c qui est dans Cuides, et que je crois vous aver ansecuente autre que peut cire veue, qu'en supprent deux ou trois choses qui sont tres fa ssess dont l'ane est que le mouvement croisse par degrés

Nor would be allow that the velocity of a body augments its force, though it is a concomitant.*

41. Descartes, however, is the first who laid down the laws of motion; especially that all bodies persist in their present state of rest or uniform rectilineal motion till affected by some force. Many had thought, as the vulgar always do, that a continuance of rest was natural to bodies, but did not perceive that the same principle of inertia or inactivity was applicable to them in rectilineal motion. Whether this is deducible from theory, or depends wholly on experience, by which we ought to mean experiment, is a question we need not discuss. The fact, however, is equally certain; and hence Descartes inferred that every curvilinear deflection is produced by some controlling force, from which the body strives to escape in the direction of a tangent to the curve. The most erroneous part of his mechanical philosophy is contained in some propositions as to the collision of bodies, so palpably incompatible with obvious experience that it seems truly wonderful he could ever have adopted them. But he was led into these paradoxes by one of the arbitrary hypotheses which always governed him. He fancied it a necessary consequence from the immutability of the divine nature that there should be at all times the same quantity of motion in the universe; and rather than abandon this singular assumption he did not hesitate to assert, that two hard bodies striking each other in opposite directions would be reflected with no loss of velocity; and, what is still more outrageously paradoxical, that a smaller body is incapable of communicating motion to a greater; for example, that the red billiard-ball cannot put the white into motion. This manifest absurdity he endeavoured to remove by the arbitrary supposition, that when we see, as we constantly do, the reverse of his theorem take place, it is owing to the air, which, according to him, renders bodies more susceptible of motion than they would naturally be.

depuis to plus lent, ainsi que le songe probably perplexed by the metaphysical Galder et l'autre que la résistance de l'air motion of causation, which he knew not nempes he peant, vol ix p. 412 how to averible to more velocity. The fact that i created velocity is a condition or at tree do to all sugmented force rould not be doubted.

fremposte point, sol is p. 113.

* Je point que la ritione sont par la cause de l'acgmentation de la Gree, en core qu'elle l'accon pagne tougairs. Id p. 156. See also vol van p. 14. He way

42. Though Galileo, as well as others, must have been acquainted with the laws of the composition of moving forces, it does not appear that they had of congents ever been so distinctly enumerated as by Descartes, in a passage of his Dioptrics. That the doctrine was in some measure new may be inferred from the objections of Fermat; and Clerselier, some years afterwards, speaks of persons "not much versed in mathematics, who cannot understand an argument taken from the nature of compound motion."+

43. Roberval demonstrated what seems to have been assumed by Galileo, and is immediately deducible from the composition of forces, that weights on an composition oblique or crooked lever balance each other, when they are inversely as the perpendiculars drawn from the centre of motion to their direction. Fermat, more versed in geometry than physics, disputed this theorem which is now quite elementary. Descartes, in a letter to Mersenne, ungraciously testifies his agreement with it. 1 Torricelli, the most illustrious disciple of Galileo, established that when weights balance each other in all positions, their common centre of gravity does not ascend or descend, and conversely.

4-1. Galileo in a treatise entitled Delle Cose che stanno nell' Acqua, lays down the principles of hydrostatics already established by Stevin, and among others what is called the hydrostatical paradox. Whether he was acquainted with Stevin's writings may be perhaps doubted; it does not appear that he mentions them. The more difficult science of hydraulics was entirely created by two disciples of Galileo, Castellio and Torricelli. It is one every where of high importance, and especially in Italy. The work of Castellio, Della Misura dell' Acque Correnti, bear to think that another, even though not an onemy, had discovered any thoug. de cens qui d'ect que pendre mot se une close red nie que de soule r'empendire quend ment in retiene reciproca propositi ul propositi de l'est d'est de la companie quend ment in retiene reciproca propositi ul propositi de l'est d'est de la companie que de soule r'empendire de la companie del companie de la companie del companie de la reas of those littlenesses which appear too it as autors is dissocstrated in all our

Vol v. p. 18.

[†] Vol. vi. p. 508 † Jo suis de l'openion, says Descartes, frequently in the litters, and in xi, his elementary books on mechanics, terrings. Descartes, in fact, could not and a continuation, were published at Rome, in 1628. His practical skill in hydraulics, displayed in carrying off the stagnant waters of the Arno, and in many other public works, seems to have exceeded his theoretical science. An error, into which he fell, supposing the velocity of fluids to be as the height down which they had descended, led to false results. Torricelli proved that it was as the square root of the altitude. The latter of these two was still more distinguished by his discovery of the barometer. The principle of the syphon or sucking-pump, and the impossibility of raising water in it more than about thirty-three feet, were both well known; but even Galileo had recourse to the clumsy explanation that nature limited her supposed horror of a vacuum to this altitude. It occurred to the sagacity of Torricelli that the weight of the atmospheric column pressing upon the fluid which supplied the pump was the cause of this rise above its level; and that the degree of rise was consequently the measure of that weight. That the air had weight was known indeed to Galileo and Descartes; and the latter not only had some notion of determining it by means of a tube filled with mercury, but in a passage which seems to have been much overlooked, distinctly suggests as one reason why water will not rise above eighteen brasses in a pump, "the weight of the water which counterbalances that of the air." . Torricelli happily thought of using mercury, a fluid thirteen times heavier, instead of water, and thus invented a portable instrument by which the variations of the mercurial column might be readily observed. These he found to fluctuate between certain well known limits, and in circumstances which might justly be ascribed to the variations of atmospheric gravity. This discovery he made in 1643; and in 1648, Pascal, by his celebrated experiment on the Puy de Dome, established the theory of atmospheric pressure beyond dispute. He found a considerable difference in the height of the mercury at the bottom and the top of that mountain; and a smaller yet perceptible variation was proved on taking the barometer to the top of one of the loftiest churches in Paris.

Vol. vii. p. 437.

45. The science of optics was so far from falling behind other branches of physics in this period, that, including the two great practical discoveries which coveries of illustrate it, no former or later generation has witnessed such an advance. Kepler began, in the year 1604, by one of his first works, Paralipomena ad Vitellionem, a title somewhat more modest than he was apt to assume. In this supplement to the great Polish philosopher of the middle ages, he first explained the structure of the human eye, and its adaptation to the purposes of vision. Porta and Maurolycus had made important discoveries, but left the great problem untouched. Kepler had the sagacity to perceive the use of the retina as the canvas on which images were painted. In his treatise, says Montucla, we are not to expect the precision of our own age; but it is full of ideas novel and worthy of a man of genius. He traced the causes of imperfect vision in its two principal cases, where the rays of light converge to a point before or behind the retina. Several other optical phenomena are well explained by Kepler; but he was unable to master the great enigma of the science, the law of refraction. To this he turned his attention again in 1611, when he published a treatise on Dioptrics. He here first laid the foundation of that science. The angle of refraction, which Maurolycus had supposed equal to that of incidence, Descartes assumed to be one third of it; which, though very erroneous as a general theorem, was sufficiently accurate for the sort of glasses he employed. It was his object to explain the principle of the telescope; and in this he well succeeded. That ad- the telemirable invention was then quite recent. Whatever endeavours have been made to carry up the art of assisting vision by means of a tube to much more ancient times, it seems to be fully proved that no one had made use of combined lenses for that purpose. The slight benefit which a hollow tube affords by obstructing the lateral ray must have been early familiar, and will account for passages which have been construed to imply what the writers never dreamed of.*

^{*} Even Dittens, whose sole aim is to that the ancients made use of glasses to depreciate those whom modern source institution. Origine des Decouvertes, has most revered, cannot pretend to show.

The real inventor of the telescope is not certainly known. Metius of Alkmaer long enjoyed that honour; but the best claim seems to be that of Zachary Jens, a dealer in spectacles at Middlehurg. The date of the invention, or at least of its publicity, is referred beyond dispute to 1609. The news of so wonderful a novelty spread rapidly through Europe; and in the same year Galileo, as has been mentioned, having heard of the discovery, constructed, by his own sagacity, the instrument which he exhibited at Venice. It is, however, unreasonable to regard himself as the inventor; and in this respect his Italian panegyrists have gone too far. original sort of telescope, and the only one employed in Europe for above thirty years, was formed of a convex objectglass with a concave eye-glass. This, however, has the disadvantage of diminishing too much the space which can be taken in at one point of view; "so that," says Montucla, "one can hardly believe that it could render astronomy such service as it did in the hands of a Galileo or a Scheiner." Kepler saw the principle upon which another kind might be framed with both glasses convex. This is now called the astronomical telescope, and was first employed a little before the middle of the century. The former, called the Dutch telescope, is chiefly used for short spying glasses.

40. The microscope has also been ascribed to Galileo; of his having known the previous invention. It appears, however, to have originated, like the telescope, in Holland, and perhaps at an earlier time. Cornelius Drebbel, who exhibited the microscope in London about 1620, has often passed for the inventor. It is suspected by Montucla that the first microscopes had concave eye-glasses; and that the present form with two convex glasses is not older than the invention of the astronomical telescope.

47. Autonio de Dominis, the celebrated archbishop of Spalato, in a book published in 1611, though written several years before, De Radiis Lucis in Vitris Perspectivis et Iride, explained more of the phænomena of the rambow than was then understood. The varieties of colour had baffled all inquirers, though the bow itself was well known to be the reflection of solar light from drops of rain.

Antonio de Dominis, to account for these varieties, had recourse to refraction, the known means of giving colour to the solar ray; and guiding himself by the experiment of placing between the eye and the sun a glass bottle of water, from the lower side of which light issued in the same order of colours as in the rainbow, he inferred that after two refractions and one intermediate reflection within the drop, the ray came to the eye tinged with different colours, according to the angle at which it had entered. Kepler, doubtless ignorant of de Dominis's book, had suggested nearly the same. "This, though not a complete theory of the rainbow, and though it left a great deal to occupy the attention, first of Descartes, and afterwards of Newton, was probably just, and carried the explanation as far as the principles then understood allowed it to go. The discovery itself may be considered as an anomaly in science, as it is one of a very refined and subtle nature, made by a man who has given no other indication of tnuch scientific sagacity or acuteness. In many things his writings show great ignorance of principles of optics well known in his time, so that Boscovich, an excellent judge in such matters, has said of him, "Homo opticarum rerum supra quod patiatur ea setas imperitissimus." Montuela is hardly less severe on de Dominis, who in fact was a man of more ingenious than solid understanding.

48. Descartes announced to the world in his Dioptrics, 1637, that he had at length solved the mystery property of which had concealed the law of refraction. He law of refraction. He law of research showed that the sine of the angle of incidence at which the ray enters, has, in the same medium, a constant ratio to that of the angle at which it is refracted, or bent in passing through. But this ratio varies according to the medium; some having a much more refractive power than others. This was a law of beautiful simplicity as well as extensive usefulness; but such was the fatality, as we would desire to call it, which attended Descartes, that this discovery had been indisputably made twenty years before by a Dutch geometer of great reputation, Willebrod Snell. The treatise of Snell had never been published; but we have the evidence both of Vossius and Huygens, that Hortensius, a Dutch professor, had publicly taught the discovery of his countryman. Descartes had long lived in Holland; privately, it is true, and by his own account reading few books; so that in this, as in other instances, we may be charitable in our suspicions; yet it is unfortunate that he should perpetually stand in need of such indulgence.

[.] Playfair, Dissertation on Physical Philosophy, p. 119.

49. Fermat did not inquire whether Descartes was the original discoverer of the law of refraction, but disputed its truth. Descartes, indeed, had not contented himself with experimentally ascertaining it, but, in his usual manner, endeavoured to show the path of the ray by direct reasoning. The hypothesis he brought forward seemed not very probable to Fermat, nor would it be permitted at His rival, however, fell into the same error; and starting from an equally dubious supposition of his own, endeavoured to establish the true law of refraction. He was surprised to find that, after a calculation founded upon his own principle, the real truth of a constant ratio between the sines of the angles came out according to the theorem of Descartes. Though he did not the more admit the validity of the latter's hypothetical reasoning, he finally retired from the controversy with an elegant compliment to his adversary.

50. In the Dioptrics of Descartes, several other carious theorems are contained. He demonstrated that there are peculiar curves, of which lenses may be constructed, by the refraction from whose superficies all the incident rays will converge to a focal point, instead of being spread, as in ordinary lenses, over a certain extent of surface. commonly called its spherical aberration. The effect of employing such curves of glass would be an increase of illumination, and a more perfect distinctness of image. These curves were called the ovals of Descartes; but the elliptic or hyperbolic speculum would answer nearly the same purpose. The latter kind has been frequently attempted; but, on account of the difficulties in working them, if there were no other objection, none but spherical lenses are in use. In Descartes's theory, he explained the equality of the angles of incidence and reflection in the case of light, correctly as to the result, though with the assumption of a false principle of his own, that no motion is lost in the collision of hard bodies such as he conceived light to be. Its perfect elasticity makes his demonstration true.

51. Descartes carried the theory of the rainbow beyond the point where Antonio de Dominis had left it. Theory of He gave the true explanation of the outer bow, by the rainbow. a second intermediate reflection of the solar ray within the drop: and he seems to have answered the question most naturally asked, though far from being of obvious solution, why all this refracted light should only strike the eye in two arches with certain angles and diameters, instead of pouring its prismatic lustre over all the rain-drops of the cloud. He found that no pencil of light continued, after undergoing the processes of refraction and reflection in the drop, to be composed of parallel rays, and consequently to possess that degree of density which fits it to excite sensation in our eyes, except the two which make those angles with the axis drawn from the sun to an opposite point at which the two bows are perceived.

CHAPTER IX.

HISTORY OF SOME OTHER PROVINCES OF LITERATURE, FROM 1600 TO 1650.

SECT. I. - ON NATURAL HISTORY.

Zoology - Fabricius on Language of Brutes - Botany.

1. The vast collections of Aldrovandus on zoology, though they may be considered as representing to us the knowledge of the sixteenth century, were, as has been seen before, only published in a small part before its close. The fourth and concluding part of his Ornithology appeared in 1603; the History of Insects in 1604. Aldrovandus himself died in 1605. The posthumous volumes appeared in considerable intervals: that on molluscous animals and zoophytes in 1606; on fishes and cetacea in 1613; on whole-hoofed quadrupeds in 1616; on digitate quadrupeds both viviparous and oviparous, in 1637; on serpents in 1640; and on cloven-hoofed quadrupeds in 1642. There are also volumes on plants and minerals. These were all printed at Bologna, and most of them afterwards at Frankfort; but a complete collection is very rare.

2. In the Exotica of Clusius, 1605, a miscellaneous volume on natural history, chiefly, but not wholly, consisting of translations or extracts from older works, we find several new species of simiæ, the manis, or scaly antenter of the old world, the three-toed sloth, and one or two armadillos. We may add also the since extinguished race, that phænix of ornithologists, the much-lamented dodo. This portly bird is delineated by Clusius, such as it then existed in the Mauritius.

S. In 1648, Piso on the Materia Medica of Brazil, together with Marcgraf's Natural History of the same Read country, was published at Leyden, with notes by De Marcgraf are good, and enable us to identify the animals. They correct the imperfect notions of Gesner, and add several species which do not appear in his work, or perhaps in that of Aldrovandus: such as the tamandua, or Brasilian ant-cater; several of the family of cavies; the coati-mondi, which Gesner had perhaps meant in a defective description; the lama, the pacos, the jaguar, and some smaller feline animals; the prehensile porcupine, and several ruminants. But some, at least, of these had been already described in the histories of the West Indies, by Hernandez d'Oviedo, Acosta, and Herrera.

4. Jonston, a Pole of Scots origin, collected the information of his predecessors in a Natural History of Animals, published in successive parts from 1048 to 1052. The History of Quadrupeds appeared in the latter year. "The text," says Cuvier, "is extracted, with some taste, from Gesner, Aldrovandus, Marcgraf, and Mouffet; and it answered its purpose as an elementary work in natural history, till Linnæus taught a more accurate method of classifying, naming, and describing animals. Even Linuary cites him continually." I find in Jonston a pretty good account of the chimpanzee, (Orang-otang Indorum, ab Augola delatus,) taken perhaps from the Observationes Medicae of Tulpius. † The delineations in Jonston being from copper-plates, are superior to the coarse wood-cuts of Gesner, but fail sometimes very greatly in exactness. In his notions of classification, being little else than a compiler,

* Biogr. Univ.

In the description of Homo Tra-glodytes, as Linneus denominates the champarace of Angola, we find alarming intinstitions. Cogetar, ratiocinatur, credit sur easier factain technicum, se abquando iteram fore imperatition, is included periogra stordius multis. Systems Natura Biolin. 1200. I rather believe this his been left out by Gueira. But perhaps it was only a dry way of turning travillers into redicate.

⁴ Gratius, Epist ad Gallos, p. 21, gives an account of a chimpatized, monatum harmonic dicara an house of and referent of Inheus. The deals of Greatum as to the possible humanity of this quant son he temperatural heating reads, is not so atrange as the much graver language of Laminuss.

it may be supposed that be did not advance a step beyond his predecessors. The Theatrum Insectorum by Mouffet, an English physician of the preceding century, was published in 1634; it seems to be compiled in a considerable degree from the unpublished papers of Gesner and foreign naturalists, whom the author has rather too servilely copied. Haller, however, is said to have placed Mouffet above all entomologists before the age of Swammerdam.

5. We may place under the head of zoology a short essay by Fabricius de Aquapendente on the language of on the lan- brutes; a subject very curious in itself, and which has by no means sufficiently attracted notice even in this experimental age. It cannot be said that Fabricius enters thoroughly into the problem, much less exhausts it. He divides the subject into six questions: - 1. Whether brutes have a language, and of what kind: 2. How far it differs from that of man, and whether the languages of different species differ from one another: 3. What is its use: 4. In what modes animals express their affectious: 5. What means we have of understanding their language: 6. What is their organ of speech. The affirmative of the first question he proves by authority of several writers, confirmed by experience, especially of hunters, shepherds, and cowherds, who know by the difference of sounds what animals mean to express. It may be objected that brutes utter sounds, but do not speak. But this is merely as we define speech; and he attempts to show that brutes by varying their utterance do all that we do by literal sounds. This leads to the solution of the second question. Men agree with brutes in having speech, and in forming elementary sounds of determinate time; but ours is more complex; these elementary sounds, which he calls articulos, or joints of the voice, being quicker and more numerous. Man, again, forms his sounds they are in both construe called Bowkrickets, or Baulm-krickets," p. 989. This translation is subjoined to Topsell's History of Four-footed Brasts, collected out of Gestier and others, in an edition of 1658. The first edition of Topsell's very ordinary composition was in 1818.

[•] Biogr. Univ. Chalmers. I am no judge of the mersts of the book, but if the following sentence of the English translation does it no aujustice, Monthst must have taken little pairs to do more than transcribe — "In Germany and Logland I do not hear that there are any granhoppers at all; but if there be, more by means of the lips and tongue, which are softer in him than they are in brutes. Hence his speech runs into great variety and complication, which we call language, while that of animals within the same species is much more uniform.

6. The question as to the use of speech to brutes is not difficult. But he seems to confine this utility to the expression of particular emotions, and does not meddle with the more curious inquiry, whether they have a capacity of communicating specific facts to one another; and if they have, whether this is done through the organs of the voice. The fourth question is, in how many modes animals express their feelings. These are by look, by gesture, by sound, by voice, by language. Fabricius tells us that he had seen a dog, meaning to expel another dog from the place he wished himself to occupy, begin by looking fierce, then use meaning gestures, then growl, and finally bark. Inferior animals, such as worms, have only the two former sorts of communication. Fishes, at least some kinds, have a power of emitting a sound, though not properly a voice; this may be by the fins or gills. To insects also he seems to deny voice, much more language, though they declare their feelings by sound. Even of oxen, stags, and some other quadrupeds, he would rather say that they have voice than language. But cats, dogs, and birds, have a proper language. All, however, are excelled by man, who is truly called account from his more clear and distinct articulations.

7. In the fifth place, however difficult it may appear to understand the language of brutes, we know that they understand what is said to them; how much more therefore ought we, superior in reason, to understand them. He proceeds from hence to an analysis of the passions, which he reduces to four; joy, desire, grief, and fear. Having thus drawn our map of the passions, we must ascertain by observation what are the articulations of which any species of animals is capable, which cannot be done by description. His own experiments were made on the dog and the heu. Their articulations are sometimes complex; as, when a dog wants to come into his master's chamber, he begins by a shrill small yelp, expressive of desire, which becomes deeper, so as to denote a mingled desire and annoyance, and ends in a lamentable howl of the latter feeling alone. Fabricius gives several other rules deduced from observation of dogs, but ends by confessing that he has not fully attained his object, which was to furnish every one with a compendious method of understanding the language of animals: the inquirer must therefore proceed upon these rudiments, and make out more by observation and good canine society. He shows, finally, from the different structure of the organs of speech, that no brute can ever rival man; the chief instrument being the throat, which we use only for vowel sounds. Two important questions are hardly touched in this little treatise; first, as has been said, whether brutes can communicate specific facts to each other; and, secondly, to what extent they can associate ideas with the language of man. These ought to occupy our excellent naturalists.

8. Columna, belonging to the Colonna family, and one of the greatest botanists of the sixteenth century, maintained the honour of that science during the present period, which his long life embraced. In the academy of the Lincei, to which the revival of natural philosophy is greatly due, Columna took a conspicuous share. His Ecphrasis, a history of rare plants, was published in two parts at Rome, in 1606 and 1616. In this he laid down the true basis of the science, by establishing the distinction of genera, which Gesner, Cæsalpin, and Joachim Camerarius had already conceived, but which it was left for Columna to confirm and employ. He alone, of all the contemporary botamsts, seems to have appreciated the luminous ideas which Casalpin had bequeathed to posterity. In his posthumous observations on the natural history of Mexico by Hernandez, he still farther developed the philosophy of botanical arrangements. Columna is the first who used copper instead of wood to delineate plants; an improvement which soon became general. This was in the Ourofaganos, sive Plantarum aliquot Historia, 1594. There are errors in this work; but it is remarkable for the accuracy of the descriptions, and for the correctness and beauty of the figures. †

9. Two brothers, John and Gaspar Bauhm, inferior in philosophy to Columna, made more copious additions to the nomenclature and description of plants. The elder, who was born in 1541, and had acquired some celebrity as a botanist in the last century, lived to complete, but not to publish, an Historia Plantarum Universalis, which did not appear till 1650. It contains the descriptions of 5000 species, and the figures of 8577, but small and illexecuted. His brother, though much younger, had preceded him, not only by the Phytopinax in 1596, but by his chief work, the Pinax Theatri Botanici, in 1623. "Gaspar Baulin," says a modern botanist, " is inferior to his brother in his descriptions and in sagacity; but his delineations are better, and his synonyms more complete. They are both below Clusius in description, and below several older botanists in their figures. In their arrangement they follow Lobel, and have neglected the lights which Cæsalpin and Columna had held out. Their chief praise is to have brought together a great deal of knowledge acquired by their predecessors, but the merit of both has been exaggerated."

[·] Biogr. Univ.

10. Johnson, in 1636, published an edition of Gerrard's Herbal, But the Theatrum Botanicum of Parkinson, in 1640, is a work, says Pulteney, of much more originality than Gerrard's, and it contains abundantly more matter. We find in it near 3800 plants; but many descriptions recur more than once. The arrangement is in seventeen classes, partly according to the known or supposed qualities of the plant, and partly according to their external character.† "This heterogeneous classification, which seems to be founded on that of Dodoens, shows the small advances that had been made towards any truly scientific distribution; on the contrary, Gerard, Johnson, and Parkinson, had rather gone back, by not sufficiently pursuing the example of Lobel."

Cusarer performed for zoology, J.cin racy and critical judgment which can Bauhin effected in hotany. It is, in ally be exhibited by supersor talents." real ty, a repository of all that was valuable in the ancients, in his immediate.

† P 146 predecessors, and in the discoveries of his Biogr. Univ Pultency speaks more own time, relating to the history of ve-biguly of J has Banken " That which getables, and is exceeded with that accugetables, and is excented with that accu-

SECT. II. - ON ANATOMY AND MEDICINE.

Claims of early Writers to the Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood -Hurvey - Lacteal Vessels discovered by Aselins - Medicine.

11. The first important discovery that was made public in this century was that of the valves of the veins; which is justly ascribed to Fabricius de Aquapendente, a professor at Padua; because, though some of these valves are described even by Berenger, and further observations were made on the subject by Sylvius, Vesalius, and other auatomists, yet Fallopius himself had in this instance thrown back the science by denying their existence, and no one before Fabricius had generalised the discovery. This he did in his public lectures as early as 1524; but his tract De Venarum Ostiolis appeared in 1603. This discovery, as well as that of Harvey, has been attributed to Father Paul Sarpi, whose immense reputation in the north of Italy accredited every tale favourable to his glory. But there seems to be no sort of ground for either supposition.

12. The discovery of a general circulation in the blood has done such honour to Harvey's name, and has been claimed for so many others, that it deserves more consideration than we can usually give to anatomical According to Galen, and the general theory of anatomists formed by his writings, the arterial blood flows from the heart to the extremities, and returns again by the same channels, the venous blood being propelled, in like manner, to and from the liver. The discovery attributed to Harvey was, that the arteries communicate with the veins, and that all the blood returns to the heart by the latter vessels. Besides this general or systemic circulation, there is one called the pulmonary, in which the blood is carried by certain arteries through the lungs, and returned again by corresponding veins, preparatory to its being sent into the general sanguineous system; so that its course is through a double series of ramified vessels, each beginning and terminating at the heart, but not at the same side of the heart; the left side, which from a cavity called its ventricle throws out the arterial blood by the aorta, and by another called its auricle receives that which has passed through the lungs by the pulmonary vein, being separated by a solid septum from the right side, which, by means of similar cavities, receives the blood of all the veins, excepting those of the lungs, and throws it out into the pulmonary artery. It is thus evident, that the word pulmonary circulation is not strictly proper, there being only one for the whole body.

13. The famous work of Servetus, Christianismi Restitutio, has excited the attention of the literary part of the world, not only by the unhappy fate it brought upon the author, and its extreme scarcity, but by a remarkable passage wherein he has been supposed to describe the circulation of the blood. That Servetus had a just idea of the pulmonary circulation and the aeration of the blood in the lungs, is manifest by this passage, and is denied by no one; but it has been the opinion of anatomists that he did not apprehend the return of the mass of the blood through the

In the first edition of this work, I remarked, vol i. p 456; that Levasseur had come much nearer to the theory of a general corrulation than Servetus. But the passage in Levasseur, which I know only from the quotation in Portal, Hist de l'Anatonne, i, 17 h, does not, on consulting the book itself, bear out the inference which Portal seems to de duce, and the has, not quite rightly, mutted all expressions which be thought erroneous. Thus Levisseur procedes the first sentence of Portal's quotation by the following Intus (to corde) sunt sinus seu ventrieufi duo tantum, septo quedam media discreta, per cujus forumena sangois et spiritus communicatur. In atroque due vasa balantur. For this he quotes Galen; and the perforation of the septurn of the heart is known to be one of Galen's errors. Upon the whole, there seems no ground for believing that Levasseur was acquainted with the general circulation, and though his language may at lirst lead us to believe that he speaks of that through the lungs, even threes not autmetly made ont. Sprengel, in his History of Medicine, does not mention the name of Lerusseur (or Vasseem, as he was called in Latin , among those who anticipated in any degree the discovery of circulation. The book quoted by Portal is Vasseus in Anatomen Corports Humani Inhula Quatuor several times printed between 1540 and 1560.

veins to the right auricle of the heart."

Andres (Origino e Progressio d'ogni Litteratura, vol. xiv. p. 37.) has put in a claim for a Spanish farrier, by name Reina, who, in a book printed in 1552, but of which there steins to have been an earlier edition (Libro di Manisealchivia hecho y ordenado por Francisco de la Reyna), asserts in few and plain words, as Andres quotes them in Italian, that the blood goes in a circle through all the limbs. I do not know that the book has been wen by any one class, and it would be desnable to cramine the context, ance other writers have seemed to know the truth without really apprehending it.

That Servetus was only acquainted with the pulmonary circulation, his been the general opinion. Portal, though in one place he speaks with less precession, repeatedly limits the discovery to this; and Sprengel does not cutvitain the lenst suspicion that it west farther. Andrew, (xiv 18.), not certainly a medical authority, but conversant with such, and

14. Columbus is acknowledged to have been acquainted to Columbus. With the pulmonary circulation. He says of his own discovery, that no one had observed or consigned it to writing before. Arantius, according to Portal, has described the pulmonary circulation still better than Columbus, while Sprengel denies that he has described it at all. It is perfectly certain, and is admitted on all sides, that Columbus did not know the systemic circulation: in what manner he disposed of the blood does not very clearly appear; but, as he conceived a passage to exist between the ventricles of the heart, it is probable, though his words do not lead to this inference, that he supposed the aerated blood to be transmitted back in this course.

very partial to Spanish claimants, asserts the same. If a more general language may be found in some written, it may be excited to their want of distingualing the two occulations. A med oil friend who, at my request, perssed and constdered the passage in Servetus, as it is quoted in Allwoorden's life, says in a fetter, " All that this passage implies which has any reference to the greater ourculation, may be compressed as the following points - 1 If at the heart transmits a virilying principle along the arteries and the blood which they contain to the anastorioung veins: 2. That this fring principle vivilies the liver and the renous system generally. 3 That the liver produces the blood itself, and transmits it through the venu cava to the heart, in order to obtain the vital principle, by performing the lesser circulation which Servetice we me perfectly to comprehend.

"Now, according to this view of the passages all the issuement of the blood implied is that which takes place from the liver, through the vena ears to the least, and that of the leaser cerealation. It would appear to my that Servetus is on the brink of the discovery of the transcension of his "vital's spiritual discreted his attention from that great moreover of the blood disclf, which flar-vey discountered. It is clear, that the quantity of blood sent to the least for the claboration of the vital's spiritual according to Servetus, only that farmanded by the liver to the same arm inferior. But the blood thus introduced is represented by him as performing the circulation through the lungs very regularis.

It appears singular that, while Servetus distinctly knew that the septian of the beart, paries alle medius, as he calls it, is closed, which Bearinger had discovered, and Vesidius ei infirmed i though the bilk of anatomists long afterwards adhered to Calen's notion of perferastion), and consequently that some other means must exist for restoring the blood from the left devision of the heart to the right, he should not have seen the necessary of a system of vessels to carry forward this communication.

" The leading passage in Columbus, (De Re Anatom ca, lib. vii p 17" edit. 1519,) which I have not found quoted by Portal or Sprengel, is as follows -Leter how ventracides septum adext, per quod fere omnes existment suga ni a dextro ventriculo ad sinastrum ad tum patcheri, id ut fleret facilius, in transitu ob vitil am spratuane generationem demana redde, sed lengs creant sa, nam sangula per niterioram venam ad pulmonen fertier, chique altezuntur, inde cura acce una per atternam venalem ad substrum cords ventriculum defertur; quod nemo bacteros aut arimadserth aut scriptum rempuit, licet maxime et ab carnites an madvertendum. He afterwards makes a remark, in which Servetin had precished him, that the size of the pulm mary artery (semi arteriesa) is greater than would be required for the be knew of the lange alone. Whether he knew of the jamages in Servictor or 15. Casalpin, whose versatile genius entered upon every field of research, has, in more than one of his and to Catreatises relating to very different topics, and especially in that upon plants, some remarkable passages on the same subject, which approach more nearly than any we have seen to a just notion of the general circulation, and have led several writers to insist on his claim as a prior discoverer to Harvey. Portal admits that this might be regarded as a fair pretension, if he were to judge from such passages; but there are others which contradict this supposition, and show Casalpin to have had a confused and imperfect idea of the office of the veins. Sprengel, though at first he seems to incline more towards the pretensions of Casalpin, comes ultimately almost to the same conclusion; and giving the reader the words of most importance, leaves him to form his own judgment. The Italians are more confident: Tiraboschi and Cormani, neither of whom are medical authorities, put in an unhesitating claim for Casalpin as the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, not without unfair reflections on Harvey.

no, notwithstanding his claim of originality, a not perhaps man-lest the concilence as to the function of the lungs in arrating the blood is remarkable, but if Commons had any orient knowledge of the Christianismi Restitutio, be did not choose to follow it in the remarkable discovery that there is no perfectation in the septiam between the ventriclus.

The passage in Casalpin's Quantiones Peripatetical is certainly the most resembring a statement of the entire truth that can be found in any writer before Harvey. I transcribe it from Duterous Origine des Denovetes, vol. 1 p. 28. Dictreo pulsos per recommenterius simuleen es destro cordas recursous fert show hautienn sanga nem, en injue per inistemission arterne venals residente, qua in sanution cordas ventrand instendit, transcribes interim acre frigado per asperie orterne canales, qui justa arternam resorterne canales, qui justa arternam re-nalem protenduntur, non tamen osculis communicantes, ut putavit tralegas, salo tactu temperat. Hair sangums error-lation ex dextro cordis venericolo per pulmones in smistrum ejundem ventriculum optime respondent ca qua ex dissections apparent. Nam duo sant vass in destruit ventriculum desment a, d'io etism in unistrum dyorum sutem unum intromittit tautum, alterum educit, incobranes en ingenie constitutes. Vis gatur intromettens sena est magna quedem m dextro, quæ cava appellatur , parva autem in sanistro ex pidanoni i itroducent, cui as unica est funica, ut coterarum venerum, Vas autem educens arteria est magna quile n in smostre, quie norte appellatur, parva auters in dextro ad pulmones derivass, co, as semiliter doze anot tunica, ut in catern afferin

In the treative De Plantis we have a similar, but shorter, passage. Now in anomalibra a decreas all me is no per vinas dura ad other on caloris mails, et adepta in he altima perfects are per arter as it university compon distribute agente apparate, qui ex cutim altimates in contra godier. I have taken this from the article in Casadpin in the Biographic Universelle.

16. It is thus manifest that several anatomists of the sixteenth century were on the verge of completely Generally before Harney detecting the law by which the motion of the blood is governed; and the language of one is so strong, that we must have recourse, in order to exclude his claim, to the irresistible fact that he did not confirm by proof his own theory, nor proclaim it in such a manner as to attract the attention of the world. Certainly, when the doctrine of a geperal circulation was advanced by Harvey, he both announced it as a paradox, and was not deceived in expecting that it would be so accounted. Those again who strove to depreciate his originality, sought intimations in the writings of the ancients, and even spread a rumour that he had stolen the papers of Father Paul; but it does not appear that they talked, like some moderns, of plagiarism from Levasseur or Clesalpin.

17. William Harvey first taught the circulation of the transco blood in London in 1619; but his Exercitatio de Motu Cordis was not published till 1628. He was induced, as is said, to conceive the probability of this great truth, by reflecting on the final cause of those valves, which his master, Fabricius de Aquapendente, had demonstrated in the veins; valves whose structure was such as to prevent the reflux of the blood towards the extremities. Fabricius himself seems to have been ignorant of this structure, and certainly of the circulation; for he presumes that they serve to prevent the blood from flowing like a river towards the feet and hands, and from collecting in one part. Harvey followed his own happy conjecture by a long inductive process of experiments on the effects of ligatures, and on the observed motion of the blood in living animals.

18. Portal has imputed to Harvey an unfair silence as to Servetus, Columbus, Levasseur, and Cosalpin, who had all preceded him in the same track. Tiraboschi copies Portal, and Corniani speaks of the appropriation of Cesalpin's discovery by Harvey. It may be replied, that no one can reasonably presume Harvey to have been acquainted with the passage in Servetus. But the imputation of suppressing the merits of Columbus is grossly unjust, and founded upon ignorance or forgetfulness of Harvey's celebrated Exercitation. In the procemium to this treatise, he observes, that almost all anatomists have hitherto supposed with Galen, that the mechanism of the pulse is the same as that of respiration. But he not less than three times makes an exception for Columbus, to whom he most expressly refers the theory of a pulmonary circulation. Of Clesalpin he certainly says nothing; but there seems to be no presumption that he was acquainted with that author's writings. Were it even true that he had been guided in his researches by the obscure passages we have quoted, could this set aside the merit of that patient induction by which he established his own theory? Casalpin asserts at best, what we may say he divined, but did not know to be true: Harvey asserts what be had demonstrated. The one is an empiric in a philosophical sense, the other a legitimate minister of truth. It has been justly said, that he alone discovers who proves; nor is there a more odious office, or a more sophistical course of reasoning, than to impair the credit of great men, as Dutens wasted his erudition in doing, by hunting out equivocal and insulated passages from older writers, in order to depreciate the originality of the real teachers of mankind,† It may

* Pæne omnes hue usque anatomici medici et philosophi supponint cum Galeno euidem usunt esse pulsus, quam respirationis. But though be certainly claims the doctrine of a general circulation at wholly his own, and counts it a paradox which will startle every one, by as expressly refers (p. 38 and 41, of the Exercitatio) that of a polimonary transmission of the blood to Columbus, peritissimo, doctis moque anatomico; and observes, in his procession, as an objection to the received theory, quomodo probabile est (use notaret Rusidus Columbus) tanto sanguine opus esse ad nutritionem pulmonum, cum hoc vas, vena videlicet arteriosa [id est, arteria pulmonaire chapperet magnituline utrumque ramum distributions venir cava doscendente cruralim, p. 16.

† This is the general character of a really learned and interesting work by Dutens, Or gine des Discourertes attributes and Modernts. Justice is due to those who have first strack but, even without following up, original these in any science; but not at the expense of those who, generally without knowledge of what had been said before, have deduced the same principles from reasoning or from observation, and carried them out to important consequences. Pascal quotex Montaigne for the shrewd remark, that we should try a man who says a wise thing, for we may often find that he does not understand it. Those who enterta n a morbid jenlousy of madern plulosophy, are glad to avail themselves of auch bunters into obscure antiquity as Dutens, and they are seconded by all the envious, the unranded, and by many of the urreflecting among mankind. With respect to the immediate question, the passages which Dutens has quoted from Hi, pocrates and Plato have certainly an appearance of expressing a real e-reulation of the blood by the words reprodus and representation ofparas, but others, and especially one from Nemesons, on which some remanes has I een placed, mean nothing more if in the flax and reflax of the blood, which the contraction and dilaration of the heart was supposed to produce. See Dutens, vol n p. 8-18. indeed be thought wonderful that Servetus, Columbus, or Caesalpin should not have more distinctly apprehended the consequences of what they maintained, since it seems difficult to conceive the lesser circulation without the greater; but the defectiveness of their views is not to be alleged as a counterbalance to the more steady sagacity of Harvey. The solution of their falling so short is that they were right, not indeed quite by guess, but upon insufficient proof; and that the consciousness of this embarrassing their minds prevented them from deducing inferences which now appear irresistible. In every department of philosophy, the researches of the first inquirers have often been arrested by similar causes.

19. Harvey is the author of a treatise on generation, wherein he maintains that all animals, including the men, are derived from an egg. In this book we first find an argument maintained against spontaneous generation, which, in the case of the lower animals, had been generally received. Sprengel thinks this treatise prolix, and not equal to the author's reputation.† It was first published in 1651.

On Next in importance to the discovery of Harvey is that of Aschus as to the lacteal vessels. Eustachius had observed the thoracic duct in a horse. But Asellius, more by chauce, as he owns, than by sagacity, perceived the lacteals in a fat dog whom he opened soon after it had enten. This was in 1622, and his treatise De Lacteis Venis was published in 1627.‡ Harvey did not assent to this discovery, and endeavoured to dispute the use

Mr Coloradge has been decerted in the same canner by some his a of Jordano Braina, which he takes to describe the circulation of the bland, whereas they morely express its movement to and fro, med et rement, which might be by the same system of vessels.

The biographic of Harvey in the Biographic Universelle strongly sindicates his claim. Four les hommes matures consennent aujorathus que Harvey est la verstable autain de estible decouverte. Cosalpio presentint la circulation articule, en seposant quo le sang retorior des extrémits au cour, mais ces assertions le furnit point prontées; elles ne se trouvèrent étayées par nueme expérience, par nueme fait, et l'on peut dres de l'ésalpin qu'il divina presque la grande circulation dont les lois lui furnit totalement inconnues, la découverte en était reservée à Gandaume Harrey à Gardname Harvey † Hat, de la Medéeine, iv. 299. Portal, a. 177.

† Portal, ii. 361 Sprengel, iv 201.
Printers soon after this got the body of a man fresh honged after a good supper, and had the pleasure of confirming the discovery of Aschara by his own eyes.
Gassendi, Vita Peiresen, p. 177.

of the vessels; nor is it to his honour that even to the end of his life he disregarded the subsequent confirmation that Pecquet and Bartholin had furnished." The former detected the common origin of the lacted and lymphatic vessels in 1647, though his work on the subject was not published till 1651. But Olaus Rudbeck was the first who clearly distinguished these two kinds of vessels.

21. Scheiner proved that the retina is the organ of sight, which paint the object on the optic nerve. This started was in a treatise entitled Oculus, hoc est, Fundamentum Opticum, 1619.† The writings of several anatomists of this period, such as Riolan, Vesling, Bartholin, contain partial accessions to the science; but it seems to have been less enriched by great discoveries, after those already named, than in the preceding century.

22. The mystical medicine of Paracelsus continued to have many advocates in Germany. A new class of enthusiasts sprung from the same school, and calling themselves Rosicrucians, pretended to cure diseases by faith and imagination. A true Rosierucian, they held, had only to look on a patient to cure him. The analogy of magnetism, revived in the last and present age, was commonly employed, ‡ Of this school the most eminent was Van Helmont, who combined the Paracelsian superstitions with some original ideas of his own. His general idea of medicine was that its business was to regulate the archeus, an immaterial principle of life and health; to which, like Paracelsus, he attributed a mysterious being and efficacy. The seat of the archeus is in the stomach; and it is to be effected either by a scheme of diet or through the imagmation. Sprengel praises Van Helmont for overthrowing many current errors, and for announcing principles since

^{*} Sprengel, iv. 2003-

⁺ Id. 276k

All in nature, says Croll of Hesse, one of the principal theosophate in medicance is living, at it is times has its satal force, or astrono, which control body, but passes from one to another. All things in the macrocosm are found also in the microcom. The inward or astral man is (rabalts, from which the scionce is named. It is Gabalis or imagination is as a magnet to external objects, which it thus attracts. Medicines act by a magnetic force. Springel, in. 362.

pursued. The French physicians adhered to the Hippocratic school, in opposition to what Sprengel calls the Chemiatric, which more or less may be reckoned that of Paracelsus. The Italians were still renowned in medicine. Sanctorius, De Medicina Statica, 1614, seems the only work to which we need allude. It is loaded with eulogy by Portal, Tiraboschi, and other writers.

SECT. III.

On Oriental Literature - Hebrew Learning - Arabic and other Eastern Languages.

23. DURING no period of equal length since the revival of betters, has the knowledge of the Hebrew language been, apparently, so much diffused among the literary world as in that before us. The frequent sprinkling of its characters in works of the most miscellaneous erudition will strike the eye of every one who habitually consults them. Nor was this learning by any means so much confined to the clergy as it has been in later times, though their order naturally furnished the greater portion of those who laboured in that field. Some of the chief Hebraists of this age were laymen. The study of this language prevailed most in the protestant countries of Europe, and it was cultivated with much zeal in England. The period between the last years of Elizabeth and the Restoration may perhaps be reckoned that in which a knowledge of Hebrew has been most usual among our divines.

24. Upon this subject I can only assert what I collect to be the verdict of judicious critics, ! It seems that the Hebrew

Vol. v. p. 22.

[†] Portal, n. 391. Tirabonelu, zz. 270.

Riog. Univ.

1 The fifth volume of Eachborn's Geschichte der Cultur is devoted to the progress of Oriental literature in Europe, net very full methaneterising the various productions it mentions, but analytically arranged, and highly useful for reference. Jensels, in his prefice to Menniski's Thesaurus, (Vienna, 1780,) has traced a sketch of the same subject. We may have trusted in some respects to Sumon Historic Critique du Vient Testument. The biographical dictionaries, English and French, have of course been resorted to.

language was not yet sufficiently studied in the method most likely to give an insight into its principles, by comparing it with all the cognate tongues, latterly in the best called Semitic, spoken in the neighbouring parts of method. Asia, and manifestly springing from a common source. Postel, indeed, had made some attempts at this in the last century, but his learning was very slight; and Schindler published in 1612 a Lexicon Pentaglottum, in which the Arabic, as well as Syriac and Chaldaic, were placed in apposition with the Hebrew text. Louis de Dieu, whose "Remarks on all the Books of the Old Testament" were published at Leyden in 1648, has frequently recourse to some of the kindred languages, in order to explain the Hebrew. But the first instructors in the latter had been Jewish rabbis; and the Hebraists of the sixteenth age had imbibed a prejudice, not unnatural though unfounded, that their teachers were best conversant with the language of their forefathers, † They had derived from the same source an extravagant notion of the beauty, antiquity, and capacity of the Hebrew; and, combining this with still more chimerical dreams of a mystical philosophy, lost sight of all real principles of criticism.

25. The most eminent Hebrew scholars of this age were the two Buxtorfs of Basle, father and son, both de- The Bux. voted to the rabbinical school. The elder, who had 10th become distinguished before the end of the preceding century, published a grammar in 1609, which long continued to be reckoned the best, and a lexicon of Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac, in 1628, which was not superseded for more than a hundred years. Many other works relating to these three dialects, as well as to that of the later Jews, do honour to the erudition of the elder Buxtorf; but he is considered as representing a class of Hebraists which in the more comprehensive orientalism of the eighteenth century has lost much of its credit. The son trod closely in his father's footsteps, whom understand the Old Testament, Simon,

Testa neot, p. 494

[.] Simon, Hist. Critique du Vieux p. 375. But Munster, Fagius, and several others, who are found in the Cri-This was not the ease with Luther, their Sarri, gave way to the prejudice in who rejected the authority of the rabbin, farmer of rabbinies opinions, and their and thought none but Christians could commentaries are consequently too Judecest he succeeded as professor of Hebrew at Basle. They held this chair between them more than seventy years. The younger Buxtorf was engaged in controversies which had not begun in his father's lifetime. Morin, one of those learned Protestants who had gone over to the church of Rome, systematically laboured to establish the authority of those versions which the church had approved, by weakening that of the text which passed for original. Ilence he endeavoured to show, though this could not logically do much for his object, that the Samaritan Pentateuch, then lately brought to Europe, which is not in a different language, but merely the Hebrew written in Samaritan characters, is deserving of preference above what is called the Masoretic text, from which the protestant versions are taken. The variations between these are sufficiently numerous to affect a favourite hypothesis, borrowed from the rabbis, but strenuously maintained by the generality of Protestants, that the Hebrew text of the Masoretic recension is perfectly incorrupt. † Morin's opinion was opposed by Buxtorf and Hottinger, and by other writers even of the Romish church. It has, however, been countenanced by Simon and Kennicott. The integrity, at least, of the Hebrew copies was gradually given up, and it has since been shown that they differ greatly among themselves. The Samaritan Pentateuch was first published in 1645, several years after this controversy began, by Sionita, editor of the Parisian Polyglott. This edition, sometimes called by the name of Le Jay, contains most that is in the Polyglott of Antwerp, with the addition of the Syriac and Arabic versions of the Old Testament.

26. An epoch was made in Hebrew criticism by a work of Louis Cappel, professor of that language at Saumur, the Arcanum Punctuationis Revelatum, in 1624. He maintained in this an opinion promulgated by Elias Levita, and held by the first reformers and many other Protestants of the highest authority, though contrary to that vulgar orthodoxy which is always omnivorous, that the vowel points of Hebrew were invented by certain Jews of Tiberias in the sixth century. They had been generally deemed coeval with the language, or at least brought in by Esdras through divine inspiration. It is not surprising that such an hypothesis clashed with the prejudices of mankind, and Cappel was obliged to publish his work in Holland. The Protestants looked upon it as too great a concession in favour of the Vulgate; which having been translated before the Masoretic punctuation, on Cappel's hypothesis, had been applied to the text, might now claim to stand on higher ground, and was not to be judged by these innovations, After twenty years the younger Buxtorf endeavoured to vindicate the antiquity of vowel-points; but it is now confessed that the victory remained with Cappel, who has been styled the father of Hebrew criticism. His principal work is the Critica Sacra, published at Paris in 1650, wherein he still farther discredits the existing manuscripts of the Hebrew Scriptures, as well as the Masoretic nunctuation.

[·] Simon, p. 522.

[†] Id. p. 522. Eachborn, v. 464.

27. The rabbinical literature, meaning as well the Talmud and other aucient books, as those of the later ages Hebrew since the revival of intellectual pursuits among the security Jews of Spain and the East, gave occupation to a considerable class of scholars. Several of these belong to England, such as Ainsworth, Godwin, Lightfoot, Selden, and Po-The antiquities of Judaism were illustrated by Cuneus in Jus Regium Hebrasorum, 1623, and especially by Selden, both in the Uxor Hebraica, and in the treatise De Jure Naturali et Gentium juxta Hebrieos. But no one has left a more durable reputation in this literature than Bochart, a protestant minister at Caen. His Geographia Sacra, published in 1646, is not the most famous of his works, but the only one which falls within this period. It displays great learning and sagacity; but it was impossible, as has been justly observed, that he could thoroughly elucidate this subject at a time when we knew comparatively little of modern Asia, and had few good books of travels. A similar observation might of course be applied to his Hierozorcon, on the animals mentioned in Scripture. Both these account of this controversy about vowelwill be found in the 13th solume of the works, however, were much extolled in the seventeenth century.

* Semon, Elchhorn, &c. A detailed Bibliothèque Universelle, and a shorter préca in L'ethorn's Embatung in dan alta Testament, vol. i. p. 242.

28. In the Chaldee and Syriac languages, which approach chalder and so closely to Hebrew, that the best scholars in the latter are rarely unacquainted with them, besides the Buxtorfs, we find Ferrari, author of a Syriac lexicon, published at Rome in 1622; Louis de Dieu of Levden, whose Syriac grammar appeared in 1626; and the Syriac translation of the Old Testament in the Parisian Polyglott, edited by Gabriel Sionita, in 1642. A Syriac college for the Maronites of Libanus had been founded at Rome by Gregory XIII.; but it did not as yet produce any thing of importance.

29. But a language incomparably more rich in literary treasures, and long neglected by Europe, began now to take a conspicuous place in the annals of learning. Scaliger deserves the glory of being the first real Arabic scholar; for Postel, Christman, and a very few more of the sixteenth century, are hardly worth notice. His friend, Casaubon, who extols his acquirements, as usual, very highly, devoted himself some time to this study. But Scaliger made use of the language chiefly to enlarge his own vast sphere of crudition. He published nothing on the subject; but his collections became the base of Rapheling's Arabic lexicon; and it is said, that they were far more extensive than what appears in that work. He who properly added this language to the domain of learning, was Erpenius, a native of Gorcum, who, at an early age, had gained so unrivalled an acquaintance with the Oriental languages as to be appointed professor of them at Leyden, in 1613. He edited the same year the above-mentioned lexicon of Rapheling, and published a grammar, which might not only be accounted the first composed in Europe that deserved the name, but became the guide to most later scholars. Erpenius gave several other works to the world, chiefly connected with the Arabic version of the Scriptures. Golius, his successor in the Oriental chair at Leyden, besides publishing a lexicon of the language, which is said to be still the most copious, elaborate, and complete that has appeared t, and · Bloor, Univ.

[†] Jennell, præfatio in Meninski Thosaurus Linguarum Orientshum, p. 110.

several editions of Arabic writings, poetical and historical, contributed still more extensively to bring the range of Arabian literature before the world. He enriched with a hundred and fifty manuscripts, collected in his travels, the library of Leyden, to which Scaliger had bequeathed forty. . The manuscripts belonging to Erpenius found their way to Cambridge; while, partly by the munificence of Laud, partly by later accessions, the Bodleian Library at Oxford became extremely rich in this line. The much larger collection in the Escurial seems to have been chiefly formed under Philip III. England was new as conspicuous in Arabian as in Hehrew learning. Selden, Greaves, and Pococke, especially the last, who was probably equal to any Oriental scholar whom Europe had hitherto produced, by translations of the historical and philosophical writings of the Saracenic period, gave a larger compass to general erudition. †

30. The remaining languages of the East are of less im-The Turkish had attracted some degree of attention in the sixteenth century; but the first Estern ingrammar was published by Megiser, in 1612, a very slight performance; and a better at Paris, by du Ryer, in 1630.1 The Persic grammar was given at Rome by Raimondi, in 1614; by de Dieu, at Leyden, in 1639; by Greaves, at London, in 1641 and 1649. An Armenian dictionary, by Rivoli, in 1621, seems the only accession to our knowledge of that ancient language during this period. Athanasius Kircher, a man of immense erudition, restored the Coptic, of which Europe had been wholly ignorant. Those farther eastward had not yet begun to enter into the studies of Europe. Nothing was known of the Indian; but some Chinese manuscripts had been brought to Rome and Madrid as early as 1580; and not long afterwards, two Jesuits, Roger and Ricci, both missionaries in China, were the first who acquired a sufficient knowledge of the language to translate from it. I But scarcely any farther advance took place before the middle of the century.

5 Eichhorn, v. 320.

Biogr Univ
 + Jerusch, Eichhorn, Biogr, Universielle, Biogr, Britannes,

¹ Id 51 1 Id, 64

[|] Eichhorn, r 367

SECT. IV.

On Geography and History.

S1. PURCHAS, an English clergyman, imbued by nature, Purchas, like Hakluyt, with a strong bias towards geographical studies, after having formed an extensive library in that department, and consulted, as he professes, above 1200 authors, published the first volume of his Pilgrim, a collection of voyages in all parts of the world, in 1613; four more followed in 1625. The accuracy of this useful compiler has been denied by those who have had better means of knowledge, and probably is inferior to that of Hakluyt; but his labour was far more comprehensive. The Pilgrim was at all events a great source of knowledge to the contemporaries of Purchas.*

32. Olearins was ambassador from the Duke of Holstein to Moscovy and Persia from 1633 to 1639. His travels, in German, were published in 1647, and have been several times reprinted and translated. He has well described the barbarism of Russia and the despotism of Persia; he is diffuse and episodical, but not wearisome; be observes well and relates faithfully; all who have known the countries he has visited are said to speak well of him, † Pietro della Valle is a far more amusing writer. He has thrown his travels over Syria and Persia into the form of letters written from time to time, and which he professes to have recovered from his correspondents. This perhaps is not a very probable story, both on account of the length of the letters, and the want of that reference to the present time and to small passing events, which such as are authentic commonly exhibit. His observations, however, on all the countries he visited, especially Persia, are apparently consistent with the knowledge we have obtained from later travellers. Gibbon says that none have better observed Persia, but his vanity and probaity are insufferable. Yet I think that † Biogr. Universible.

Biogr, Univ. Pinkerton's Collection of Voyages and Travels. The latter does not value Purchas highly for correctness.

Della Valle can hardly be reckoned tedious; and if he is a little egotistical, the usual and almost laudable characteristic of travellers, this gives a liveliness and racy air to his narrative. What his wife, the Lady Maani, an Assyrian Christian, whom he met with at Bagdad, and who accompanied him through his long wanderings, may really have been, we can only judge from his culogies on her beauty, her fidelity, and her courage; but she throws an air of romance over his adventures, not unpleasing to the reader. The travels of Pietro della Valle took place from 1014 to 1626; but the book was first published at Rome in 1650, and has been translated into different languages.

SS. The Lexicon Geographicum of Ferrari, in 1627, was the chief general work on geography; it is alpha-Lexicon of betical, and contains 9600 articles. The errors ferral have been corrected in later editions, so that the first would probably be required in order to estimate the knowledge of its author's age. "

34. The best measure, perhaps, of geographical science, are the maps published from time to time, as per- Man of feetly for the most part, we may presume, as their Blace editors could render them. If we compare the map of the world in the "Theatrum Orbis Terrarum sive Novus Atlas" of Blaew in 1648 with that of the edition of Ortelius published at Antwerp in 1612, the improvements will not appear exceedingly great. America is still separated from Asia by the straits of Anian about lat. 60; but the coast to the south is made to trend away more than before; on the N.E. coast we find Davis's Sea, and Estotiland has vanished to give way to Greenland. Canada continues to be most inaccurately laid down, though there is a general idea of lakes and rivers better than in Ortelius. Scandinavia is far better, and tolerably correct. In the South, Terra del Fuego terminates in Cape Horn, instead of being united to Terra Australis; but in the East, Corea appears as an oblong island; the Sea of Aral is not set down, and the wall of China is placed north of the fiftieth parallel. India is very much too small, and the shape of the Caspian Sea is wholly inaccurate. But a comparison with the map in Hakluyt, mentioned in our second volume, will not exhibit so much superiority of Blaew's The latter however shows more knowledge of the interior country, especially in North America, and a better outline in many parts of the Asiatic coast. The maps of particular regions in Europe are on a large scale, and numerous. Speed's maps, 1646, appear by no means inferior to those of Blaew; but several of the errors are the same. Considering the progress of commerce, especially that of the Dutch, during this half century, we may rather be surprised at the defective state of these maps.

35. Two histories of general reputation were published in the Italian language during these fifty years; one of the civil wars in France by Davila, in 1630, and another of those in Flanders by Cardinal Bentivoglio. Both of these had the advantage of interesting subjects; they had been sufficiently conversant with the actors to know much and to judge well, without that particular responsibility which tempts an historian to prevarication. They were both men of cool and sedate tempers, accustomed to think policy a game in which the strong play with the weak, obtuse, especially the former, in moral sentiment, but on this account not inclined to calumniate an opposite party, or to withhold admiration from intellectual power. Both these historics may be read over and over with pleasure; if Davila is too refined, if he is not altogether faithful, if his style wants the elegance of some older Italians, he more than redeems all this by the importance of his subject, the variety and picturesqueness of his narration, and the acuteness of his reflections. Bentivoglio is reckoned, as a writer, among the very first of his age.

36. The History of the War of Granada, that is, the rebellion of the Moriscos in 1565, by the famous Diego de Mendoza, was published posthumously in 1610. It is placed by the Spaniards themselves on a level with the most renowned of the ancients. The French have now their first general historian, Mezeray, a writer esteemed for his lively style and hold sense, but little read, of course, in an age like the last or our own, which have demanded an exactness in matter of fact, and an extent of historical erudition, which was formerly unknown, We now began, in England, to cultivate historical England composition, and with so much success, that the present period was far more productive of such works as deserve remembrance than a whole century that next followed. But the most considerable of these have already been Freinh mentioned. Lord Herbert of Cherbury's History of batteries. Henry VIII. ought here to be added to the list, as a book of good authority, relatively at least to any that preceded, and written in a manly and judicious spirit. Camden's Life of Elizabeth is also a solid and valuable history. Bacon's Life of Henry VII, is something more; it is the first instance in our language of the application of philosophy to reasoning on public events in the manner of the aucients and the Italians. Praise upon Henry is too largely bestowed; but it was in the nature of Bucon to admire too much a crafty and selfish policy; and he thought also, no doubt, that so near an ancestor of his own sovereign should not be treated with severe impartiality.

SECT. V.

On General State of Literature,

87. Or the Italian and other continental universities, we have little to say beyond what may be collected from the the general tenor of this literary history, that they have contributed little to those departments of knowledge to which we have paid most attention, and adhering pertinaciously to their ancient studies, were left behind in the advance of the human mind. They were, indeed, not less crowded with scholars than before, being the necessary and prescribed road to lucrative professions. In theology, law, and medicine, sciences, the two former of which, at least, did not claim to be progressive, they might sustain a respectable posture; in philosophy, and even in polite letters, they were less prominent.

38. The English universities are in one point of view very different from those of the rest of Europe. Their great endowments created a resident class, neither founded. teachers nor students, who might devote an unbroken leisure to learning with the advantage of that command of books which no other course of life could have afforded. It is true that in no age has the number of these been great; but the diligence of a few is enough to cast a veil over the laziness of many. The century began with an extraordinary piece of fortune to the university of Oxford, which formed in the seventeenth century, whatever it may since have been, one great cause of her literary distinction. Sir Thomas Bodley, with a munificence which has rendered his name more immortal than the foundation of a family could have done, bestowed on the university a library collected by him at great cost, hulding a magnificent room for its reception, and bequeathed large funds for its increase. The building was completed in 1606; and Casaubon has, very shortly afterwards, given such an account of the university itself, as well as of the Bodleian library, as will perhaps be interesting to the reader, though it contains some of those mistakes into which a strauger is apt to fall.

39. "I wrote you word," he says in July, 1613, to one of his correspondents, "a month since, that I was Cambon a going to Oxford in order to visit that university and its library, of which I had heard much. Every thing proved beyond my expectation. The colleges are numerous; most of them very rich. The revenues of these colleges maintain above two thousand students, generally of respectable parentage, and some even of the first nobility; for what we call the habits of pedagogues (padagogica vitæ ratio) is not found in these English colleges. Learning is here cultivated in a liberal style; the heads of houses live handsomely, even splendidly, like men of rank. Some of them can spend ten thousand fivres [about 1000], at that time, if I mistake not] by the year. I much approved the mode in which pecuniary concerns are kept distinct from the business of learning. Many still are found, who emulate the liberality of rate sunt, qu'il valde probase. I have but I may be mistaken.

Res studios rum et rationes upa- given the translation which seemed best;

their predecessors. Hence new buildings rise every day; even some new colleges are raised from the foundation; some are enlarged, such as that of Merton, over which Savile presides, and several more. There is one begun by Cardinal Wolsey, which if it should be completed, will be worthy of the greatest admiration. But he left at his death many buildings which he had begun in an unfinished state, and which no one expects to see complete. None of the colleges, however, attracted me so much as the Bodleian library, a work rather for a king than a private man. It is certain that Bodley, living or dead, must have expended 200,000 livres on that building. The ground plot is the figure of the letter T. The part which represents the perpendicular stem was formerly built by some prince, and is very handsome; the rest was added by Bodley with no less magnificence. In the lower part is a divinity school, to which perhaps nothing in Europe is comparable. It is vaulted with peculiar skill. The upper story is the library itself, very well built, and fitted with an immense quantity of books. Do not imagine that such plenty of manuscripts can be found here, as in the royal library (of Paris); there are not a few manuscripts in England, but nothing to what the king possesses. But the number of printed books is wonderful, and increasing every year; for Bodley has bequeathed a considerable revenue for that purpose. As long as I remained at Oxford, I passed whole days in the library; for books cannot be taken out, but the library is open to all scholars for seven or eight hours every day. You might always see therefore many of these greedily enjoying the banquet prepared for them, which gave me no small pleasure." .

40. The Earl of Pembroke, Selden, and above all, Archbishop Laud, greatly improved the Bodleian library. It became, especially through the munificence of that prelate, extremely rich in Oriental manuscripts. The Duke of Buckingham presented a collection made by Erpenius to the public library at Cambridge, which, though far behind that of the sister university, was enriched by many donations, and became very considerable. Usher formed the library of Trinity College, Dublin; an university founded on the English model, with noble revenues, and a corporate body of fellows and scholars to enjoy them.

41. A catalogue of the Bodleian library was published by James in 1620. It contains about 20,000 articles. Of these no great number are in English, and such Bod et. as there are chiefly of a later date than the year 1600; Bodley, perhaps, had been rather negligent of poetry and plays. The editor observes that there were in the library three or four thousand volumes in modern languages. This catalogue is not classed, but alphabetical; which James mentions as something new, remarking at the same time the difficulty of classification, and that in the German catalogues we find grammars entered under the head of philosophy. One published by Draud, Bibliotheca Classica, sive Catalogus Officinalis, Frankfort, 1625, is hardly worth mention. It professes to be a general list of printed books; but as the number seems to be not more than 30,000, all in Latin, it must be very defective. About two fifths of the whole are theological. A catalogue of the library of Sion College, founded in 1631, was printed in 1650; it contains eight or nine thousand volumes.*

42. The library of Leyden had been founded by the first prince of Orange. Scaliger bequeathed his own to connen, prince of Orange, counge, transport of the Oriental manuscripts of Rorting as Golius. A catalogue had been printed by Peter Bertius as early as 1597.† Many public and private libraries either now began to be formed in France, or received great accessions; among the latter, those of the historian De Thou, and the president Seguier. 1 No German library, after that of Vienna, had been so considerable as one formed in the course of several ages by the Electors Palatine at Heidelberg. It contained many rare manuscripts. On the capture of the city by Tilly in 1622, he sent a number of these to Rome, and they long continued to sleep in the recesses of the Vatican. Napoleon, emulous of such a precedent, obtained thirty-eight of the Heidelberg manuscripts by the treaty of Tolentino, which were transmitted to Paris. On the restitution of these in 1815, it was justly thought that prescription was not to be pleaded by Rome for the rest of the plunder, especially when she was recovering what she had lost by the same right of spoliation; and the whole collection has been replaced in the library of Heidelberg.

43. The Italian academies have been often represented as partaking in the alleged decline of literary spirit ttalun accduring the first part of the seventeenth century. dumer. Nor is this reproach a new one. Boccalini, after the commencement of this period, tells us that these institutions once so famous had fallen into decay, their ardent zeal in literary exercises and discussions having abated by time, so that while they had once been frequented by private men, and esteemed by princes, they were now abandoned and despised by all. They petition Apollo, therefore, in a chapter of his Ragguagli di Parnasso, for a reform. But the god replies that all things have their old age and decay, and as nothing can prevent the neatest pair of slippers from wearing out, so nothing can rescue academies from a similar lot; hence he can only advise them to suppress the worst, and to supply their places by others.* If only such a counsel were required, the institution of academies in general would not perish. And in fact we really find that while some societies of this class came to nothing, as is always the case with self-constituted bodies, the seventeenth century had births of its own to boast, not inferior to the older progeny of the last age. The Academy of Humorists at Rome was one of these. It arose casually at the marriage of a young nobleman of the Mancini family, and took the same line as many had done, reciting verses and discourses, or occasionally representing plays. The tragedy of Demetrius, by Rocco, one of this academy, is reckoned among the best of the age. The Apatisti of Florence took their name from Fioretti, who had assumed the appellation of Udeno Nisielo, Academico Apatista. The Rozzi of Siena, whom the government had suppressed in 1568, revived again in 1605, and rivalled another society of the same city, the Intronati. The former especially dedicated their time to pastoral, in the rustic dialect (comedia rusticale), a species of dramatic writing that might amuse at the moment, and was designed for no other end, though several of these farces are extant.

^{*} Ragg. zviii. c. l

44. The Academy Della Crusca, which had more solid objects for the advantages of letters in view, has been mentioned in another place. But that of the Lincei, founded by Frederic Cesi, stands upon a higher ground than any of the rest. This young man was born at Rome in 1585, son of the Duke of Acqua Sparta, a father and a family known only for their pride and ignorance. But nature had created in Cesi a philosophic mind; in conjunction with a few of similar dispositions, he gave his entire regard to science, and projected himself, at the age of eighteen, an academy, that is, a private association of friends for intellectual pursuits, which, with reference to their desire of piercing with acute discernment into the depths of truth, he denominated the Lynxes. Their device was that animal, with its eves turned towards heaven, and tearing a Cerberus with its claws; thus intimating that they were prepared for war against error and falsehood. The church, always suspicious, and inclined to make common cause with all established tenets, gave them some trouble, though neither theology nor politics entered into their scheme. This embraced, as in their academies, poetry and elegant literature; but physical science was their peculiar object. Porta, Galileo, Colonna, and many other distinguished men, both of Italy and the Transalpine countries, were enrolled among the Lyuxes; and Cesi is said to have framed rather a visionary plan of a general combination of philosophers, in the manner of the Pythagoreans, which should extend itself to every part of Europe. The constitutions of this imaginary order were even published in 1624; they are such as could not have been realised, but from the organisation and secrecy that seem to have been their elements, might not improbably have drawn down a presecution upon themselves, or even rendered the name of philosophy obnoxious. Cesi died in 1680, and his academy of Lynxes did not long survive the loss of their chief.

45. The tide of public opinion had hitherto set regularly in one direction; ancient times, ancient learning, ancient wisdom and virtue, were regarded with unqualified ve- reconst believed to be the same, and a common degeneracy monabed was thought to have overcomed to neration; the very course of nature was hardly was thought to have overspread the earth and its inhabitants. This had been at its height in the first century after the revival of letters, the prejudice in favour of the past, always current with the old, who affect to dictate the maxims of experience, conspiring with the genuine lustre of classical literature and ancient history, which dazzled the youthful scholar. But this aristocracy of learning was now assailed by a new power which had risen up in sufficent strength to dispute the pre-eminence. We, said Bacon, are the true ancients; what we call the antiquity of the world was but its infancy. This thought, equally just and brilliant, was caught up and echoed by many; it will be repeatedly found in later works. It became a question whether the moderns had not really left behind their progenitors; and though it has been finited, that a dwarf on a giant's shoulders sees farther than the giant, this is, in one sense, to concede the point in dispute."

[·] Salfi, vol. aic.

46. Tassoni was one of the first who combated the established prejudice by maintaining that modern times are not inferior to ancient; it well became his intrepid disposition. † But Lancilotti, an Italian ecclesiastic, and member of several academies, pursued this subject in an elaborate work, intended to prove; first, that the world was neither morally worse nor more afflicted by calamities than it had been; secondly, that the intellectual abilities of mankind had not degenerated. It bears the general title, L'Hoggidi, To-Day; and is throughout a radicule of those whom he calls Hoggidiani, perpetual declaimers against the present state of things. He is a very copious and learned writer, and no friend to antiquity; each chapter being entitled Disinganno, and intended to remove some false prejudice. The first part of this work appeared in 1023, the second, after the author's death, not till 1658. Lancilotti wrote another book with que in nostros usus conversis adjeces al quid, non supere ha tollere, ant parel focre, qui arte nos fuerunt, debenais, Cypronus, Vita Campanella, p. 15, 4 Salti, xx. 381.

[•] Ac quismadmodism pygnisms humeris gas ets intabens longers quant grass pess, erre, nessue tames se giganto materies subserve destroys a un transcripotest, su nos veterium laborious riginis-

somewhat a similar object, entitled Farfalloni degl' Antichi Istorici, and designed to turn the ancient historians into ridicule; with a good deal of pleasantry, but chiefly on account of stories which no one in his time would bave believed. The same ground was taken soon afterwards by an English divine, George Hakewill, in his "Apology, or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of the World," published in 1627. This is designed to prove that there is not that perpetual and universal decay in nature which many suppose. It is an elaborate refutation of many absurd notions which seem to have prevailed; some believing that even physical nature, the sun and stars, the earth and waters, were the worse for wear. A greater number thought this true of man; his age, his size, his strength, his powers of mind, were all supposed to have been deteriorated. Hakewill patiently and learnedly refuted all this. The moral character of antiquity he shows to be much exaggerated, animadverting especially on the Romans. The most remarkable, and certainly the most disputable chapters, are those which relate to the literary merits of ancient and modern times. He seems to be one of the first who ventured to put in a claim for the latter. In this he anticipates Wotton, who had more to say. Hakewill goes much too far in calling Sidney's Arcadia "nothing inferior to the choicest piece among the ancients;" and even thinks "he should not much wrong Virgil by matching him with Du Bartas." The learning shown in this treatise is very extensive, but Hakewill has no taste, and cannot perceive any real superiority in the ancients. Compared with Lancilotti, he is much inferior in liveliness, perhaps even in learning; but I have not observed that he has borrowed any thing from the Italian, whose publication was but four years earlier.

47. Browne's Inquiry into Vulgar Errors displays a great deal of erudition, but scarcely raises a high notion of Browne himself as a philosopher, or of the state of physical knowledge in England. The errors he indicates are such as none but illiterate persons, we should think, were likely to hold; and I believe that few on the Continent, so late as 1646, would have required to have them exploded with such an ostentation of proof. Who did not know that the phoenix is a fable? Browne was where the learned in Europe had been seventy years before, and seems to have been one of those who saturate their minds with bad books till they have little room for any thing new that is better. A man of so much credulity and such an irregular imagination as Browne was almost sure to believe in witchcraft and all sorts of spiritual agencies. In no respect did he go in advance of his age, unless we make an exception for his declaration against persecution. He seems to have been fond of those trifling questions which the bad taste of the schoolmen and their contemporaries introduced; as whether a man has fewer ribs than a woman, whether Adam and Eve had navels, whether Methusaleh was the oldest man; the problems of children put to adults. With a strong curiosity and a real love of truth, Browne is a striking instance of a merely empirical mind; he is at sea with sails and a rudder, but without a compass or log-book; and has so little notion of any laws of nature, or of any inductive reasoning either as to efficient or final causes, that he never seems to judge any thing to be true or false except by experiment.

48. In concluding our review of the sixteenth century, we selected Pinelli, as a single model of the literary character, which loving and encouraging knowledge, is yet too little distinguished by any writings to fall naturally within the general subject of these volumes. The period which we now bring to a close will furnish us with a much more considerable instance. Nicolas Peiresc was born in 1380, of an ancient family in Provence, which had for some generations held judicial offices in the parliament of Aix. An extraordinary thirst for every kind of knowledge characterised Peiresc from his earliest youth, and being of a weak constitution, as well as ample fortune, though he retained, like his family, an honourable post in the parliament, his time was principally devoted to the multifarious pursuits of an enlightened scholar. Like Pinelli, he delighted in the rarities of art and antiquity; but his own superior genius, and the vocation of that age towards science, led him on to a far more extensive field of inquiry. We have the life of Peiresc written by his countryman and intimate friend Gassendi; and no one who has any sympathy with science or with a noble character will read it without pleasure. Few books, indeed, of that period are more full of casual information.

49. Peirese travelled much in the early part of his life; he was at Rome in 1600, and came to England and Holland in 1606. The hard drinking, even of our learned men . disconcerted his southern stomach; but he was repaid by the society of Camden, Savile, and Cotton. The king received Peirese courteously, and he was present at the opening of parliament. On returning to his native province, he began to form his extensive collections of marbles and medals, but especially of natural history in every line. He was, perhaps, the first who observed the structure of zoophytes, though he seems not to have suspected their animal nature. Petrifactions occupied much of his time; and he framed a theory of them which Gassendi explains at length, but which, as might be expected, is not the truth, † Botany was among his favourite studies, and Europe owes to him, according to Gassendi, the Indian jessamine, the gourd of Mecca, the real Egyptian papyrus, which is not that described by Prosper Alpinus. He first planted ginger, as well as many other Oriental plants, in an European garden, and also the cocoaput, from which however he could not obtain fruit.

50. Peirese was not less devoted to astronomy; he had no sooner heard of the discoveries of Galileo than he set himself to procure a telescope, and had in the course of the same year, 1610, the pleasure of observing the moons of Jupiter. It even occurred to him that these might serve to ascertain the longitude, though he did not follow up the idea. Galileo indeed, with a still more inventive mind, and with more of mathematics, seems to have stood in the way of Peiresc. He took, as far as appears, no great pains to publish his researches, contenting himself with the intercourse of literary men, who passed near him, or with whom he could maintain correspondence. Several discoveries are ascribed to him by Gassendi; of their originality I cannot venture to decide.

"From his retreat," says another biographer, "Peirese gave more encouragement to letters than any prince, more even than the Cardinal de Richelieu, who sometime afterwards founded the French Academy. Worthy to have been called by Bayle the attorney-general of literature, he kept always on the level of progressive science, published manuscripts at his own expense, followed the labours of the learned throughout Europe, and gave them an active impulse by his own aid." Scaliger, Salmasius, Holstenius, Kircher, Mersenne, Grotius, Valois, are but some of the great names of Europe whom he assisted by various kinds of liberality. He published nothing himself, but some of his letters have been collected.

51. The character of Peirese was amiable and unreserved among his friends; but he was too much absorbed in the love of knowledge for insipid conversation. For the same reason, his biographer informs us, he disliked the society of women, gaining nothing valuable from the trifles and scandal upon which alone they could converse. † Possibly the society of both sexes at Aix, in the age of Peiresc, was such as, with no excessive fastidiousness, he might avoid. In his cagerness for new troths, he became somewhat credulous; an error not perhaps easy to be avoided, while the accumulation of facts proceeded more rapidly than the ascertainment of natural laws. But for a genuine liberality of mind and extensive attainments in knowledge, very few can be compared to Peirese; nor among those who have resembled him in this employment of wealth and leisure, do I know that any names have descended to posterity with equal lustre, except our two countrymen of the next generation, who approached so nearly to his character and course of life, Boyle and Evelyn.

^{*} Biogr. Universalle.

[†] Gassendi, p. 219.

•

PART IV.

ON THE LITERATURE OF THE SECOND HALF OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF ANCIENT LITERATURE IN EUROPE, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

SECT. L

Dutch Scholars — Jesust and Jansewist Philologers — Delphin Editions — French Scholars — English Scholars — Bentley.

1. The death of Salmasius about the beginning of this period left a chasm in critical literature which no one was equal to fill. But the nearest to this giant of philology was James Frederic Gronovius, a native of Hamburg, but drawn, like several more of his countrymen, to the universities of Holland, the peculiarly learned state of Europe through the seventeenth century. The principal labours of Gronovius were those of correcting the text of Latin writers; in Greek we find very little due to him. Ilis notes form an useful and considerable part of those which are collected in what are generally styled the Variorum editions, published, chiefly after 1660, by the Dutch booksellers. These contain selections from the older critics, some of them, especially those first edited, indifferently made and often mutilated; others with more attention to preserve entire the original notes. These however are for the most part only critical, as if explanatory observations were below the notice of an editor; though, as Le Clerc says, those of Manutius on Cicero's epistles cost him much more time than modern editors have given to their conjectures.* In general, the Variorum editions were not greatly prized, with the exception of those by the two Gronovii and Gravius, †

Baillet, Critiques Grammairiens, n. 648. Blouat, Biogr. Univ

2. The place of the elder Gronovius, in the latter part of this present period, was filled by his son. James Gronovius, by indefatigable labour, and by a greater number of editions which bear his name, may be reckoned, if not a greater philologer, one not less celebrated than his father. He was at least a better Greek critic, and in this language, though far below those who were about to arise, and who did in fact eclipse him long before his death, Bentley and Burman, he kept a high place for several years. F Gravius, another German, whom the Dutch universities had attracted and retained, contributed to the Variorum editions, chiefly those of Latin authors, an erudition not less copious than that of any contemporary scholar.

3. The philological character of Gerard Vossius himself, if we might believe some partial testimonies, fell short of that of his son Isaac; whose observations on Pomponius Mela, and an edition of Catullus, did him extraordinary credit, and have placed him among the first philologers of this age. He was of a more lively genius, and perhaps hardly less erudition than his father, but with a paradoxical judgment, and has certainly rendered much less service to letters. Another son of a great father, Nicolas Heinsius, has by none been placed on a level with him; but his editions of Prudentius and Claudian are better than any that had preceded them.

4. Germany fell lower and lower in classical literature. A writer as late as 1714 complains, that only modern Decline of books of Latin were taught in the schools, and that leastering. the students in the universities despised all grammatical learning. The study "not of our own language, which we entirely neglect, but of French," he reckons among the causes of this decay in ancient learning; the French translations of the classics led many to imagine that the original could be dispensed with. Ezekiel Spanheim, envoy

^{*} Parringuna, 1, 233

[†] A list of the Variorum editions will be found in Baillet, Critiques Grammanens, n. 604.

¹ Baillet, n. 548. Niceron, it. 177.

⁵ Newton, vol. and.

| Borckbardt, De Lingue Latine bodie neglectæ Causia Oratio, p. 34.

from the court of Brandeburg to that of Louis XIV., was a distinguished exception; his edition of Julian, and his notes on several other writers, attest an extensive learning, which has still preserved his name in honour. As the century drew nigh to its close, Germany began to revive; a few men of real philological learning, especially Fabricius, appeared as heralds of those greater names which adorn her literary annals in the next age.

5. The Jesuits had long been conspicuously the classical scholars of France; in their colleges the purest and most elegant Latinity was supposed to be found; they had early cultivated these graces of literature, while all polite writing was confined to the Latin language, and they still preserved them in its comparative disuse. "The Jesuits," Huet says, "write and speak Latin well, but their style is almost always too rhetorical. This is owing to their keeping regeneies [an usual phrase for academical exercises] from their early youth, which causes them to speak incessantly in public, and become accustomed to a sustained and pobshed style above the tone of common subjects." Jouvancy, whose Latin orations were published in 1700, has had no equal, if we may trust a panegyrist, since Maffei and Muretus.

this palm from their inveterate foes. Lancelot protections threw some additional lustre round Port Royal by provide threw some additional lustre round Port Royal by provide the Latin and Greek grammars, which are more frequently called by the name of that famous cloister than by his own. Both were received with great approbation in the French schools, except, I suppose, where the Jesuits predominated, and their reputation lasted for many years. They were never so popular, though well known, in this country. The public," says Baillet of the Greek grammar, which is rather the more eminent of the two, "bears witness that nothing of its kind has been more finished. The order is clear and concise. We find in it many remarks, both judicious and important for the full knowledge of the language. Though Lancelot has chiefly followed Caninius, Sylburgus, [·] Huetiana, p. 71.

Sanctius, and Vossius, his arrangement is new, and he has selected what is most valuable in their works." In fact, he professes to advance nothing of his own, being more ind bted, he says, to Caminius than to any one else. The method of Clenardus he disapproves, and thinks that of Ramus intricate. He adopts the division into three declensions. But his notions of the proper meaning of the tenses are strangely confused and erroneous: several other mistakes of an obvious nature, as we should now say, will occur in his syntax; and upon the whole the Port Royal grammar does not give us a high idea of the critical knowledge of the seventeenth century, as to the more difficult language of antiquity.

The Latin, on the other hand, had been so minutely and laboriously studied, that little more than gleanings after a great harvest could be obtained. The Aristarchus of Vossius, and his other grammatical works, though partly not published till this period, have been mentioned in the last volume. Perizonius, a professor at Francker, and in many respects one of the most learned of this age, published a good edition of the Minerva of Sanctius in 1687. This celebrated grammar had become very scarce, as well as that of Scioppius, which contained nothing but remarks upon Sanctius. Perizonius combined the two with notes more ample than those of Scioppius, and more bold in differing from the Spanish grammarian.

S. If other editions of the classical authors have been method, preferred by critics, none, at least of this period, bave been more celebrated than those which Louis XIV., at the suggestion of the Duke de Moutausier, caused to be prepared for the use of the dauphin. The object in view was to elucidate the Latin writers, both by a continual gloss in the margin, and by such notes as should bring a copious mass of accient learning to bear on the explanation, not of the more difficult passages alone, but of all those in which an ordinary reader might require some aid. The former of these is less useful and less satisfactorily executed than the latter; as for the notes, it must be owned that, with much that is superfluous even to tolerable scholars, they bring together a great deal of very serviceable illustration. The choice of authors as well as of editors was referred to Huet, who fixed the number of the former at forty. The idea of an index on a more extensive plan than in any earlier editions, was also due to Huet, who had designed to fuse those of each work into one more general, as a standing historical analysis of the Latin language.* These editions are of very unequal merit, as might be expected from the number of persons employed; a list of whom will be found in Baillet.†

9. Tanaquil Faber, thus better known than by his real name, Tanneguy le Fevre, a man learned, animated, Le Perrend not fearing the reproach of paradox, acquired a considerable name among French critics by several editions, as well as by other writings in philology. But none of his literary productions were so celebrated as his daughter, Anne le Fevre, afterwards Madame Dacier. The knowledge of Greek though once not very uncommon in a woman, had become prodigious in the days of Louis XIV.; and when this distinguished lady taught Homer and Sappho to speak French prose, she appeared a phænix in the eyes of her countrymen. She was undoubtedly a person of very rare talents and estimable character; her translations are numerous and reputed to be correct, though Niceron has observed that she did not raise Homer in the eyes of those who were not prejudiced in his favour. Her husband was a scholar of kindred mind and the same pursuits. Their union was facetiously called the wedding of Latin and Greek. But each of this learned couple was skilled in both languages. Dacter was a great translator; his Horace is perhaps the best known of his versions; but the Poetics of Aristotle have done him most honour. The Daciers had to light the battle of antiquity against a generation both ignorant and vain-glorious, yet keen-sighted in the detection of blemishes, and disposed to avenge the wrongs of their fathers who had been trampled upon by pedants with the help of a new pedantry, that of the court and the mode. With great learning they had a competent share of good sense, but not perhaps a sufficiently discerning taste, or live-

^{*} Huctisus, p. 92.

[†] Critiques Grammatrions, il. 605.

liness enough of style, to maintain a cause that had so many prejudices of the world now enlisted against it. .

10. Henry Valois might have been mentioned before for Bong Valora his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus in 1686, which established his philological reputation. Many other works in the same line of criticism followed; he is among the great ornaments of learning in this period. Nor was France destitute of others that did her honour. Cutelier, it is said, deserved by his knowledge of Greek to be placed on a level with the great scholars of former times. Yet there seems to have been some decline, at least towards the close of the century, in that prodigious erudition which had distinguished the preceding period. " For we know no one," says Le Clerc, about 1699, "who equals in learning, in diligence, and in the quantity of his works, the Scaligers, the Lipsii, the Casaubons, the Salmasii, the Meuran, the Vossii, the Seldens, the Gronovii, and many more of former times." Though perhaps in this reflection there was something of the customary bias against the present generation, we must own that the writings of scholars were less massive, and consequently gave less apparent evidence of industry than formerly. But in classical philology at least, a better day was about to arise, and the first omen of it came from a country not yet much known in that literature.

11. It has been observed in a former passage, that while England was very far from wanting men of extenhave as sive crudition, she had not been at all eminent in ancient or classical literature. The proof which the absence of critical writings, or even of any respectable editions, furnishes, appears weighty; nor can it be repelled by sufficient testimony. In the middle of the century James Doport, Greek professor at Cambridge, deserves honour by standing almost alone. "He appears," says a late biographer, " to have been the main instrument by which literature was apheld in this university during the civil disturbances of the

[.] Bardet, Niceran, vol. in. Biblio-

thorne I miserselle, v. 295. axii. 176., axii. 256 axii. 276. axii. 176., axii. 256 axii. 176., axii. 256 axii. 176., axii. 257 axii. 176., axii. 257 axii. 176., axii. 257 axii. 176., axii. 257 ax

Leyden. Il restoit prezque tout seul du nombre des savans d'He ande Il n'est plus dans ce passibi des gens tuets exame Jos, Scaliger, Band us, Hermins, Salma-5165, et Giotiuse (P. 382.)

seventeenth century; and though little known at present, he enjoyed an almost transcendant reputation for a great length of time among his contemporaries as well as in the generation which immediately succeeded." Duport, however, has little claim to this reputation except by translations of the writings of Solomon, the book of Job, and the Psalms, into Greek hexameters; concerning which his biographer gently intimates that "his notions of versification were not formed in a severe or critical school;" and by what has certainly been more esteemed, his Homeri Gnomologia, which Le Clerc and Bishop Monk agree to praise, as very useful to the student of Homer. Duport gave also some lectures on Theophrastus about 1656, which were afterwards published in Needham's edition of that author. "In these," says Le Clerc, "he explains words with much exactness, and so as to show that he understood the analogy of the language," † "They are, upon the whole, calculated," says the Bishop of Gloucester, "to give no unfavourable opinion of the state of Greek learning in the university at that memorable crisis."

12. It cannot be fairly said that our universities declined in general learning under the usurpation of Cromwell. They contained, on the contrary, more extraordinary men than in any earlier period, but not generally well affected to the predominant power. Greek however seems not much to have flourished, even immediately after the Restoration. Barrow, who was chosen Greek professor in 1660, complains that no one attended his lectures. " I sit like an Attic owl," he says, "driven out from the society of all other birds."1 According indeed to the scheme of study retained from a more barbarous age, no knowledge of the Greek language appears to have been required from the students, as necessary for their degrees. And if we may they related to study, was made after the time of Henry VIII or Isdward VI

Maseum Crticum, vol. a. p. 672. , by the Bird op of Gran cester and Bristol,) + Bibliocheque Charse, XIV. 18.

t See a Ungriphed memors of Barrow prefered to If agher's edition of his works. This contains a sketch of studies proceed in the waversets of Cartridge from the twelft ato the seventeenth century, besef indeed, but such as I should have been glad to have seen before post No alteration in the statutes, so tar as Bentley, p. 6. -- 1812

^{[&}quot; The studies of the Cambridge schools about your consisted of age, etters, natural philosophy, and matter-matter; the latter branch of knowledge, whe h was desteed spine quently to take the lead, and almost swaters up the rest, that then but recently become an object of such attention. Monk's Lafe of believe a satirical writer of the time of Charles II., but one whose satire had great circulation and was not taxed with falsehood, the general state of education, both in the schools and universities, was as narrow, pedantic, and unprofitable, as can be conceived.

13. We were not, nevertheless, destitute of men distinguished for critical skill, even from the commencement of this period. The first was a very learned divine, Thomas Gataker, one whom a foreign writer has placed among the six Protestants, most conspicuous, in his judgment, for depth of reading. His Cinnus, sive Adversaria Miscellanea, published in 1651, to which a longer work, eutitled Adversaria Posthuma, is subjoined in later editions, may be introduced here; since, among a far greater number of scriptural explanations, both of these miscellanies contain many relating to profane antiquity. He claims a higher place for his edition of Marcus Antoninus the next year. This is the earliest edition, if I am not mistaken, of any classical writer published in England with original annotations. Those of Gataker evince a very copious learning, and the edition is still perhaps reckoned the best that has been given of this author.

14. Thomas Stanley, author of the History of Ancient Philosophy, undertook a more difficult task, and gave in 1663 his celebrated edition of Aischylus. It was, as every one has admitted, by far superior to any that had preceded it; nor can Stanley's real praise be effaced, though it may be diminished, by an unfortunate charge that has been brought against him, of having appropriated to himself the conjectures, most of them unpublished, of Casaubon, Dorat, and Scaliger, to the number of at least three hundred emendations of the text. It will hardly be reckoned a proof of our nationality, that a living English scholar was the first to detect and announce this plagiarism of a critic, in whom we had been accustomed to take pride, from these foreigners. After these plumes have been withdrawn, Stanley's . Eschylus will remain a great monument of critical learning.

15. Meric Casanbon by his notes on Persius, Autoninus, [·] England's Grounds and Occasions of the Contempt of the Corgy This aram Criticum, ii. 498, (both by the little tract was published in .670, And Bishop of London.) went through ten editions by 1696.

⁺ Edinburgh Review, xix. 404. Mu-and Diogenes Laertius, Pearson by those on the last author, Ciale on famblichus, Price on Apuleius, Hudson by his editions of Thucydides and Josephus, Potter by standard that of Lycophron, Baxter of Anacreon, attested the progress of classical learning in a soil so well fitted to give it nourishment. The same William Baxter published the first grammar, not quite elementary, which had appeared in England, entitled De Analogia, seu Arte Latine Lingue Commentarius. It relates principally to etymology, and to the deduction of the different parts of the verb from a stem, which he conceives to be the imperative mood. Baxter was a man of some ability, but, in the style of critics, oftensively contemptuous towards his brethren of the craft.

16. We must hasten to the greatest of English critics in this, or possibly any other age, Richard Bentley. His first book was the epistle to Mill, subjoined to Bentley, its good to Mill, subjoined to Hangley the latter's edition of the chronicle of John Malala, a Greek writer of the lower empire. In a desultory and almost garrulous strain, Bentley pours forth an immense store of novel learning and of acute criticism, especially on his favourite subject, which was destined to become his glory, the scattered relics of the ancient dramatists. The style of Bentley, always terse and lively, sometimes humorous and drily sarcastic, whether be wrote in Latin or in English, could not but augment the admiration which his learning challenged. Greevins and Spanheim pronounced him the rising star of British literature, and a correspondence with the former began in 1692, which continued in unbroken friendship till his death.

17. But the rare qualities of Bentley were more abundantly displayed, and before the eyes of a more numerous trabunal, in his famous dissertation on the epistles ascribed to Phalaris. This was provoked, in the first instance, by a few lines of enlogy on these epistles by Sir William Temple, who pretended to find in them indubitable marks of authenticity. Bentley, in a dissertation subjoined to Wotton's Reflections on Modern and Ancient Learning, gave tolerably conclusive proofs of the contrary. A young man of high family and respectable learning, Charles Boyle, had published an edition of the Epistles of Phalaris, with some reflection on Bentley for personal incivility; a charge which he seems to have satisfactorily disproved. Bentley animadverted on this in his dissertation. Boyle the next year, with the assistance of some leading men at Oxford, Aldrich, King, and Atterbury, published his Examination of Bentley's Dissertation on Phalaris; a book generally called, in familiar brevity, Boyle against Bentley. The Cambridge giant of criticism replied in an answer which goes by the name of Bentley against Boyle. It was the first great literary war that had been waged in England; and like that of Troy, it has still the prerogative of being remembered after the Epistles of Phalaris are almost as much buried as the walls of Troy itself. Both combatants were skilful in wielding the sword: the arms of Boyle, in Swift's language, were given him by all the gods; but his antagonist stood forward in no such ligurative strength, master of a learning to which nothing parallel had been known in England, and that directed by an understanding prompt, discriminating, not idly sceptical, but still farther removed from trust in authority, sagacious in perceiving corruptions of language, and ingenious, at the least, in removing them, with a style rapid, concise, amusing, and superior to Boyle in that which he had chiefly to boast, a sarcastic wit. †

18. It may now seem extraordinary to us, even without looking at the anachronisms or similar errors which Bentley has exposed, that any one should be deceived by the Epistles of Phalaris. The rhetorical common-places, the cold declamation of the sophist, the care to please the reader, the absence of that simplicity, with which a man who has never

[•] The principal share in the undertaking felt to the letter Atterbury, this was suspected beyond at doubt by the publication of a letter of his to Boyle. Monk & I feed Berthey, p. 10.

^{4.} In point of eastern learning the joint otack of the confidency bore no proportion to that of Hentley; their acquaintance with several of the books up it which they comment appears only to have begon a post that occasion, and sometimes they are indicated for their knowledge of them to their adversars, compared with his boundless crudation their learning was that of school-hoya, and not always sufficient to preserve them from distressing mistakes. But profound literature was at that period continual to few, while wat and railery found numerous a deaper tenders. It may be don't all whether Boshs himself, by whom every one of the confiderated bound had been educated, possessed knowledge which would have quantied bounto to enter the own in another quantied bounto to enter the own in the contravers;

Mark's Be they paid. Warburnen has justey said, that Bentley by his wat found the Osaford men at their own wenpons.

known restraint in disguising his thoughts or choosing his words, is sure to express himself, strike us in the pretended letters of this buskined tyrant, the Icon Basilice of the ancient world. But this was doubtless thought evidence of their authenticity by many, who might say, as others have done in a happy vein of metaphor, that they seemed not written with a pen but with a sceptre. The argument from the use of the Attic dialect by a Sicilian tyrant, contemporary with Pythagoras, is of itself conclusive, and would leave no doubt in the present day.

19. "It may be remarked," says the Bishop of Gloucester, "that a scholar at that time possessed neither the aids Disdress nor the encouragements which are now presented to become smooth the paths of literature. The grammars of that age. the Latin and Greek languages were imperfectly and erroneously taught; and the critical scholar must have felt severely the absence of sufficient indexes, particularly of the voluminous scholiasts, grammarians, and later writers of Greece, in the examination of which no inconsiderable portion of a life might be consumed. Bentley, relying upon his own exertions and the resources of his own mind, pursued an original path of criticism, in which the intuitive quickness and subtilty of his genius qualified him to excel. In the faculty of memory so important for such pursuits, he has himself candidly declared that he was not particularly gifted. Consequently he practised throughout life the precaution of noting in the margin of his books the suggestions and conjectures which rushed into his mind during their perusal. To this habit of laying up materials in store, we may partly attribute the surprising rapidity with which some of his most important works were completed. He was also at the trouble of constructing for his own use indexes of authors quoted by the principal scholiasts, by Eustathius and other ancient commentators, of a nature similar to those afterwards published by Fabricius in his Bibliotheca Græca; which latter were the produce of the joint labour of various hands." .

Monk's Life of Bentley, p. 12.

SECT. II. - ON ANTIQUITIES.

Greenes and Gronovas - Fabretts - Numericatic Writers - Chronology,

20. THE two most industrious scholars of their time, Gravius and Gronovius, collected into one body such of the numerous treatises on Roman and Greek antiquities as they thought most worthy of preservation in an uniform and accessible work. These form the Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum by Grævius, in twelve volumes, the Thesaurus Antiquitatum Græcarum by Gronovius, in thirteen volumes; the former published in 1694, the first volumes of the latter in 1697. They comprehend many of the labours of the older antiquaries already commemorated from the middle of the sixteenth to that of the seventeenth century, and some also of a later date. Among these, in the collection of Grævius, are a treatise of Albert Rubens, son of the great painter, on the dress of the Romans, particularly the laticlave, (Autwerp, 1665,) the enlarged edition of Octavius Ferrarius on the same subject, several treatises by Spanheim and Ursatus, and the Roma Antica of Nardini, published in 1666. Gronovius gave a place in his twelfth volume (1702) to the very recent work of a young Englishman, Potter's Antiquities, which the author, at the request of the veteran antiquary, had so much enlarged, that the Latin translation in Gronovius is nearly double in length the first edition of the English. The warm eulogies of Gronovius attest the merit of this celebrated work. Potter was but twenty-three years of age; he had of course availed himself of the writings of Meursius, but he has also contributed to supersede them. It has been said that he is less exact in attending to the difference of times and places than our finer criticism requires. †

21. Bellori, in a long list of antiquarian writings, Falconicri in several more, especially his Inscriptiones Athletice, maintained the honour of Italy in this province so justly claimed as her own.1 But no one has been accounted equal to Raphael Fabretti, by judges so competent as Maffei, Gravina, Fabroni, and Visconti. . His diligence in collecting inscriptions was only surpassed by his sagacity in explaining them; and his authority has been preferred to that of any other antiquary. † His time was spent in delving among ruins and vaults, to explore the subterranean treasures of Latium; no heat, nor cold, nor rain, nor badness of road, could deter him from these solitary peregrinations. Yet the glory of Fabretti must be partly shared with his horse. This wise and faithful animal, named Marco Polo, had acquired, it is said, the habit of standing still, and as it were pointing, when he came near an antiquity; his master candidly owning that several things which would have escaped him had been detected by the antiquarian quadruped. 1 Fabretti's principal works are three dissertations on the Roman aqueducts, and one on the Trajan column. Little, says Fabroni, was known before about the Roman galleys or their naval affairs in general. § Fabretti was the first who reduced lapidary remains into classes, and arranged them so as to illustrate each other; a method, says one of his most distinguished successors, which has laid the foundations of the science. A profusion of collateral learning is mingled with the main stream of all his investigations.

The first edition of Potter's Antiquittes was published in 1697 and 1698. | Saift, vol. xi. p. 364.

22. No one had ever come to the study of medals with such stores of erudition as Exekiel Spanbeim. The Names earlier writers on the subject, Vico, Erizzo, Angedwelt on the genuineness or rarity of coins than on their usefulness in illustrating history. Spanheim's Dissertations on the Use of Medals, the second improved edition of which appeared in 1671, first connected them with the most profound and critical research into antiquity. ¶ Vaillant, travelling into the Levant, brought home great treasures of Greek coinage, especially those of the Selencide, at once enriching the cabinets of the curious and establishing historical truth, Medallic evidence, in fact, may be reckoned among those [·] Fabretil's life has been written by two very favourable biographers, Fabroni, in Vite Italorum, vol. via. and Viscouti, in the Biographic Universille.

[†] Fabrons, p. 187. Biogr. Univ.

[†] Fabroni, p. 192.

^{$} P 201

Boge Unix Bibl. Chome, vol. xxii.

checks upon the negligence of historians, that having been retrieved by industrious antiquaries, have created a cautious and discerning spirit which has been exercised in later times upon facts, and which, beginning in scepticism, passes onward to a more rational, and therefore more secure, conviction of what can fairly be proved. Jobert, in 1692, consolidated the researches of Spanheim, Vaillant, and other numismatic writers in his book, entitled La Science des Médailles, a better system of the science than had been published.*

23. It would of course not be difficult to fill these pages chemology, with brief notices of other books that fall within the extensive range of classical antiquity. But we have no space for more than a mere enumeration, which would give little satisfaction. Chronology has received some attention in former volumes. Our learned Archbishop Usher might there have been named, since the first part of his Annals of the Old Testament, which goes down to the year of the world 3828, was published in 1650. The second part followed in 1654. This has been the chronology generally adopted by English historians, as well as by Bossuet. Calmet, and Rollin, so that for many years it might be called the orthodox scheme of Europe. No former annals of the world had been so exact in marking dates and collating sacred history with profane. It was therefore exceedingly convenient for those who, possessing no sufficient leisure or learning for these inquiries, might very reasonably confide in such authority.

21. Usher, like Scaliger and Petavius, had strictly conformed to the Hebrew chronology in all scriptural dates. But it is well known that the Septuagint version, and also the Samaritan Pentateuch, differ greatly from the Hebrew and from each other, so that the age of the world has nearly 2000 years more antiquity in the Greek than in the original text. Jerome had followed the latter in the Vulgate; and in the seventeenth century it was usual to maintain the incorrupt purity of the Hebrew manuscripts, so that when Pezron, in his Antiquité des Temps dévoilée, 1087, attempted to establish the Septuagint chronology, it excited a clamour in some of his church, as derogatory to the Vulgate translation. Martianay defended the received chronology, and the system of Pezron gained little favour in that age. It has since become more popular, chiefly perhaps on account of the greater latitude it gives to speculations on the origin of kingdoms and other events of the early world, which are certainly somewhat cramped in the common reckoning. But the Septuagint chronology is not free from its own difficulties, and the internal evidence seems rather against its having been the original. Where two must be wrong, it is possible that all three may be so; and the most judicious inquirers into ancient history have of late been coming to the opinion, that, with certain exceptions, there are no means of establishing an entire accuracy in dates before the Olympiads. While much of the more ancient history itself, even in leading and important events, is so precarious as must be acknowledged, there can be little confidence in chronological schemes. They seem however to be very seducing, so that those who enter upon the subject as sceptics become believers in their own theory.

[.] Biogr. Univ.

25. Among those who addressed their attention to particular portions of chronology, Sir John Marsham ought to be mentioned. In his Canon Chronicus Ægyptiacus he attempted, as the learned were still more prone than they are now, to reconcile conflicting authorities without rejecting any. He is said to have first started the ingenious idea that the Egyptian dynasties, stretching to such immense antiquity, were not successive but collateral. † Marsham fell, like many others after him, into the unfortunate mistake of confounding Sesostris with Sesac. But in times when discoveries that Marsham could not have anticipated were yet at a distance, he is extolled by most of those who had laboured, by help of the Greek and Hebrew writers alone, to fix ancient history on a stable foundation, as the restorer of the Egyptian annals.

tisnay. Bibliotheque Univ agiv. 103.

[.] Biogr Univ arts Pezron and Mars . Biograph, Britannics.

 excited a clamour in some of his church, as derogatory to the Vulgate translation. Martianay defended the received chronology, and the system of Pezron gained little favour in that age. It has since become more popular, chiefly perhaps on account of the greater latitude it gives to speculations on the origin of kingdoms and other events of the early world, which are certainly somewhat cramped in the common reckoning. But the Septuagint chronology is not free from its own difficulties, and the internal evidence seems rather against its having been the original. Where two must be wrong, it is possible that all three may be so; and the most judicious inquirers into ancient history have of late been coming to the opinion, that, with certain exceptions, there are no means of establishing an entire accuracy in dates before the Olympiads. While much of the more ancient history itself, even in leading and important events, is so precarious as must be acknowledged, there can be little confidence in chronological schemes. They seem however to be very seducing, so that those who enter upon the subject as sceptics become believers in their own theory.

25. Among those who addressed their attention to particular portions of chronology, Sir John Marsham Marsham ought to be mentioned. In his Canon Chronicus Ægyptiacus he attempted, as the learned were still more prone than they are now, to reconcile conflicting authorities without rejecting any. He is said to have first started the ingenious idea that the Egyptian dynasties, stretching to such immense antiquity, were not successive but collateral. † Marsham fell, like many others after him, into the unfortunate mistake of confounding Sesostris with Sesac. But in times when discoveries that Marsham could not have anticipated were yet at a distance, he is extolled by most of those who had laboured, by help of the Greek and Hebrew writers alone, to fix aucient history on a stable foundation, as the restorer of the Egyptian annals.

^{*} Biogr. Univ arts. Perron and Mar- † Biograph. Britannica. tiancy Bibliotheque Univ. xxiv 103.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THEOLOGICAL LITERATURE, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

SECT. I.

Papal Power limited by the Gallican Church — Dupin — Fleury — Protestant Controversy — Bossuet — His Assaults on Protestantism — Jansenism — Progress of Arminianism in England — Trinitarian Controversy — Defences of Christmanity — Pascal's Thoughts — Toleration — Boyle — Locke — French Sermons — And English — Other Theological Works.

1. It has been observed in the last volume, that while little or no decline could be perceived in the general pend in church of Rome at the conclusion of that period which we then had before us, yet the papal authority itself had lost a part of that formidable character, which through the Jesuits, and especially Bellarmin, it had some vears before assumed. This was now still more decidedly manifest: the temporal power over kings was not, certainly, renounced, for Rome never retracts any thing; nor was it perhaps without Italian Jesuits to write in its behalf; but the common consent of nations rejected it so strenuously, that on no occasion has it been brought forward by any accredited or eminent advocate. There was also a growing disposition to control the court of Rome; the treaty of Westphalia was concluded in utter disregard of her protest. But such matters of history do not belong to us, when they do not bear a close relation to the warfare of the pen. Some events there were which have had a remarkable influence on the theological literature of France, and indirectly of the rest of Europe.

2. Louis XIV., more arrogant, in his earlier life, thau biggotted, became involved in a contest with Inno-Dapote of cent XI., by a piece of his usual despotism and contempt of his subjects' rights. He extended in occar XL 1678 the ancient prerogative, called the regale, by which the king enjoyed the revenues of vacant bishoprics, to all the kingdom, though many sees had been legally exempt from it. Two bishops appealed to the pope, who interfered in their favour more peremptorily than the times would permit. Innocent, it is but just to say, was maintaining the fair rights of the church, rather than any claim of his own. But the dispute took at length a different form. France was rich in prelates of eminent worth, and among such, as is evident, the Cisalpine theories had never lain wholly dormant since the councils of Constance and Basle. Louis convened the famous assembly of the Gallican clergy in 1682. Bossuet, who is said to have felt some apprehensions lest the spirit of resistance should become one of rebellion, was appointed to open this assembly; and his sermon on that occasion is among his most splendid works. His posture was indeed magnificent: he stands foward, not so much the minister of religion as her arbitrator; we see him poise in his hands earth and heaven, and draw that boundary line which neither was to transgress; he speaks the language of reverential love towards the mother-church, that of St. Peter, and the faircst of her daughters to which he belongs, conciliating their transient feud; yet in this majestic tone which he assumes, no arrogance betrays itself, no thought of himself as one endowed with transcendant influence; he speaks for his church, and yet we feel that he raises himself above those for whom he speaks.*

3. Bossuet was finally entrusted with drawing up the four articles, which the assembly, rather at the instigation perhaps of Colbert than of its own accord, item promulgated as the Gallican creed on the limitations of papal authority. These declare: 1. That kings are subject to no ecclesiastical power in temporals, nor can be deposed directly or indirectly by the chiefs of the church:

^{*} This sermon will be found in Œuvres de Bossust, vol. ix.

2. That the decrees of the council of Constance as to the papal authority are in full force and ought to be observed: 3. That this authority can only be exerted in conformity with the canons received in the Gallican church: 4. That though the pope has the principal share in determining controversies of faith, and his decrees extend to all churches, they are not absolutely final, unless the consent of the catholic church be superadded. It appears that some bishops would have willingly used stronger language, but Bossuet foresaw the risk of an absolute schism. Even thus the Gallican church approached so nearly to it that, the pope refusing the usual bulls to bishops nominated by the king according to the concordat, between thirty and forty sees, at last, were left No reconciliation was effected till 1693, in the vacaut. pontificate of Innocent XII. It is to be observed, whether the French writers slur this over or not, that the pope gained the honours of war; the bishops who had sat in the assembly of 1682 writing separately letters which have the appearance of regretting, if not retracting, what they had done. These were however worded with intentional equivocation; and as the court of Rome yields to none in suspecting the subterfuges of words, it is plain that it contented itself with an exterior humiliation of its adversaries. The old question of the regale was tacitly settled; Louis enjoyed all that he had desired, and Rome might justly think herself not bound to fight for the privileges of those who had made her so bad a return.

4. The doctrine of the four articles gained ground perhaps in the church of France through a work of great boldness, and deriving authority from the learning and judgment of its author Dupin. In the height of the contest, while many were considering how far the Gallican church might dispense with the institution of bishops at Rome, that point in the established system which evidently secured the victory to their antagonist, in the year 1686, he published a treatise on the ancient discipline of the church. It is written in Latin, which he probably chose as less obnoxious than his own language. It may be true, which I cannot affirm or deny, that each position in this work had been advanced before; but the general tone seems undoubtedly more adverse to the papal supremacy than any book which could have come from a man of reputed orthodoxy. It tends, notwithstanding a few necessary admissions, to represent almost all that can be called power or jurisdiction in the see of Rome as acquired, if not abusive, and would leave, in a practical sense, no real pope at all; mere primary being a trifle, and even the right of interfering by admonition being of no great value, when there was no definite obligation to obey. The principle of Dupin is, that the church having reached her perfection in the fourth century, we should endeavour, as far as circumstances will admit, to restore the discipline of that age. But, even in the Gallican church, it has generally been held that he has urged his argument farther than is consistent with a necessary subordination to Rome.

[•] I have derived most of this account the Gallican prelates in 1693. But when from Bansset's life of Bossnet, vol. ii. Both the bishop and his biographer shuffle a good deal about the letter of ready to take up arms again.

5. In the same year Dupin published the first volume of a more celebrated work, his Nouvelle Bibliothèque Dopon's Ecdes Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, a complete history of theological literature, at least within the limits of the church, which, in a long series of volumes, he finally brought down to the close of the seventeenth century. It is unquestionably the most standard work of that kind extant, whatever deficiencies may have been found in its execution. The immense erudition requisite for such an undertaking must have rendered it inevitable to take some things at second hand, or to fall into some errors; and we may add other causes less necessary, the youth of the writer in the first volumes, and the rapidity with which they appeared. Integrity, love of truth, and moderation, distinguish this ecclesiastical history, perhaps beyond any other. Dupin is often near the frontier of orthodoxy, but he is careful, even in the eyes of jealous Catholics, not quite to overstep it. This work was soon translated into English, and furnished a large part of such knowledge on the subject as our own divines possessed. His free way of speaking, however, on the Roman supremacy and some other points, excited the animadversion of more rigid persons, and among others of Bossuet, who atood on his own vantage-ground, ready to strike on every side. The most impartial critics have been of Dupin's mind; but Bossuet, like all dogmatic champions of orthodoxy, never sought truth by an analytical process of investigation, assuming his own possession of it as an axiom in the controversy.

Bibliothèque Universelle, vi. 109, through by those who would understand. The book is very clear, concise, and such matters. I have not observed that learned, so that it is worth reading it is much quoted by English writers.

6. Dupin was followed a few years afterwards by one not his superior in learning and candour (though Fleury's Ecologistical History deficient in neither), but in skill of narration and beauty of style, Claude Fleury. The first volume of his Ecclesiastical History came forth in 1691; but a part only of the long series falls within this century. The learning of Fleury has been said to be frequently not original, and his prolixity to be too great for an elementary historian. The former is only blamable when he has concealed his immediate authorities; few works of great magnitude have been written wholly from the prime sources; with regard to his diffuseness, it is very convenient to those who want access to the original writers, or leisure to collate them. Fleury has been called by some credulous and uncritical; but he is esteemed faithful, moderate, and more respectful or cautious than Dupin. Yet many of his volumes are a continual protest against the vices and ambition of the medieval popes, and his Ecclesiastical History must be reckoned among the causes of that estrangement, in spirit and affection, from the court of Rome which leavens the theological literature of France in the eighteenth century.

7. The dissertations of Fleury, interspersed with his history, were more generally securiors cuously excellent. Concise, but neither dry nor tory, were more generally read and more conspisuperficial; luminous, yet appearing simple; philosophical without the affectation of profundity, seizing all that is most essential in their subject without the tediousness of detail or

Bibliotheque Universelle, in 10., provokes the prelate of Meaux. Cas vii 395, xxii 120. Biggr Universelle, grands critiques sont pou favorables and Chaves de Bossiet, vol xxi. Dupin superiorites ecclesioniques, et d'aiment guere plut celles des eveques que celle of bishops to proste jure divino, which the pedantry of quotation; written, above all, with that clearness, that ease, that unaffected purity of taste, which belong to the French style of that bestage, they present a contrast not only to the inferior writings on philosophical history with which our age abounds, but, in some respects, even to the best. It cannot be a crime that these dissertations contain a good deal which, after more than a century's labour in historical inquiry, has become more familiar than it was.

8. The French Protestants, notwithstanding their disarmed condition, were not, I apprehend, much oppressed under Richelieu and Mazarin. But soon afterwards anthorny an eagerness to accelerate what was taking place through natural causes, their return into the church, brought on a series of harassing edicts, which ended in the revocation of that of Nantes. During this time they were assailed by less terrible weapons, yet such as required no ordinary strength to resist, the polemical writings of the three greatest men in the church of France, Nicole, Arnauld, and Bossuet. The two former were desirous to efface the reproaches of an approximation to Calvinism, and of a disobedience to the catholic church, under which their Jansenist party was labouring. Nicole began with a small treatise, entitled La Perpétuité de la Foi de l'Eglise Catholique, touchant l'Eucharistie, in 1005. This aimed to prove that the tenet of transubstantiation had been constant in the church. Claude, the most able controvertist among the French Protestants, replied in the next year. This led to a much more considerable work by Nicole and Arnauld conjointly, with the same title as the former; nor was Claude slow in combating his doubleheaded adversary. Nicole is said to have written the greater portion of this second treatise, though it commonly bears the name of his more illustrious colleague.

9. Both Arnauld and Nicole were eclipsed by the most distinguished and successful advocate of the catholic Bosonetic church, Bossuet. His Exposition de la Foi Catho-Carbon of lique was written in 1668, for the use of two brothers of the Dangeau family; but having been communicated to Turenne, the most eminent Protestant that remained in France, it contributed much to his conversion. It was published in 1671; and though enlarged from the first sketch, does not exceed eighty pages in octavo. Nothing can be more precise, more clear, or more free from all circuity and detail than this little book; every thing is put in the most specious light; the authority of the ancient church, recognised, at least nominally, by the majority of Protestants, is alone kept in sight. Bossnet limits himself to doctrines established by the council of Trent, leaving out of the discussion not only all questionable points, but, what is perhaps less fair, all rites and usages, however general, or sanctioned by the regular discipline of the church, except so far as formally approved by that council. Hence he glides with a transient step over the invocation of saints and the worship of images, but presses with his usual dexterity on the inconsistencies and weak concessions of his antagonists. The Calvinists, or some of them, had employed a jargon of words about real presence, which he exposes with admirable brevity and vigour. Nor does he gain less advantage in favour of tradition and church authority from the assumption of somewhat similar claims by the same party. It has often been alleged that the Exposition of Bossuet was not well received by many on his own side. And for this there seems to be some foundation, though the protestant controvertists have made too much of the facts. It was published at Rome in 1678, and approved in the most formal manner by Innocent XI. the next year. But it must have been perceived to separate the faith of the church, as it rested on dry propositions, from the same faith living and embodied in the everyday worship of the people.†

10. Bossuet was now the acknowledged champion of the Roman church in France; Claude was in equal pre-eminence the Protestants occupy nine volumes, avai-xxvi., lo the great edition of his works. Versailes, 1816. The Exposition de la Foi is in the eighteenth, Bouwet, in his life of Bossoet, appears to have refuted the evaggerations of many Protestants as to the ill reception of this little book at Rome. For there they differ. Vol. xviii p. 155.

† The writings of Bossuet against Bibliotheque Universelle, vol xi. p. 453 was a certain foundation for them. See

[·] Bosniet observes, that most other controversies are found to depend more on words than substance, and the difference becomes less the more they are exam ned, but in that of the eucharat the contrary is the case, since the Ca vin sts endeavour to accommodate their pleaseolegy to the Untholies, while essentially on the other side. These great adversaries had a regular conference in 1678. Mademoiselle de Duras, a protestant lady, like most others of her rank at that time, was wavering about religion, and in her presence the dispute was carried on. It entirely turned on church authority. The arguments of Bossuet differ only from those which have often been adduced by the spirit and conciseness with which he presses them. We have his own account, which of course gives himself the victory. It was almost as much of course that the lady was converted; for it is seldom that a woman can withstand the popular argument on that side, when she has once gone far enough to admit the possibility of its truth, by giving it a hearing. Yet Bossuet deals in sophisms which, though always in the mouths of those who call themselves orthodox, are contemptible to such as know facts as well as logic. "I urged," he says, "in a few words, what presumption it was to believe that we can better understand the word of God than all the rest of the church, and that nothing would thus prevent there being as many religions as persons." But there can be no presumption in supposing that we may understand any thing better than one who has never examined it at all; and if this rest of the church, so magnificently brought forward, have commonly acted on Bossuet's principle, and thought it presumptuous to judge for themselves; if out of many millions of persons a few only have deliberately reasoned on religion, and the rest have been, like true zeros, nothing in themselves, but much in sequence; if also, as is most frequently the case, this presumptuousness is not the assertion of a paradox or povelty, but the preference of one denomination of Christians, or of one tenet maintained by respectable authority, to another, we can only scorn the emptiness, as well as resent the effrontery of this common-place that rings so often in our ears. Certainly reason is so far from condemning a deference to the judgment of the wise and good, that nothing is more irrational than to neglect it; but when this is claimed for those whom we need not believe to have been wiser and better than ourselves, nay, sometimes whom without vainglory we may esteem less, and that so as to set aside the real authority of the most philosophical, unbiassed, and judicious of mankind, it is not pride or presumption, but a sober use of our faculties that rejects the jurisdiction.

Œuvrea de Bossuet, xxui, 290.

11. Bossuet once more engaged in a similar discussion correspond. about 1691. Among the German Lutherans there ence with Mornor and seems to have been for a long time a lurking notion that on some terms or other a reconciliation with the church of Rome could be effected; and this was most countenanced in the dominions of Brunswick, and above all in the university of Helmstadt. Leibnitz himself and Molanus, a Lutheran divine, were the negotiators on that side with Bossuet. Their treaty, for such it was apparently understood to be, was conducted by writing; and when we read their papers on both sides, nothing is more remarkable than the tone of superiority which the catholic plenipotentiary, if such he could be deemed without powers from any one but himself, has thought fit to assume. No concession is offered, no tenet explained away; the sacramental cup to the laity, and a permission to the Lutheran clergy already married to retain their wives after their re-ordination, is all that he holds forth; and in this, doubtless, he had no authority from Rome. Bossuet could not veil his haughty countenance, and his language is that of asperity and contemptuousness instead of moderation. He dictates terms of surrender as to a besieged city when the breach is already practicable, and hardly deigns to show his clemency by granting the smallest favour to the garrison. It is curious to see the strained constructions, the artifices of silence to which Molanus has recourse, in order to make out some pretence for his ignominious surrender. Leibnitz, with whom the correspondence broke off in 1693, and was renewed again in 1699, seems not quite so yielding as the other; and the last biographer of Bossuet suspects that the German philosopher was insincere or tortuous in the negotiation. If this were so, he must have entered upon it less of his own accord than to satisfy the Princess Sophia, who, like many of her family, had been a little wavering, till our act of settlement became a true settlement to their faith. This bias of the court of Hanover is intimated in several passages. The success of this treaty of union, or rather of subjection, was as little to be expected as it was desirable; the old spirit of Lutheranism was much worn out, but there must surely have been a determination to resist so unequal a compromise. Rome negotiated as a conqueror with these beaten Carthaginians; yet no one had beaten them but themselves.

12. The warfare of the Roman church may be carried on either in a series of conflicts on the various doc- Ha Vana. trines wherein the reformers separated from her, or protestat by one pitched battle on the main question of a conclusive authority somewhere in the church. Bossuet's temper, as well as his inferiority in original learning, led him in preference to the latter scheme of theological strategy. It was also manifestly that course of argument which was most likely to persuade the unlearned. He followed up the blow which he had already struck against Claude in his famous work on the Variations of Protestant Churches. Never did his genius find a subject more fit to display its characteristic impetuosity, its arrogance, or its cutting and merciless spirit of sarcasm. The weaknesses, the inconsistent evasions, the extravagances of Luther, Zwingle, Calvin, and Beza, pass, one after another, before us, till these great reformers seem like victim prisoners to be bewn down by the indignant prophet. That Bossnet is candid in statement, or even faithful in quotation, I should much doubt; he gives the words of his adversaries in his own French, and the references are not made to any specified edition of their voluminous writings. The main point, as he contends it to be, that the protestant churches (for he does not confine this to persons) fluctuated much in the sixteenth century, is sufficiently proved; but it remained to show that this was a reproach. Those who have taken a different view from Bossuet may perhaps think that a little more of this censure would have been well incurred; that they have varied too little rather than too much; and that it is far more difficult, even in controversy with the church of Rome, to withstand the inference which their long creeds and confessions, as well as the language too common with their theologiaus, have furnished to her more ancient and catholic claim of infallibility, than to vindicate those successive variations which are analogous to the necessary course of human reason on all other subjects. The essential fallacy of Romanism, that truth must ever exist visibly on earth, is implied in the whole strain of Bossuet's attack on the variances of protestantism: it is evident that variance of opinion proves error somewhere; but unless it can be shown that we have any certain method of excluding it, this should only lead us to be more indulgent towards the judgment of others, and less confident of our own. The notion of an intriusic moral criminality in religious error is at the root of the whole argument; and till Protestants are well rid of this, there seems no secure mode of withstanding the effect which the vast weight of authority asserted by the Latin church, even where it has not the aid of the Eastern, must produce on timid and scrupulous minds.

^{* (}Euvres de Bossuet, vols, xxv. and xxvi.

13. In no period has the Anglican church stood up so powerfully in defence of the protestant cause as in that before us. From the sera of the Restoration to the close of the century the war was unremitting and vigorous. And it is particularly to be remarked, that the principal champions of the church of England threw off that ambiguous syncretism which had displayed itself under the first Stuarts, and, comparatively at least with their immediate predecessors, avoided every admission which might facilitate a deceitful compromise. We can only mention a few of the writers who signalised themselves in this controversy.

14. Taylor's Dissuasive from Popery was published in Taylor's 1664; and in this his latest work we find the same Present general strain of protestant reasoning, the same rejection of all but scriptural authority, the same free exposure of the inconsistencies and fallacies of tradition, the same tendency to excite a sceptical feeling as to all except the primary doctrines of religion, which had characterised the Liberty of Prophesying. These are mixed, indeed, in Taylor's manner, with a few passages, (they are, I think, but few.) which singly taken might seem to breathe not quite this spirit; but the tide flows for the most part the same way, and it is evident that his mind had undergone no change. The learning, in all his writings, is profuse; but Taylor never leaves me with the impression that he is exact and scrupulous in its application. In one part of this Dissuasive from Popery, having been reproached with some inconsistency, he has no scruple to avow that in a former work he had employed weak arguments for a laudable purpose.

15. Barrow, not so extensively learned as Taylor, who had read rather too much, but inferior, perhaps, arrow even in that respect to hardly any one else, and strength of reasoning, combated against Rome in many of his sermons, and especially in a long treatise on the papal supremacy. Stillingfleet followed, a man deeply versed in ecclesiastical antiquity, of an argumentative mind, excellently fitted for polemical dispute, but perhaps by those habits of his life rendered too much of an advocate to satisfy an impartial reader. In the critical reign of James II., he may be considered as the leader on the protestant side; but Wake, Tillotson, and several more, would deserve mention in a fuller history of ecclesiastical literature.

16. The controversies always smouldering in the church of Rome, and sometimes breaking into flame, to which the Anti-Pelagian writings of Augustin had originally given birth, have been slightly touched in our former volumes. It has been seen that the rigidly predestinarian theories had been condemned by the court of Rome in Baius, that the opposite doctrine of Molina had narrowly escaped censure, that it was safest to abstain from any language not verbally that of the church, or of Augustin, whom the church held incontrovertible. But now a more serious and celebrated controversy, that of the Jansenists, pierced as it were to the heart of the church. It arose before the middle of the century. Jansenius, Bishop of Ypres, in his Augustinus, published, after his death, in 1640, gave, as he professed, a faithful statement of the tenets of that father. "We do not inquire," he says, " what men ought to believe on the powers of human nature, or on the grace and predestination of God, but what Augustin once preached with the approbation of the church, and has consigned to writing in many of his works." This book is in three parts; the first containing a history of the Pelagian controversy, the second and third an exposition of the tenets of Augustin. Jansenius does not, however, confine himself so much to mere analysis, but that he attacks the Jesuits Lessius and Molina, and even reflects on the bull of Pius V. condemning Baius, which he cannot wholly approve. *

Taylor's Works, x. 304. This is of using arguments and authorities in not surprising, as in his Ductor Dubs-controversy, which we do not believe to tantium, xi. 464., he maintains the right be valid.

17. Richelieu, who is said to have retained some animosity against Jansenius on account of a book called Mars Gallicus, which he had written on the side of his sovereign the king of Spain, designed to obtain the condemnation of the Augustinus by the French clergy. The Jesuits, therefore, had gained ground so far that the doctrines of Augustin were out of fashion, though few besides themselves ventured to reject his nominal authority. It is certainly clear that Jansenius offended the greater part of the church. But he had some powerful advocates, and especially Antony Arnauld, the most renowned of a family long conspicuous for eloquence, for piety, and for opposition to the Jesuits. In 1649, after several years of obscure dispute, Cornet, syndic of the faculty of theology in the University of Paris, brought forward for censure seven propositions, five of which became afterwards so famous, without saving that they were found in the work of Jansenius. The faculty condemned them, though it had never been reckoned favourable to the Jesuits; a presumption that they were nt least expressed in a manner repugnant to the prevalent doctrine. Yet Le Clerc declares his own opinion that there may be some ambiguity in the style of the first, but that the

· A very copious history of Januarism, his tragedies do in verse, it entitles him Avery copious history of Januarison, and trageous do in the first of those who have will be found in the footbeath volume anecoeded in both. Is it not probable, of the Bibliothique University p 1 ">— that in some scenes of Athala he had 398, from which Mosbeum has derived. Port Royal before his eyes? The bismost of what we read in his Ecclesias-tical History. And the History of Port Royal was written by Rueme in so per-markable, had entered the final against Nicole in 1668, clacily indeed to defend we may hardly think with Olivet that it theate cal representations, but not with-spicuous and nest a style, that, though places him as high in prose writing as out many sarcasms against Jansensam.

other four are decidedly conformable to the theology of Augustin.

18. The Jesuits now took the course of calling in the authority of Rome. They pressed Innocent X. to and at condemn the five propositions, which were maintained by some doctors in France. It is not the policy of that court to compromise so delicate a possession as infallibility by bringing it to the test of that personal judgment, which is of necessity the arbiter of each man's own obedience. The popes have, in fact, rarely taken a part, independently of councils, in these school debates. The bull of Pius V., a man too zealous by character to regard prudence, in which he condemned many tenets of Baius, had not, nor could it give satisfaction to those who saw with their own eyes that it swerved from the Augustinian theory. Innocent was, at first, unwilling to meddle with a subject which, as he owned to a friend, he did not understand. But after hearing some discussions, he grew more confident of his knowledge, which he ascribed, as in duty bound, to the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, and went so heartily along with the Anti-Jansenists, that he refused to hear the deputies of the other party. On the S1st of May, 1653, he condemned the five propositions, four as erroneous, and the fifth in stronger language; declaring, however, not in the bull, but orally, that he did not condemn the tenet of efficacious grace (which all the Dominicans held), nor the doctrine of Saint Augustin, which was, and ever would be, that of the church.

19. The Jansenists were not bold enough to hint that they did not acknowledge the infallibility of the pope in an express and positive declaration. Even if they had an evident recognition of this censure of the five propositions by their own church, and might dread its being so generally received as to give the sanction which no Catholic can withstand. They had recourse, unfortunately, to a subterfuge which put them in the wrong. They admitted that the propositions were false, but demed that they could be found in the book of Jansenius. Thus each party rested on the denial of a matter of fact, and each erroneously, according at least to the judgment of the most learned and impartial Protestants. The five propositions express the doctrine of Augustin himself; and if they do this, we can hardly doubt that they express that of Jansenius. In a short time this ground of evasion was taken from their party. An assembly of French prelates in the first place, and afterwards Alexander VII., successor of Innocent X., condemned the propositions, as in Jansenius, and in the sense intended by Jansenius.

20. The Jansenists were now driven to the wall; the Sorand are per. bonne in 1655, in consequence of some propositions of Arnauld, expelled him from the theological faculty; a formulary was drawn up to be signed by the clergy, condemning the propositions of Jansenius, which was finally established in 1661; and those who refused, even nuns, underwent a harassing persecution. The most striking instance of this, which still retains an historical character, was the dissolution of the famous convent of Port-Royal, over which Angelica Arnauld, sister of the great advocate of Jansenism, had long presided with signal reputation. This nunnery was at Paris, having been removed in 1644 from an ancient Cistertian convent of the same name, about six leagues distant, and called for distinction Port-Royal des Champs. To this now unfrequented building some of the most eminent men repaired for study, whose writings being anonymously published, have been usually known by the name of their residence. Arnauld, Pascal, Nicole, Lancelot, De Sacy, are among the Messicurs de Port-Royal, an appellation so glorious in the seventeenth century. The Jansenists now took a distinction, very reasonable, as it seems, in its nature, between the authority which asserts or denies a proposition, and that which does the like as to a fact. They refused to the pope, that is, in this instance, to the church, the latter infallibility. We cannot prosecute this part of ecclesiastical history farther; if writings of any literary importance had been produced by the controversy, they would demand our attention; but this does not appear to have been the case. The controversy between Arnauld and Malebranche may perhaps be an exception. The latter, carried forward by his original genius, attempted to deal with the doctrines of theology as with metaphysical problems, in his Traité de la Nature et de la Grace. Arnauld animadverted

Malebranche replied in Lettres du Père Malebranche à un de ses Amis. This was published in 1686, and the controversy between such eminent masters of abstruse reasoning began to excite attention. Malebranche seems to have retired first from the field. His antagonist had great advantages in the dispute, according to received systems of theology, with which he was much more conversant, and perhaps on the whole in the philosophical part of the question. This however cannot be reckoned entirely a Jansenistic controversy, though it involved those perilous difficulties which had raised that flame.

21. The credit of Augustin was now as much shaken in the protestant, as in the catholic regions of Europe. Episcopius had given to the Remonstrant party a Propress of reputation which no sect so inconsiderable in its separate character has ever possessed. The Dutch Arminians were at no time numerous; they took no hold of the people; they had few churches, and though not persecuted by the now lenient policy of Holland, were still under the han of an orthodox clergy, as exclusive and bigotted as before. But their writings circulated over Europe, and made a silent impression on the adverse party. It became less usual to bring forward the Augustinian hypothesis in prominent or unequivocal language. Courcelles born at Geneva, and the Courcelles successor of Episcopius in the Remonstrant congregation at Amsterdam, with less genius than his predecessor, had perhaps a more extensive knowledge of ecclesiastical antiquity. His works were much in esteem with the theologians of that way of thinking; but they have not fallen in my way.

22. Limborch, great-nephew of Episcopius, seems more than any other Arminian divine to have inherited his mantle. His most important work is the Theologia Christiana, containing a system of divinity and morals, in seven books and more than 900 pages, published in 1086. It is the fullest delineation of the Arminian scheme; but as the Arminians were by their principle free inquirers, and not, like other churches, bondsmen of symbolical formularies, no one book can strictly be taken as their representative. The

An account of this controversy will be found at length in the second volume of the Bibliotheque I arrestelle.

vot. III.

tenets of Limborch are, in the majority of disputable points, such as impartial men have generally found in the primitive or Ante-Nicene fathers; but in some he probably deviates from them, steering far away from all that the Protestants of the Swiss reform had abandoned as superstitious or unintelligible.

23. John Le Clerc in the same relationship to Conrcelles that Limborch was to Episcopius, and like him transplanted from Geneva to the more liberal air, at that time, of the United Provinces, claims a high place among the Dutch Arminians; for though he did not maintain their cause either in systematic or polemical writings, his commentary on the Old Testament, and still more his excellent and celebrated reviews, the Bibliothèques Universelle, Choisie, and Ancienne et Moderne, must be reckoned a perpetual combat on that side. These journals enjoyed an extraordinary influence over Europe, and deserved to enjoy it. Le Clerc is generally temperate, judicious, appeals to no passion, displays a very extensive, though not perhaps a very deep erudition, lies in wait for the weakness and temerity of those he reviews, thus sometimes gaining the advantage over more learned men than himself. He would have been a perfect master of that sort of criticism, then newly current in literature, if he could have repressed an irritability in matters personal to himself, and a degree of prejudice against the Romish writers, or perhaps those styled orthodox in general, which sometimes disturbs the phlegmatic steadiness with which a good reviewer, like a practised sportsman, brings down his game."

24. The most remarkable progress made by the Arminian understood the Greek metres as well as Bentley and Porson, or those who have trod in their steps, nor supposed that all learning was concentred in that knowledge, as we seemed in danger of supposing within my memory. The latter is not warranted by the general character of Le Clenc's criticisms, which, where be his no personal quarrel, is temperate and moderate, neither teadner g men, our impating motives; and consequently include certain periodical criticism of a later date.

^{} Hishop Monk observes that Le Clere is seen at 1 have been the first person who understood the power which may be exercised over literature by a reviewer." Life of Bentley, p. 209. This may be true, especially as he was nearly the first reviewer, and certainly better than his predecessors. But this remark is followed by a sareisstic animadversion upon Le Clerc's ignorance of Greek metres, and by the severe assertion, that "by an absolute system of terror be made hunself a despot in the republic of letters." The former is also so far true, that be neither theology was in England. This had begun under James and Charles; but it was then taken up in conjunction with that patristic learning, which adopted the fourth Figures. and fifth centuries as the standard of orthodox faith. Perhaps the first very bold and unambiguous attack on the Calvinistic system which we shall mention came from this quarter. This was in an anonymous Latin pamphlet, entitled Fur Prædestinatus, published in 1651, and generally ascribed to Sancroft, at that time a young man. It is a dialogue between a thief under sentence of death and his attendant minister, wherein the former insists upon his assurance of being predestinated to salvation. In this idea there is nothing but what is sufficiently obvious; but the dialogue is conducted with some spirit and vivacity. Every position in the thief's mouth is taken from emineut Calvinistic writers. and what is chiefly worth notice, is that Sancroft, for the first time, has ventured to arraign the greatest heroes of the Reformation; not only Calvin, Beza, and Zanchius, but, who had been hitherto spared, Luther and Zwingle. It was in the nature of a manifesto from the Arminian party, that they would not defer in future to any modern authority.

25. The loval Anglican clergy, suffering persecution at the hands of Calvinistic sectaries, might be naturally expected to cherish the opposite principles. These English are manifest in the sermons of Barrow, rather perhaps by his silence than his tone, and more explicitly in those of South. But many exceptions might be found among leading men, such as Sanderson; while in an opposite quarter, among the younger generation who had conformed to the times, arose a more formidable spirit of Arminianism, which changed the face of the English church. This was displayed among those who, just about the epoch of the Restoration, were denominated Latitude-men, or more commonly Latitudinarians, trained in the principles of Episcopius and Chillingworth, strongly averse to every compromise with popery, and thus distinguished from the high church party, learned rather in profane philosophy than in the fathers, more full of Plato and Plotinus than Jerome or Chrysostom, great maintainers of natural religion, and of the eternal laws of morality, not very solicitous about systems of orthodoxy, and limiting very considerably beyond the notions of former ages the fundamental tenets of Christianity. This is given as a general character, but varying in the degree of its application to particular persons. Burnet enumerates as the chief of this body of men, More, Cudworth, Whichcot, Tillotson, Stillingfleet; some, especially the last, more tenacious of the authority of the fathers and of the church than others, but all concurring in the adoption of an Arminian theology. This became so predominant before the Revolution, that few English divines of eminence remained, who so much as endeavoured to steer a middle course, or to dissemble their renunciation of the doctrines which had been sanctioned at the synod of Dort by the delegates of their church. "The Theological Institutions of Episcopius," says a contemporary writer, "were at that time (1085) generally in the hands of our students of divinity in both universities, as the best system of divinity that had appeared." And he proceeds afterwards: "The Remonstrant writers, among whom there were men of excellent learning and parts, had now acquired a considerable reputation in our universities by the means of some great men among us." This testimony seems irresistible; and as one hundred years before the Institutes of Calvin were read in the same academical studies, we must own, unless Calvin and Episcopius shall be maintained to have held the same tenets, that Bossuet might have added a chapter to the Variations of Protestant Churches,

The Fur Prodestinatus is reprinted—the best proof of ability that the worthy in D Oyly's Life of Sancroft—It is much—archbishop ever gave.

26. The methods adopted in order to subvert the Augustinian theology were sometimes direct, by explicit controversy, or by an opposite train of scriptural interpretation in regular commentaries; more frequently perhaps indirect, by inculcating moral duties, and especially by magnifying the law of nature. Among the first class the Harmonia Apostolica of Bull seems to be reckoued the principal work of this period. It was published in 1669, and was fiercely encountered at first not merely by the presbyterian party, but by many of the church, the Lutheran tenets as to justification by faith being still deemed orthodox. Bull establishes as the groundwork of his harmony between the apostles Paul and James on a subject where their language apparently clashes in terms, that we are to interpret St. Paul by St. James, and not St. James by St. Paul, because the latest authority, and that which may be presumed to have explained what was obscure in the former, ought to prevail *; a rule doubtless applicable in many cases, whatever it may be in this. It at least turned to his advantage; but it was not so easy for him to reconcile his opinions with those of the reformers, or with the Anglican articles.

Burnet's History of His Own Times, traces, entitled The Phanix, vol. ii. p. 499.
 187. Account of the new sect called Andrew School State of Bull, in Bull's Lantushnarans, in the endpection of Works, vol. vol. p. 2-7.

27. The Paraphrase and Annotations of Hammond on the New Testament give a different colour to the Epistles of St. Paul from that which they display in the hands of Beza and the other theologians of the sixteenth century. And the name of Hammond stood so high with the Anglican clergy, that he naturally turned the tide of interpretation his own way. The writings of Fowler, Wilkins, and Whichcot are chiefly intended to exhibit the moral lustre of Christianity, and to magnify the importance of virtuous life. Wilkins left an ununished work on the Principles and Daties of Natural Religion. Twelve chapters only, about half the volume, were ready for the press at his death; the rest was compiled by Tillotson as well as the materials left by the author would allow; and the expressions employed lead us to believe that much was due to the editor. The latter's preface strongly presses the separate obligation of natural religion, upon which both the disciples of Hobbes, and many of the less learned sectaries, were at issue with him.

28. We do not find much of importance written on the Trimtarian controversy before the middle of the problem seventeenth century, except by the Socialians themselves. But the case was now very different. Though the Polish or rather German Unitarians did not produce more distinguished men than before, they came more forward in the field of dispute. Finally expelled from Poland in 1660, they sought refuge in more learned as well as more tolerant regions, and especially in the genial soil of religious liberty, the United Provinces. Even here they enjoyed no avowed toleration; but the press, with a very slight concealment of place, under the attractive words Eleutheropolis, Irenopolis, or Freystadt, was ready to serve them with its natural impartiality. They began to make a slight progress in England; the writings of Biddle were such as even Cromwell, though habitually tolerant, did not overlook; the author underwent an imprisonment both at that time and after the Restoration. In general, the Unitarian writers preserved a disguise. Milton's treatise, not long since brought to light, goes on the Arian hypothesis, which had probably been countenanced by some others. It became common, in the reign of Charles II., for the English divines to attack the Anti-Trinitarians of each denomination.

29. An epoch is supposed to have been made in this controversy by the famous work of Bull, Defensio Fidei Remailed Niceme. This was not primarily directed against the heterodox party. In the Dogmata Theologica of Petavius, published in 1044, that learned Jesuit, laboriously compiling passages from the fathers, had come to the conclusion that most of those before the Nicene council had seemed, by their language, to run into nearly the same heresy as that which the council had condemned, and this inference appeared to rest on a long series of quotations. The Armiman Courcelles, and even the English philosopher Cudworth, the latter of whom was as little suspected of an heterodox leaning as Petavius himself, had come to the same result; so that a considerable triumph was given to the Arians, in which the Socinians, perhaps at that time more numerous, seem to have thought themselves entitled to partake. Bull had therefore to contend with authorities not to be despised by the learned.

30. The Defensio Fidei Nicenæ was published in 1685. It did not want answerers in England; but it obtained a great reputation, and an assembly of the French clergy, through the influence of Bossnet, returned thanks to the author. It was indeed evident that Petavius, though he had certainly formed his opinion with perfect honesty, was preparing the way for an inference, that if the primitive fathers could be heterodox on a point of so great magnitude, we must look for infallibility not in them nor in the diffusive church, but in general councils presided over by the pope, or ultimately in the pope himself. This, though not unsuitable to the notions of some Jesuits, was diametrically opposite to the principles of the Gallican church, which professed to repose on a perpetual and catholic tradition.

31. Notwithstanding the popularity of this defence of the . Nicene faith, and the learning it displays, the author was far from ending the controversy, or from factory to satisfying all his readers. It was alleged that he does not meet the question with which he deals; that the word becomes, being almost new at the time of the council, and being obscure and metaphysical in itself, required a precise definition to make the reader see his way before him, or at least one better than Bull has given, which the adversary might probably adopt without much scruple; that the passages adduced from the fathers are often insufficient for his purpose; that he confounds the eternal essence with the eternal personality or distinctness of the Logos, though well aware, of course, that many of the early writers employed different names (whateres and mosposones) for these; and that he does not repel some of the passages which can hardly bear an orthodox interpretation. It was urged, moreover, that his own hypothesis, taken altogether, is but a palliated Arianism; that by insisting for more than one hundred pages on the subordination of the Son to the Father, he came close to what since has borne that name, though it might not be precisely what had been condemned at Nice, and could not be reconciled with the Athanasian creed, except by such an interpretation of the latter as is neither probable, nor has been reputed orthodox.

32. Among the theological writers of the Roman church, and in a less degree among Protestants, there has wreen always been a class not inconsiderable for numbers or for influence, generally denominated mystics, or, when their language has been more unmeasured, enthusiasts and fanatics. These may be distinguished into two kinds, though it must readily be understood that they may often run much into one another; the first believing that the soul, by immediate communion with the Deity, receives a peculiar illumination and knowledge of truths, not cognizable by the understanding; the second less solicitous about intellectual than moral light, and aiming at such pure contemplation of the attributes of God, and such an intimate perception of spiritual life as may end in a sort of absorption into the divine essence. But I should not probably have alluded to any writings of this description, if the two most conspicuous luminaries of the French church, Bossuet and Feuelon, had not clashed with each other in that famous controversy of Quietism, to which the enthusiastic writings of Madame Guyon gave birth. The "Maximes des Saints" of Fenelon I have never seen; some editions of his entire works, as they affect to be, do not include what the church has condemned; and the original book has probably become scarce. Fencion appears to have been treated by his friend, shall we call him? or rival, with remarkable harshness. Bossuet might have felt some jealousy at the rapid elevation of the Archbishop of Cambray, but we need not have recourse to this; the rigour of orthodoxy in a temper like his will account for all. There could be little doubt but that many saints honoured by the church had attered things quite as strong as any that Fencion's work contained. Bossuet however succeeded in obtaining its condemnation at Rome. Fencion was of the second class above mentioned among the mystics, and seems to have been absolutely free from such pretences to illumination as we find in Behmen or Barclay. The pure disinterested love of God was the main spring of his religious theory. The Divine Economy of Poirct, 1686, and the writings of a German quietist, Spener, do not require any particular mention."

33. This later period of the seventeenth century was marked by an increasing boldness in religious inquiry; we find more disregard of authority, more disposition to question received tenets, a more suspicious criticism, both as to the genuineness and the credibility of ancient writings, a more ardent love of truth, that is, of perceiving and understanding what is true, instead of presuming that we possess it without any understanding at all. Much of this was associated, no doubt, with the other revolutions in literary opinion; with the philosophy of Bacon, Descartes, Gassendi, Hobbes, Bayle, and Locke, with the spirit which a slightly learned, yet acute generation of men rather conversant with the world than with libraries, to whom the appeal in modern languages must be made, was sure to breathe, with that incessant reference to proof which the physical sciences taught mankind to demand. Hence quotations are comparatively rare in the theological writings of this age; they are better reduced to their due oflice of testimony as to fact, sometimes of illustration or better statement of an argument, but not so much alleged as argument or authority in themselves. Even those who combated on the side of established doctrines were compelled to argue more from themselves, lest the public, their umpire, should reject, with an opposite prejudice, what had enslaved the prejudices of their fathers.

34. It is well known that a disbelief in Christianity became very frequent about this time. Several books more or less appear to indicate this spirit, but the many charge has often been made with no sufficient reason. Of Hobbes enough has been already said, and Spinosa's place as a metaphysician will be in the next chapter. His Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, published anonymously at Amsterdam, with the false date of Hamburg, in 1670, contains many observations on the Old Testament, which, though they do not really affect its general authenticity and truth, clashed with the commonly-received opinion of its absolute inspiration. Some of these remarks were, if not borrowed, at least repeated in a book of more celebrity, Sentimens de quelques Théologiens d'Hollande sur l'Histoire Critique du Pere Simon. This work is written by Le Clerc. but it has been doubted whether he is the author of those acute, but bardy, questions on the inspiration of Scripture which it contains. They must however be presumed to coincide for the most part with his own opinion; but he has afterwards declared his dissent from the hypothesis contained in these volumes, that Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch. The Archæologia Philosophica of Thomas Burnet is intended to dispute the literal history of the creation and fall. But few will pretend that either Le Clerc or Burnet were disbelievers in Revelation.

35. Among those who sustained the truth of Christianity by argument rather than authority, the first place both in order of time and of excellence is due to Pascal, though his Thoughts were not published till 1670, some years after his death, and, in the first edition, not without suppressions. They have been supposed to be fragments of a more systematic work that he had planned, or perhaps only reflections committed to paper, with no design of publication in their actual form. But, as is generally the case with works of genius, we do not easily persuade ourselves that they could have been improved by any such alteration as would have destroyed their type. They are at present bound together by a real coherence through the predominant character of the reasonings and sentiments, and give us every thing that we could desire in a more regular treatise without the tedious verbosity which regularity is apt to produce. The style is not so polished as in the Provincial Letters, and the sentences are sometimes ill constructed and elliptical, Passages almost transcribed from Montaigne have been published by careless editors as Pascal's.

Sti. But the Thoughts of Pascal are to be ranked, as a monument of his genius, above the Provincial Letters, though some have asserted the contrary. They burn with an intense light; condensed in expression, sublime, energetic, rapid, they hurry away the reader till he is scarcely able or willing to distinguish the sophisms from the truth which they contain. For that many of them are incapable of bearing a calm scrutiny is very manifest to those who apply such a test. The notes of Voltaire, though always intended to detract, are sometimes unanswerable; but the splendour of Pascal's elequence absolutely annihilates, in effect on the general reader, even this antagonist.

37. Pascal had probably not read very largely, which has given an ampler sweep to his genius. Except the Bible and the writings of Augustin, the book that seems most to have attracted him was the Essays of Montaigne. Yet no men could be more unlike in personal dispositions and in the cast of their intellect. But Pascal, though abhorring the religious and moral carelessness of Montaigne, found much that fell in with his own reflections in the contempt of human opinions, the perpetual humbling of human reason, which runs through the bold and original work of his predecessor. He quotes no book so frequently; and indeed, except Epictetus, and once or twice Descartes, he hardly quotes any other at all. Pascal was too acute a geometer, and too sincere a lover of truth to countenance the sophisms of mere Pyrrhonism; but like many theological writers, in exalting faith he does not always give reason her value, and furnishes weapons which the sceptic might employ against himself. It has been said that he denies the validity of the proofs of natural religion. This seems to be in some measure an error, founded on mistaking the objections he puts in the mouths of unbelievers for his own. But it must, I think, be admitted that his arguments for the being of a God are too often à tutiori, that it is the safer side to take.

38. The Thoughts of Pascal on miracles abound in proofs of his acuteness and originality; an originality much more striking when we recollect that the subject had not been discussed as it has since, but with an intermixture of some sophistical and questionable positions. Several of them have a secret reference to the famous cure of his niece, Mademoiselle Perier, by the holy thorn. But he is embarrassed with the difficult question whether miraculous events are sure tests of the doctrine which they support, and is not wholly consistent in his reasoning, or satisfactory in his distinctions. I am unable to pronounce whether Pascal's other observations on the rational proofs of Christianity are as original as they are frequently ingenious and powerful.

39. But the leading principle of Pascal's theology, that from which he deduces the necessary truth of Revelation, is the fallen nature of mankind; dwelling less upon scriptural proofs, which he takes for granted, than on the evidence which he supposes man himself to supply. Nothing, however, can be more dissimilar than his beautiful visions to the vulgar Calvinism of the pulpit. It is not the sordid, grovelling, degraded Caliban of that school, but the ruined archangel that he delights to paint. Man is so great, that his greatness is manifest, even in his knowledge of his own misery. A tree does not know itself to be miserable. It is true that to know we are miserable is misery; but still it is greatness to know it. All his misery proves his greatness; it is the misery of a great lord, of a king, dispossessed of their own. Man is the feeblest branch of nature, but it is a branch that thinks. He requires not the universe to crush him. He may be killed by a vapour, by a drop of water. But if the whole universe should crush him, he would be nobler than that which causes his death, because he knows that he is dying, and the universe would not know its power over him. This is very evidently sophistical and declamatory; but it is the sophistry of a fine imagination. It would be easy, however, to find better passages. The dominant idea recurs in almost every page of Pascal. His melancholy genius plays in wild and rapid flashes, like lightning round the scathed oak, about the fallen greatness of man. He perceives every characteristic quality of his nature under these conditions. They are the solution of every problem, the clearing up of every inconsistency that perplexes us. "Man," he says very finely, "has a secret instinct that leads him to seek diversion and employment from without; which springs from the sense of his continual misery. And he has another secret instruct, remaining from the greatness of his original nature, which teaches him that happiness can only exist in repose. And from these two contrary instincts there arises in him an obscure propensity, concealed in his soul, which prompts him to seek repose through agitation, and even to fancy that the contentment he does not enjoy will be found, if by struggling yet a little longer he can open a door to rest."

40. It can hardly be conceived that any one would think the worse of human nature or of himself by reading these magnificent lamentations of Pascal. He adorns and employed the degeneracy that he exaggerates. The ruined aqueduct, the broken column, the desolated city, suggest no ideas but of dignity and reverence. No one is ashamed of a misery which bears witness to his grandeur. If we should persuade a labourer that the blood of princes flows in his veins, we might spoil his contentment with the only lot be has drawn, but scarcely kill in him the seeds of pride.

^{*} Œntres de l'aveal, sul a p. 121.

41. Pascal, like many others who have dwelt on this alleged degeneracy of mankind, seems never to have disentangled his mind from the notion, that what we call human nature has not merely an arbitrary and grammatical, but an intrinsic objective reality. The common and convenient forms of language, the analogies of sensible things, which the imagination readily supplies, conspire to delude us into this fallacy. Yet though each man is born with certain powers and dispositions which constitute his own nature, and the resemblance of these in all his fellows produces a general idea, or a collective appellation, whichever we may prefer to say, called the nature of man, few would in this age explicitly contend for the existence of this as a substance capable of qualities, and those qualities variable, or subject to mutation. The corruption of human nature is therefore a phrase which may convey an intelligible meaning, if it is acknowledged to be merely analogical and inexact, but will mislead those who do not keep this in mind. Man's nature, as it now is, that which each man and all men possess, is the immediate workmanship of God, as much as at his creation; nor is any other hypothesis consistent with theism.

42. This notion of a real universal in human nature, presents to us in an exaggerated light those anomalies from which writers of Pascal's school are apt to infer some vast change in our original constitution. Exaggerated, I say, for it cannot be denied, that we frequently perceive a sort of incoherence, as it appears at least to our defective vision, in the same individual; and, like threads of various bues shot through one web, the love of vice and of virtue, the strength and weakness of the heart, are wonderfully blended in self-contradictory and self-destroying conjunction. But even if we should fail altogether in solving the very first steps of this problem, there is no course for a reasonable being, except to acknowledge the limitations of his own faculties; and it seems rather unwarrantable, on the credit of this humble confession, that we do not comprehend the depths of what has been withheld from us, to substitute something far more incomprehensible and revolting to our moral and rational capacities in its place. "What," says Pascal, "can be more contrary to the rules of our wretched justice, than to damn eternally an infant incapable of volition, for an offence wherein he seems to have had no share, and which was committed six thousand years before he was born? Certainly, nothing shocks us more rudely than this doctrine; and yet, without this mystery, the most incomprehensible of all, we are incomprehensible to ourselves. Man is more inconceivable without this mystery, than the mystery is inconceivable to man."

43. It might be wandering from the proper subject of these volumes, if we were to pause, even shortly, to inquire whether, while the creation of a world so full of evil must ever remain the most inscrutable of mysteries, we might not be led some way in tracing the connexion of moral and physical evil in mankind with his place in that creation; and especially, whether the law of continuity, which it has not pleased his Maker to break with respect to his bodily structure, and which binds that, in the unity of one great type, to the lower forms of animal life by the common conditions of nourishment, reproduction, and self-defence, has not rendered pecessary both the physical appetites and the propensities which terminate in self; whether, again, the superior endowments of his intellectual nature, has susceptibility of moral emotion, and of those disinterested affections which, if not exclusively, he far more intensely possesses than any inferior being; above all, the gifts of conscience, and a capacity to know God, might not be expected, even beforehand, by their conflict with the animal passions, to produce some partial inconsistencies, some anomalies at least, which he could not himself explain, in so compound a being. Every link in the long chain of creation does not pass by easy transition into the next. There are necessary chasms, and, as it were, leaps, from one creature to another, which, though not exceptions to the law of continuity, are accommodations of it to a new series of being. If man was made in the image of God, he was also made in the image of an ape. The framework of the body of him who has weighed the stars, and made the lightning his slave, approaches to that of a speech-less brute, who wanders in the forests of Sumatra. Thus standing on the frontier land between animal and angelic natures, what wonder that he should partake of both! But these are things which it is difficult to touch; nor would they have been here introduced, but in order to weaken the force of positions so confidently asserted by many, and so

41. Among the works immediately designed to confirm eloquently by Pascal.

the truth of Christianity, a certain reputation was acquired, through the known erudition of its author, of three by the Demonstratio Evangelica of Huet, Bishop of This is paraded with definitions, axioms, and propositions, in order to challenge the name it assumes. But the axioms, upon which so much is to rest, are often questionable or equivocal; as, for instance: Omnis prophetia est verax, quae prædixit res eventa deinde completas, - equivocal in the word verax. Huet also confirms his axioms by argument, which shows that they are not truly such. The whole book is full of learning; but he frequently loses sight of the points he would prove, and his quotations fall beside the mark. Yet he has furnished much to others, and possibly no earlier work on the same subject is so elaborate and comprehensive. The next place, if not a higher one, might be given to the treatise of Abbadie, a French refugee, published in 1684. His countrymen bestow on it the highest eulogies, but it was never so well known in England, and is now almost forgotten. The oral conferences of Limborch with Orobio, a Jew of considerable learning and ability, on the prophecies relating to the Messiah, were reduced into writing and published; they are still in some request. No book of this period, among many that were written, reached so high a reputation in England as Leslie's Short Method with the Deists, published in 1694; in which he has started an argument, pursued with more critical analysis by others, on the peculiarly distinctive marks of credibility that pertain to the scriptural miracles. The authenticity of this little treatise has been idly questioned on the Continent, for no better reason than that a translation of it has been published in a posthumous edition (1732) of the works of Saint Real, who died in 1692. But posthumous editions are never deemed of sufficient authority to establish a literary title against possession; and Prosper Marchand informs us that several other tracts, in this edition of Saint Real, are erroncously ascribed to him. The internal evidence that the Short Method was written by a Protestant should be conclusive.

15. Every change in public opinion which this period witnessed, confirmed the principles of religious toleration, that had taken root in the earlier part of the toneracti principles. century; the progress of a larger and more catholic theology, the weakening of bigotry in the minds of laymen, and the consequent disregard of ecclesiastical clamour, not only in England and Holland, but to a considerable extent in France; we might even add, the violent proceedings of the last government in the revocation of the edict of Nantes and the cruelties which attended it. Louis XIV., at a time when mankind were beginning to renounce the very theory of persecution, renewed the ancient enormities of its practice, and thus unconsciously gave the aid of moral sympathy and indignation to the adverse argument. The protestant refugees of France, scattered among their brethren, brought home to all minds the great question of free conscience; not with the stapid and impudent limitation which even Protestants had sometimes comployed, that truth indeed might not be restrained, but that error might; a broader foundation was land by the great advocates of toleration in this period, Bayle,

The Biographic Universelle, art Lashe, viv. Cet energy, quit passe pour co quid a fait de micris, lin i viv exadesté. Le Doctes r Glorgh sie la fait le grands effects pour prouver quil appart init a Leshe, quesqu'il foit p bire parent les ouvrages de l'Abbé ne Saint Reid, mort en trat. It is melane el to ser en petty spuit of eavil against an Eoglish wider in so respectable a work as the Boggan les Universe. No crands effects could be required from Dr. Glorg or any one cloc, to prive that a book was written by Leshe, which bore his mine, which was addressed to an Engash peer, and had gone through unany addresse, which there is literal y no chimant on the other titlers is for a postbumous edition, forty years after the supposed author's death, without attestation, is no literary exclence at all, even where the book is published for the first time, much less where it has a known status as the production of a certain author The is so man fest to any one who has the slightest functure of critical judgment, that we need not urge the paljable improbability of averaging to Smat Real, a Romish ceclesartie, an argue which turns peculiarly in the distinction between the scriptical miracles and thow alleged upon inferior exidence I have lost, or never make the reference to Prosper Marchand but the passage will be found in his Determinate Have que, which contains a full article on Samt Real.

Limborch, and Locke, as it had formerly been by Taylor and Episcopius.

46. Bayle, in 1686, while yet the smart of his banishment was keenly felt, published his Philosophical Baste's Pho. Commentary on the text in Scripture, "Compel Comment them to come in ;" a text which some of the advocates of persecution were accustomed to produce. He gives in the first part nine reasons against this literal meaning, among which none are philological. In the second part he replies to various objections. This work of Bayle does not stem to me as subtle and logical as he was wont to be, notwithstanding the formal syllogisms with which he commences each of his chapters. His argument against compulsory conversions, which the absurd interpretation of the text by his adversaries required, is indeed irresistible; but this is far from sufficiently establishing the right of toleration itself. It appears not very difficult for a skilful sophist, and none was more so than Bayle himself, to have met some of his reasoning with a specious reply. The scentical argument of Taylor, that we can rarely be sure of knowing the truth ourselves, and consequently of condemning in others what is error, he touches but slightly; nor does he dwell on the political advantages which experience has shown a full toleration to possess. In the third part of the Philosophical Commentary, he refutes the apology of Augustin for persecution; and a few years afterwards he published a supplement answering a book of Jurieu, which had appeared in the

47. Locke published anonymously his Letter on Toleration in 1689. The season was propitious; a legal tolerance of public worship had first been granted letter of referation. to the dissenters after the Revolution, limited indeed to such as held most of the doctrines of the church, but preparing the nation for a more extensive application of its spirit. In the Liberty of Prophesying, Taylor had chiefly

. The Dutch elergy, and a Fronch ation, and the moderate or liberal prin-

The Dictit Gergy, and a French aton, and the inservace of never connected pole result fame in his day, though now with it. Le Clere passed in, life in the fly known by mears of his aircranics. Baste and Le Crire, stremonsly resisted both the theory of general toler-to it.

in view to deduce the justice of tolerating a diversity in religion, from the difficulty of knowing the truth. He is not very consistent as to the political question, and limits too narrowly the province of tolerable opinions. Locke goes more expressly to the right of the civil magistrate, not omitting, but dwelling less forcibly on the chief arguments of his predecessor. His own theory of government came to his aid. The clergy in general, and perhaps Taylor himself, had derived the magistrate's jurisdiction from paternal power. And as they apparently assumed this power to extend over adult children, it was natural to give those who succeeded to it in political communities a large sway over the moral and religious behaviour of subjects. Locke, adopting the opposite theory of compact, defines the commonwealth to be a society of men constituted only for the procuring, preserving, and advancing their own civil interests. He denies altogether that the care of souls belongs to the civil magistrate, as it has never been committed to him. "All the power of civil government relates only to men's civil interests, is confined to the things of this world, and hath nothing to do with the world to come."

48. The admission of this principle would apparently decide the controversy, so far as it rests on religious grounds. But Locke has recourse to several other arguments independent of it. He proves, with no great difficulty, that the civil power cannot justly, or consistently with any true principle of religion, compel men to profess what they do not believe. This, however, is what very few would, at present, be inclined to maintain. The real question was as to the publicity of opinions deemed beterodox, and especially in social worship; and this is what those who held the magistrate to possess an authority patriarchal, universal, and arbitrary, and who were also rigidly tenacious of the necessity of an orthodox faith, as well as perfectly convinced that it was no other than their own, would hardly be persuaded to admit by any arguments that Locke has alleged. But the tendency of public opinion had begun to manifest itself against both these tenets of the high-church party, so that, in the eighteenth century, the principles of general tolerance became too popular to be disputed with any chance of attention. Locke was engaged in a controversy through his first letter on toleration, which produced a second and a third; but it does not appear to me that these, though longer than the first, have considerably modified its leading positions. It is to be observed that he pleads for the universal toleration of all modes of worship not immoral in their nature, or involving doctrines inimical to good government; placing in the latter category some tenets of the church of Rome.

49. It is confessed by Goujet that, even in the middle of the seventeenth century, France could boast very French little of pulpit eloquence. Frequent quotations from heathen writers, and from the schoolmen, with little solid morality and less good reasoning, make up the sermons of that age, † But the revolution in this style, as in all others, though perhaps gradual, was complete in the reign of Louis XIV. A slight sprinkling of passages from the fathers, and still more frequently from the Scriptures, but always short, and seeming to rise out of the preacher's heart, rather than to be sought for in his memory, replaced that intolerable parade of a theological common-place book, which had been as customary in France as in England. The style was to be the perfection of French eloquence, the reasoning persuasive rather than dogmatic, the arrangement more methodical and distributive than at present, but without the excess we find in our old preachers. This is the general character of French sermons; but those who most adorned the pulpit had of course their individual distinctions. Without delaying to mention those who are now not greatly remembered, such as La Rue, Hubert, Mascaron, we must confine ourselves to three of high reputation, Bourdaloue, Bossuet, and Fléchier.

50. Bourdaloue, a Jesuit, but as little of a Jesuit in the worst acceptation of the word as the order has produced, is remarkably simple, earnest, practical; he convinces rather than commands; and by convincing he per-

" libbiothoque Française, vol in ne p. 98%.

Warburton has fancied that Locke's real sentiments are only discoverable in his first Letter on Foleration, and that in the two latter he is combate his intolerant adversary quite through the controversy with his own principles, well-foresecting, that at each a time of prejudice arguments built on received opinious would have greatest weight, and make quickest impression on the body of the people whose it was less business to grim." Biogr. Bestimpies, art. Lanke, suades; for his discourses tend always to some duty, to something that is to be done or avoided. His sentences are short, interrogative, full of plain and solid reasoning, unambitious in expression, and wholly without that care in the choice of words and cadences which we detect in Bossuet and Fléchier. No one would call Bourdaloue a rhetorician, and though he continually introduces the fathers, he has not caught their vices of language.

51. Bourdaloue is almost in the same relation to Bossuct as Patru to Le Maistre, though the two orators of the pulpit are far above those of the bar. As the one is short, condensed, plain, reasoning, and though never feeble, not often what is generally called eloquent, so the other is animated, figurative, rather diffuse and prodigal of ornament, addressing the imagination more than the judgment, rich and copious in cadence, elevating the hearer to the pitch of his own sublimity. Bossuet is sometimes too declamatory; and Bourdaloue perhaps sometimes borders on dryness. Much in the sermons of the former is true poetry; but he has less of satisfactory and persuasive reasoning than the latter. His tone is also, as in all his writings, too domineering and dogmatical for those who demand something beyoud the speaker's authority when they listen.

52. The sermons however of Bossuet, taken generally, are not reckoned in the highest class of his numerous Panerat. writings; perhaps scarcely justice has been done to them. His genius, on the other hand, by universal confession, never shone higher than in the six which bear the name of Oraisons Functions. They belong in substance so much more naturally to the province of eloquence than of the ology, that I should have reserved them for another place, if the separation would not have seemed rather unexpected to the reader. Few works of genius perhaps in the French l'ont également estimé ét admiré C'est qu'il avoit réuni en sa personne tous les grands caracteres de la bonne l'loquence; la me plante du discours Chretico avec la majesté et la grandeur le sul lime avec I mitel gible et le p.p. laire, la force avan la di aes ir, la religionee avec l'onction, prodenteurs. Le publie n'a jamais rie la l'berte avec la justisse, et la plus vive language are better known, or have been more prodigally extolled. In that style of eloquence which the ancients called demonstrative, or rather descriptive (minutes;), the style of panegyric or commemoration, they are doubtless superior to those justly celebrated productions of Thucydides and Plato that have descended to us from Greece; nor has Bossuet been equalled by any later writer. Those on the Queen of England, on her daughter the Duchess of Orleans, and on the Prince of Condé, outshine the rest; and if a difference is to be made among these, we might perhaps, after some hesitation, confer the palm on the first. The range of topics is so various, the thoughts so just, the images so noble and poetical, the whole is in such perfect keeping, the tone of awful contemplation is so uniform, that if it has not any passages of such extraordinary beauty as occur in the other two, its general effect on the mind is more irresistible. *

[&]quot; The public did justice to Bourdalone, as they generally do to a solid and impressive style of preaching. Je cross, says Goujet, p. 200, que tout le monde convient qu'aueun outre ne lui est sipé-ricur. L'est le grand maitre pour l'éla-queuer de la chaire, c'est le prince des partagé sur son sujet ; la ville et la cour ardeur avec la plus pure lumière.

53. In this style, much more of ornament, more of what speaks in the spirit, and even the very phrase, of poetry, to the imagination and the heart, is permitted by a rigorous criticism, than in forensic or in deliberative eloquence. The beauties that rise before the author's vision are not renounced; the brilliant colours of his fancy are not subdued; the periods assume a more rythmical cadence, and emulate, like metre itself, the voluptuous harmony of musical intervals; the whole composition is more evidently formed to delight; but it will delight to little purpose, or even cease, in any strong sense of the word, to do so at all unless it is ennobled by moral wisdom. In this Bossuet was pre-eminent; his thoughts are never subtle or far-fetched; they have a sort of breadth, a generality of application, which is peculiarly required in those who grace of an entire nation in the withering of those visions of hope which want upon the introduces of hope which want upon the introduces of hope with its sympathy with gran our ancient task with beauty and is not ence prescriptated leto the tomb. Nor did he sink become has subject, except as compared with loss that. The sermon to which my alcoholour, except as estimated by many the finest effort of this prescher; but if read together with that of its prescipe, it will be laid aside as almost recible and unimpressive.

An English preacher of conspicuous removes for cinquence was called upon, within no great length of time, to emulate the finarea discusse of these to on the uniders death of Historica of Orleans. He had before him a subject successfully roose deep in interest, more fertile in great and touching associations—in had to describe, not the fase sorrow of courtiers, not the strick of sudden supprise that echord by night in the halls of Versailles, not the aportyphal peratence of one so tainted by the world's intercourse, but the manip address a mixed assembly, and which many that aim at what is profound and original are apt to miss. It may be confessed, that these funeral discourses are not exempt from some defects, frequently inherent in panegyrical eloquence; they are sometimes too rhetorical, and do not appear to show so little effort as some have fancied; the amplifications are sometimes too unmeasured, the language sometimes borders too nearly on that of the stage; above all, there is a tone of adulation not quite pleasing to a calm posterity.

54. Flechier, (the third name of the seventeenth century, for Massillon belongs only to the next,) like Bossuet, has been more celebrated for his funeral sermons than for any others; but, in this line, it is unfortunate for him to enter into unavoidable competition with one whom he cannot rival. The French critics extol Fléchier for the arrangement and harmony of his periods; yet even in this, according to La Harpe, he is not essentially superior to Bossuet; and to an English ear, accustomed to the long swell of our own writers and of the Ciceronian school in Latin, he will probably not give so much gratification. He does not want a moral dignity, or a certain elevation of thought, without which the funeral panegyric must be contemptible; but he has not the majestic tone of Bossuet; he does not, like him, raise the heroes and princes of the earth in order to abase them by paintings of mortality and weakness, or recall the hearer in every passage to something more awful than human power, and more magnificent than human grandeur. This religious solemnity, so characteristic in Bossuet, is hardly felt in the less emphatic sentences of Fléchier. Even where his exordium is almost worthy of comparison, as in the funeral discourse on Turenne, we find him degenerate into a trivial culogy, and he flatters both more profusely and with less skill. His style is graceful, but not without affectation and false taste. La Harpe has compared him to Isocrates among the orators of Greece, the place of Demosthenes being of course reserved for Bossuet.†

^{* • [}La Harpe justly ridicules an ex-pression of linebter, in his funeral sermon on Madame de Montaguer. Un annen disast sutrefiels que les houmes étaient has pour l'action et pour la conduite du in the style of presching to Paolo Segmonde, et que les dirmes n'étaient pées que pour le repos et pour la retraite. -1842

[†] The native critics ascribe a reform

55. The style of preaching in England was less ornamental, and spoke less to the imagination and affections, than these celebrated writers of the Gallican Barrow. church; but in some of our chief divines it had its own excellencies. The sermons of Barrow display a strength of mind, a comprehensiveness and fertility, which have rarely been equalled. No better proof can be given than his eight sermons on the government of the tongue; copious and exhaustive without tautology or superfluous declamation, they are, in moral preaching, what the best parts of Aristotle are in ethical philosophy, with more of development and a more extensive observation. It would be said of these sermons, and indeed, with a few exceptions, of all those of Barrow, that they are not what is now called evangelical; they indicate the ascendancy of an Arminian party, dwelling far more than is usual in the pulpit on moral and rational, or even temporal, inducements, and sometimes hardly abstaining from what would give a little offence in later times.

neri, whom Corniani does not hesitate to call, with the sanction, he says, of posterity, the father of Italian eloquence It is to be remembered that in no country has the pulpit been so much degraded by empty declamation, and even by a stupid buffeonery. "The language of Segmen," the same writer observes, "is always full of dignity and harmony. He inland it with splendid and elegant eapressions, and has thus obtained a place among the authors to whom authority has been given by the Della Crusca dietionary. His periods are flowing, natural, and intelligible, without the affecfor graces of the language with many " Tiraleuchi, with much commendation of Segment, admits that we find in him some vestiges of the false trate he endeavoured to reform. The very lutle that I have seen of the sermons of Sepheri gives no impression of any merit that can be reckened more than relative to the inf-serable tone of his predicessors. The fulawing specimen is from one of his most adm red seemons - E (risto non potra ottenere da voi che gli rimettiate un torto, un affronto, un aggravio, una parolina? Che vorresto da Christo? Vorreste ch' egli vi si gettame supplichevole à piedi à chiedervi questa grazia? To son quan per dire ch' egli il farebbe : perche se con dubits di prostrersi a piedi di un traditore, qual' era Giuda, di lavarghels, de ascrugarghels, de baccargarels, non a vergagnerebbe, cred' so, di farsi vedere ginocch one à pie vostri. Ma vi fa bisog to di tanto per muovervi à conspourerly? Alt Cavaliers, Cavaliers, to non vorrei questa volta farvi arrosure. Nel resto to so di cetto, che se altrettanto forse a voi domandato da quella domas che chiamate la vistra dama, da quella, di cui forsennati idolatrate il visto, indover ate le vegla, ambate le grazie, non vi farete progar tento à concedergliele. E poi vi late pregar tanto da un Dio pre voi eroccinso? O confusione! O vitiapero! O sergogna! Raco lia di Prime Italiane (in Classici Italiani), vol. ii.

This is certainly not the manner of Bussiet, and more like that of a third-rate Methodist among us.

Thus, in his sermon against evil speaking (xvi.), Barrow treats it as fit "for rastic booms or men of coarsest education and employment, who has not their minds debased by being conversant in meaning affairs, do went their sorry passions and backer about their patty quotations also from ancient philosophers, though not so numerous as in Taylor, are equally uncongenial to our ears. In his style, notwithstanding its richness and occasional vivacity, we may censure a redundancy and excess of apposition: it is not sufficient to avoid strict tautology; no second phrase (to lay down a general rule not without exception) should be so like the first, that the reader would naturally have understood it to be comprised therein. Barrow's language is more antiquated and formal than that of his age; and he abounds too much in uncommon words of Latin derivation, frequently such as appear to have no authority but

56. South's sermons begin, in order of date, before the Restoration, and come down to nearly the end of the century. They were much celebrated at the time, and retain a portion of their renown. This is by no means surprising. South had great qualifications for that popularity which attends the pulpit, and his manner was at that time original. Not diffuse, not learned, not formal in argument like Barrow, with a more natural structure of sentences, a more pointed, though by no means a more fair and satisfactory turn of reasoning, with a style clear and English, free from all pedantry, but abounding with those colloquial novelties of idiom, which, though now become vulgar and offensive, the age of Charles II, affected, sparing no personal or temporary sarcasm, but, if he seems for a moment to tread on the verge of buffoonery, recovering himself by some stroke of vigorous sense and language; such was the witty Dr. South, whom the courtiers delighted to hear. His sermons want all that is called unction, and sometimes even earnestness, which is owing, in a great measure, to a perpetual tone of gibing at rebels and fanatics; but there is a masculine spirit about them, which, combined with their peculiar characteristics, would naturally fill the churches where he might be heard. South appears to bend towards the not being capable of a fair reputation, or easily be drawn from them, who are sensible of disgrees to themselves, do wont to exercise their thoughts about concernments in such strains, who also, unworthy of those persons, and cannot little value the credit of others, or care nobler matters. As No one would ven-for aspersing it. But such language is sure this now from the pulpit. Arminian theology, without adopting so much of it as some of his contemporaries.

57. The sermons of Tillotson were for half a century more read than any in our language. They are now tollows. bought almost as waste paper, and hardly read at all. Such is the fickleness of religious taste, as abundantly numerous instances would prove. Tillotson is reckoned verbose and languid. He has not the former defect in nearly so great a degree as some of his eminent predecessors; but there is certainly little vigour or vivacity in his style. of the Romish controversy, he is perpetually recurring to that "world's debate;" and he is not much less hostile to all the Calvinistic tenets. What is most remarkable in the theology of Tillotson is his strong assertion, in almost all his sermons, of the principles of natural religion and morahty, not only as the basis of all revelation, without a dependence on which it cannot be believed, but as nearly coincident with Christianity in their extent, a length to which few at present would be ready to follow him. Tillotson is always of a tolerant and catholic spirit, enforcing right actions rather than orthodox opinions, and obnoxious, for that and other reasons, to all the bigots of his own age.

of this chapter; the materials are far from being exhausted. In expository, or, as some call it, exegetical theology, the English divines had already taken a conspicuous station. Andres, no partial estimator of protestant writers, extols them with marked praise. Those who belonged to the earlier part of the century form a portion of a vast collection, the Critici Sacri, published by one Bee, a bookseller, in 1660. This was in nine folio volumes, and in 1669, Matthew Pool, a non-conforming minister, produced his Synopsis Criticorum in five volumes, being in great measure an abridgement and digest of the former. Bee complained of the infraction of his copyright, or rather his equitable interest; but such a dispute hardly pertains to our history.* The work of Pool was evidently a more original labour than the former. Hammond, Patrick, and other commentators, do honour to the Anglican church in the latter part of the century.

I soli Inglesi, che ampio spazio non opera ci permettesso tener dietro a tutti i dovrchhono oce opare ni questo capo dell' più degni della nustra stima? Vol. xix. esegetica sacra, se l'astituto della nostra p. 253.

59. Pearson's Exposition of the Apostle's Creed, pub-Posternon lished in 1659, is a standard book in English dithe Creed vinity. It expands beyond the literal purport of the creed itself to most articles of orthodox belief, and is a valuable summary of arguments and authorities on that side. The closeness of Pearson, and his judicious selection of proofs, distinguish him from many, especially the earlier, theologians. Some might surmise that his undeviating adherence to what he calls the church is hardly consistent with independence of thinking; but, considered as an advocate, he is one of much judgment and skill. Such men as Pearson and Stillingfleet would have been conspicuous at the bar, which we could not quite affirm of Jeremy Taylor.

60. Simon, a regular priest of the congregation called The Oratory, which has been rich in eminent men, owes much of his fame to his Critical History of the Hattenes. Old Testament. This work, bold in many of its positions, as it then seemed to both the Catholic and Protestant orthodox, after being nearly strangled by Bossuet in France, appeared at Rotterdam in 1685. Bossuet attacked it with extreme vivacity, but with a real inferiority to Simon both in learning and candour, t Le Clerc on his side carped more at the Critical History than it seems to deserve. Many paradoxes, as they then were called, in this famous work are now received as truth, or at least pass without reproof. Simon may possibly be too prone to novelty, but a love of truth as well as great acuteness are visible throughout. His Critical History of the New Testament was published in 1689, and one or two more works of a similar description before the close of the century.

61. I have on a former occasion adverted, in a corresponding chapter, to publications on witchcraft and similar superstitions. Several might be mentioned at this time; the ^{*} Chalmers.

† Defense de la Tradit on des Saints Peres. Churres de Bosuet, vol. v., and Baumet, Vie de Bosuet, iv. 276.

belief in such tales was assailed by a prevalent scepticism which called out their advocates. Of these the most unworthy to have exhibited their great talents in such a cause were our own philosophers Henry More and Joseph Glanvil. The Sadducismus Triumphatus, or Treatise on Apparitions, by the latter, has passed through several editions, while his Scepsis Scientifica has hardly been seen, perhaps, by six living persons. A Dutch minister, by name Bekker, raised a great clamour against himself by a downright denial of all power to the devil, and consequently to his supposed instruments, the ancient beldams of Holland and other countries. His Monde Enchanté, originally published in Dutch, is in four volumes, written in a systematic manner, and with tedious prolixity. There was no ground for imputing infidelity to the author, except the usual ground of calumniating every one who quits the beaten path in theology; but his explanations of Scripture in the case of the demoniacs and the like are, as usual with those who have taken the same line, rather forced. The fourth volume, which contains several curious stories of imagined possession, and some which resemble what is now called magnetism, is the only part of Bekker's once celebrated book that can be read with any pleasure. Bekker was a Cartesian, and his theory was built too much on Cartesian assumptions of the impossibility of spirit acting on body.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

Arutotelanu — Logicsans — Cudworth — Sketch of the Philosophy of Gassendt — Cortesanum — Port-Royal Logic — Analysis of the Neurch for Truth of Malebranche, and of the Ethics of Spinosa — Glanvil — Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding.

1. THE Aristotelian and scholastic metaphysics, though shaken on every side, and especially by the rapid progress of the Cartesian theories, had not lost their hold over the theologians of the Roman church, or even the protestant universities, at the beginning of this period, and hardly at its close. Brucker enumerates several writers of that class in Germany *; and we find, as late as 1698, a formal injunction by the Sorbonne, that none who taught philosophy in the colleges under its jurisdiction should introduce any novelties, or swerve from the Aristotelian doctrine, t The Jesuits, rather unfortunately for their credit. distinguished themselves as strenuous advocates of the old philosophy, and thus lost the advantage they had obtained in philology as enemies of barbarous prejudice, and encouragers of a progressive spirit in their disciples. Rapin, one of their most accomplished men, after speaking with little respect of the Novum Organum, extols the disputations of the schools as the best method in the educactin of young men, who, as que Aristotelien dectrine studere, quan hacter us usurpatum fuerat in Academia Parisconi, cemint bocsetas injungendum esse il is, i o et in qui docent ple basphar u in cellus, ne de uceps constitutos studente, ant ab Aristotel es doctrina deflectant. 31 Dec. 1694. Argentre, Collectio Judiciorum, it. 150.

Vol. iv. See his long and laborious chapter on the Arcstotelian philosophers of the sixteenth and seventeenth certuries, no one sive seems to have done more than copy Brucker.

[†] Can relatum esset ad Secietatem (Subomean) nonnellos philosophiae professores, ex a estant allegando qui ad Secietatem antalant, novas quasdam doctrinas in philosophics sectars, transce-

he fancies, have too little experience to delight in physical science." •

2. It is a difficult and dangerous choice, in a new state of public opinion (and we have to make it at present), There do. between that which may itself pass away, and that Thomas which must efface what has gone before. Those where who clung to the ancient philosophy believed that Bacon and Descartes were the idols of a transitory fashion, and that the wisdom of long ages would regain its ascendancy. They were deceived, and their own reputation has been swept off with the systems to which they adhered. Thomas White, an English catholic priest, whose Latin appellation is Albius, endeavoured to maintain the Aristotelian metaphysics and the scholastic terminology in several works, and especially in an attack upon Glanvil's Vanity of Dogmatizing. This book, entitled Sciri, I know only through Glanvil's reply in his second edition, by which White appears to be a mere Aristotelian. He was a friend of Sir Kenelm Digby, who was himself, though a man of considerable talents, incapable of disentangling his mind from the Peripatetic hypotheses. The power of words indeed is so great, the illusions of what is called realism, or of believing that general terms have an objective exterior being, are so natural, and especially so bound up both with our notions of essential, especially theological, truth, and with our popular language, that no man could in that age be much censured for not casting off his fetters, even when he had heard the call to liberty from some modern voices. We find that even after two centuries ot a better method, many are always ready to fall back into a verbal process of theorising.

3. Logic was taught in the Aristotelian method, or rather in one which, with some change for the worse, had been gradually founded upon it. Burgersdicius, in aités; afin de ne pas donner trop de liecnee a la passion qu'on a naturellement pour les nouvelles opinions, deut le cours est d'une dangereuse consequence dans un cut bien règle, vu particulièrement que la philosophie est un des organes dont se sert la rel gion pour s'expliquer dans ses decisions.

[•] Réflexions aur la Poétique, p 368. He admits, however, that to introduce more experiment and observation would be an impresentent. Du reste il y a apparence que les ioix, qui ne souffrent point d'unoration dans l'osage des choses moverselement étables, paulouseur point d'autre methode que celle qui est aujourd'hui en usage dans les universations.

this and in other sciences, seems to have been in repute; Smiglecius also is mentioned with praise. These lived both in the former part of the century. But they were superseded, at least in England, by Wallis, whose Institutio Logicæ ad Communes Usus Accommodata was published in 1687. He claims as an improvement upon the received system, the classifying singular propositions among universals, † Ramus had made a third class of them, and in this he seems to have been generally followed. Aristotle, though it does not appear that he is explicit on the subject, does not rank them as particular. That Wallis is right will not be doubted by any one at present; but his originality we must not assert. The same had been perceived by the authors of the Port-Royal Logic; a work to which he has made no allusion. 1 Wallis claims also as his own the method of reducing hypothetical to categorical syllogisms, and proves it elaborately in a separate dissertation. A smaller treatise, still much used at Oxford, by Aldrich, Compendium Artis Logica, 1691, is clear and concise, but seems to contain nothing very important; and he alludes to the Art de Penser in a tone of insolence, which must rouse indignation in those who are acquainted with that excellent work. Aldrich's censures are, in many instances, mere cavil and misrepresentation; I do not know that they are

• La Lagrague de Siniglocina, saya Rapin, est un helomerage. L'he same writer processis to observe that the Spannards of the preceding century had corrupted logic by their subtrities. Lin se petant dans des speculations creuses qui maranent rien de real, leur philosophea tromperet lant d'avoir de la rasson insigré le bon sens, et de donner de la conseur, et memo je ne seai quan de specieuse, a ce qui eto t de plus deraison inde, p. 382. But this must have been rather the fault of their metaphysics than of what is strictly called log e.

† Aque hor signanter notation velon, quia novus forte life videar, et preser aborum loqueruli formulam har docere. No pleraque logici propos tonem quanto vocant si guarem, boe est, de subjecto individuo sive vongelari, pro particulari habent, non universali. Sed perperam hoe faciunt, et penter mentem Aristotelii, (qui, quattum menam, nunquam ejusmodi singolarem, тях кота пераз пр. pellat aut pro tali habet,) et præter res naturam. Non enim line agitur de particularitate subjecti (quod aronor vocat Attitutelo, non kara paper) sed de partis-Litate predicationis . . . Ne pie ego inter in novator consendor sum qui bare discrete, sed lili potras noratores qui ab Aristote ea doctrina recessioni, coque multa introdoverint incommoda de quibus suo loco deetur, p 195. He lina afterwards a separate dissertation or theen to prove that more at length. It weren that the Hamista held a third class of preparations, neither universal nor particular, to which they gave the nume of program, equivalent to sugular.

Art de l'emer, part in chap in.

right in any. Of the Art de Penser itself we shall have something to say in the course of this chapter.

4. Before we proceed to those whose philosophy may be reckoned original or at least modern, a very few deserve mention who have endeavoured to maintain Harry of Photosophy. or restore that of antiquity. Stanley's History of Philosophy, in 1655, is in great measure confined to biography, and comprehends no name later than Carneades. Most is derived from Diogenes Lacrtius; but an analysis of the Platonic philosophy is given from Alcinous, and the author has compiled one of the Peripatetic system from Aristotle himself. The doctrine of the Stoics is also elaborately deduced from various sources. Stanley, on the whole, brought a good deal from an almost untrodden field; but he is merely an historian, and never a critic of philosophy. He does not mention Epicurus at all, probably because Gassendi had so well written that philosopher's life,

5. Gale's Court of the Gentiles, which appeared partly in 1669 and partly in later years, is incomparably a gate's court more learned work than that of Stanley. Its aim "bentles is to prove that all beathen philosophy, whether barbaric or Greek, was borrowed from the Scriptures, or at least from the Jews. The first part is entitled Of Philology, which traces the same leading principle by means of language; the second, Of Philosophy; the third treats of the Vanity of Philosophy, and the fourth of Reformed Philosophy, "wherein Plato's moral and metaphysic or prime philosophy is reduced to an useful form and method." Gale has been reckoned among Platonic philosophers, and indeed he professes to find a great resemblance between the philosophy of Plate and his own. But he is a determined Calvinist in all respects, and scruples not to say, " Whatever God wills is just, because he wills it;" and again, " God willeth nothing without himself because it is just, but it is therefore just because he willeth it. The reasons of good and evil extrinsic

One of Aldrich's charges against syllogism one that has obviously five the author of the Art de Proser is, that terms; thus expecting the Oxford stuble brings forward as a great discovery dents for which he wrote to believe, that the equality of the angles of a ch. agon to 1996 right angles, and another is, book of Euclid, nor the mere radiments that he gives as an example of a regular of common fogic.

to the divine essence are all dependent on the divine will, either decernent or legislative." It is not likely that Plato would have acknowledged such a disciple.

6. A much more eminent and enlightened man than Gale, Ralph Cudworth, by his Intellectual System of the Universe, published in 1678, but written several years before, placed himself in a middle point between the declining and rising schools of philosophy; more independent of authority, and more close, perhaps, in argument than the former, but more prodigal of learning, more technical in language, and less conversant with analytical and inductive processes of reasoning than the latter. Upon the whole, however, he belongs to the school of antiquity, and probably his wish was to be classed with it. Cudworth was one of those whom Hobbes had roused by the atherstic and immoral theories of the Leviathan; nor did any antagonist perhaps of that philosopher bring a more vigorous understanding to the combat. This understanding was not so much obstructed in its own exercise by a vast erudition, as it is sometimes concealed by it from the reader. Cudworth has passed more for a recorder of ancient philosophy, than for one who might stand in a respectable class among philosophers; and his work, though long, being unfinished, as well as full of digression, its object has not been fully apprehended.

7. This object was to establish the liberty of human actions against the fatalists. Of these he lays it down that there are three kinds; the first atheistic; the second admitting a Deity, but one acting necessarily and without moral perfections; the third granting the moral attributes of God, but asserting all human actions to be governed by necessary laws which he has ordained. The first book of the Intellectual System, which alone is extant, relates wholly to the proofs of the existence of a Deity against the atheistic fatalists, his moral nature being rarely or never touched; so that the greater and more interesting part of the work, for the sake of which the author projected it, is wholly wanting, unless we take for fragments of it some writings of the author preserved in the British Museum.

8. The first chapter contains an account of the ancient corpuscular philosophy, which, till corrupted by seen Leucippus and Democritus, Cudworth takes to have been not only theistic, but more consonant to theistic principles than any other. These two, however, brought in a fatalism grounded on their own atomic theory. In the second chapter he states very folly and fairly all their arguments, or rather all that have ever been adduced on the atheistic side. In the third he expatiates on the hylozoic atheism, as he calls it, of Strato, which accounts the universe to be animated in all its parts, but without a single controlling intelligence, and adverts to another hypothesis, which gives a vegetable but not sentient life to the world.

9. This leads Cudworth to his own famous theory of a plastic nature, a device to account for the opera- Rieplastic tions of physical laws without the continued agency "ature. of the Deity. Of this plastic energy he speaks in rather a confused and indefinite manner, giving it in one place a sort of sentient life, or what he calls "a drowsy unawakened cogitation," and always treating it as an entity or real being. This language of Cudworth, and indeed the whole hypothesis of a plastic nature, was unable to stand the searching eye of Bayle, who, in an article of his dictionary, pointed out its unphilosophical and dangerous assumptions. Le Clerc endeavoured to support Cudworth against Bayle, but with little success.* It has had, however, some partizans, though rather among physiologists than metaphysicians. Grew adopted it to explain vegetation; and the plastic nature differs only, as I conceive, from what Hunter and Abernethy have called life in organised bodies by its more extensive agency; for if we are to believe that there is a vital power, not a mere name for the sequence of phenomena, which marshals the molecules of animal and vegetable substance, we can see no reason why a similar energy should not determine other molecules to assume geometrical figures in crystallization. The error or paradox consists in assigning a real unity of existence, and a real power of causation, to that which is unintelligent.

[·] Bibliothèque Chause, vol. v.

10. The fourth chapter of the Intellectual System, of vast length, and occupying half the entire work, launches into a sea of old philosophy, in order to of ad phile show the unity of a supreme God to have been a general belief of antiquity. "In this fourth chapter," he says, " we were necessitated by the matter itself to run out into philology and antiquity, as also in the other parts of the book we do often give an account of the doctrine of the aucients; which, however, some over-severe philosophers may look upon fastidiously or undervalue and depreciate, yet as we conceived it often necessary, so possibly may the variety thereof not be ungrateful to others, and this mixture of philology throughout the whole sweeten and allay the severity of philosophy to them; the main thing which the book pretends to, in the mean time, being the philosophy of religion. But for our part we neither call philology, nor yet philosophy, our mistress, but serve ourselves of either as occasion requireth.20 0

11. The whole fourth chapter may be reckoned one great episode, and as it contains a store of useful knowledge on ancient philosophy, it has not only been more read than the remaining part of the Intellectual System, but has been the cause, in more than one respect, that the work has been erroneously judged. Thus Cudworth has been reckoned, by very respectable authorities, in the Platonic school of philosophers, and even in that of the later Platonists; for which I perceive little other reason than that he has gone diffusely into a supposed resemblance between the Platonic and Christian Trimty. Whether we agree with him in this or no, the subject is insulated, and belongs only to the history of theological opinion; in Cudworth's own philosophy he appears to be an eclectic, not the vassal of Plato, Plotinus, or Aristotle, though deeply versed in them all.

12. In the fifth and last chapter of the first and only book the arguments of the Intellectual System, Cudworth, reverting to the various atheistical arguments which he had attend in the second chapter, answers them at great length, and though not without much erudition, perhaps more than was requisite, yet depending chiefly on his own stores of reasoning. And inasmuch as even a second-rate philosopher ranks higher in literary precedence than the most learned reporter of other men's doctrine, it may be unfortunate for Cudworth's reputation that he consumed so much time in the preceding chapter upon mere learning, even though that should be reckoned more useful than his own reasonings, These however are frequently valuable, and, as I have intimated above, he is partially tinctured by the philosophy of his own generation, while he endeavours to tread in the ancient paths. Yet he seems not aware of the place which Bacon, Descartes, and Gassendi were to hold; and not only names them sometimes with censure, hardly with praise, but most inexcusably throws out several intimations that they had designedly served the cause of atheism. The disposition of the two former to slight the argument from final causes, though it might justly be animadverted upon, could not warrant this most uncandid and untrue aspersion. But justice was evenhanded; Cudworth himself did not escape the slander of bigots; it was idly said by Dryden, that he had put the arguments against a Deity so well, that some thought he had not answered them; and if Warburton may be believed, the remaining part of the Intellectual System was never published, on account of the world's malignity in judging of the first. * Probably it was never written.

Preface, p. 37.

13. Cudworth is too credulous and uncritical about ancient writings, defending all as genuine, even where his own age had been sceptical. His terminology is stiff and pedantic, as is the case with all our older metaphysicians, abounding in words, which the English language has not recognised. He is full of the ancients, but rarely quotes the schoolmen. Hobbes is the adversary with whom he most grapples; the materialism, the resolving all ideas into sensation, the low morality of that writer, were obnoxious to the ammadversion of so stremous an advocate of a more elevated philosophy. In some respects Cudworth has, as I conceive, much the advantage; in others, he will generally be thought by our metaphysicians to want precision and logical reasoning; and upon the whole we must rank him, in philosophical acumen, far below Hobbes, Malebranche, and Locke, but also far above any mere Aristotelians, or retailers of Scotus and Aquinas.

^{*} Warburton's preface to Divine Legation, vol. ii.

14. Henry More, though by no means less emineut than Cudworth in his own age, ought not to be placed on the same level. More fell not only into the mystical notions of the later Platouists, but even of the Cabbalistic writers. His metaphysical philosophy was borrowed in great measure from them; and though he was in correspondence with Descartes, and enchanted with the new views that opened upon him, yet we find that he was reckoned much less of a Cartesian afterwards, and even wrote against parts of the theory. The most peculiar tenet of More was the extension of spirit; acknowledging and even striving for the soul's immateriality, he still could not conceive it to be unextended. Yet it seems evident that if we give extension as well as figure, which is implied in finite extension, to the single self-conscious monad, qualities as heterogeneous to thinking as material impenetrability itself, we shall find it in vain to deny the possibility at least of the latter. Some indeed might question whether what we call matter is any real being at all, except as extension under peculiar conditions. But this conjecture need not here be pressed.

15. Gassendi himself, by the extensiveness of his erudition, may be said to have united the two schools of specu-Ourserniti. lative philosophy, the historical and the experimental, though the character of his mind determined him far more towards the latter. He belongs in point of time rather to the earlier period of the century; but his Syntagma Philosophicum having been published in 1658, we have deferred the review of it for this volume. This posthumous work, in two volumes folio, and nearly 1000 pages closely printed in double columns, is divided into three parts, the Logic, the Physics, and the Ethics; the second occupying more than qu'à rasson de son essence il n'a absolu-ment aucune rélation au heu. More, who may be called a lover of extension, thurres de Descartes, vol. z. p. 239.

[•] Baillet, Vie de Descartes, liv vii. It must be observed that More pewer wholly agreed with Descartes. Thus they differed about the unnipresence of maintained a strictly local presence. the Desty; Descartes thought that he was partout à raison de sa pussance, et five sixths of the whole. The Logic is introduced by two procemial books; one containing a history of the science from Zeno of Elea, the parent of systematic logic, to Bacon and Descartes *; the other, still more valuable, on the criteria of truth; shortly criticising also, in a chapter of this book, the several schemes of logic which he had merely described in the former. After stating very prolixly, as is usual with him, the arguments of the sceptics against the evidence of the senses, and those of the dogmatics, as he calls them, who refer the sole criterion of truth to the understanding, he propounds a sort of middle course. It is necessary, he observes, before we can infer truth, that there should be some sensible sign, anothers organis; for, since all the knowledge we possess is derived from the sense, the mind mustfirst have some sensible image, by which it may be led to a knowledge of what is latent and not perceived by sense. Hence we may distinguish in ourselves a double criterion; one by which we perceive the sign, namely, the senses; another, by which we understand through reasoning the latent thing, namely, the intellect or rational faculty. † This he illustrates by the pores of the skin, which we do not perceive, but infertheir existence by observing the permeation of moisture.

16. In the first part of the treatise itself on Logic, to which these two books are introductory, Gassendi lays the these down again his favourite principle, that every idea of when, in the mind is ultimately derived from the senses. But while what the senses transmit are only singular ideas, the mind has the faculty of making general ideas out of a number of these singular ones when they resemble each other.‡ In this

• Pretereundum porro non est ob eam, qua est, celebritatem Organum, sive logas Francosci Bacons Verolami. He extola Bacon highly, but gives an analysis of the Novim Organism without much criticism. De Logen Origine, c x.

Logica Verulamu, Gassendi azva in another place, tota ar per se ad physicam, atque adeo ad veritatem notificanve rerum gerimunan haberdam contendit. Precipue autem in co est, iit bene imagineemir, quateous volt essa imprimis expenda omnia prayadiem ac novas definde notiones ricasse ex novis debiteque facto experimentis inducendas. Logica

Cartesii reetè quidem Verulamii imitatione ab eo exord tur, quod ad bene imaginandum prava prejudicia exuenda, reeta vero induenda vult, &c. p. 90.

† P 81. If this passage be well standed to, it will show how the philoscophy of Crassendi has been misunders atom by those who confound it with the merely sensual school of rectaphysicians. No one has more clearly, or more at length, distinguished the authorise associated sign, from the unsumagnished educate of pure intellect, as we shall scop see.

⁴ P. 93

part of his Logic he expresses himself clearly and unequivocally a conceptualist.

17. The Physics were expanded with a prodigality of learning upon every province of nature. Gassendi is full of quotation, and his systematic method manifests the comprehensiveness of his researches. In the third book of the second part of the third section of the Physics, he treats of the immateriality, and, in the fourteenth, of the immortality of the soul, and maintains the affirmative of both propositions. This may not be what those who judge of Gassendi merely from his objections to the Meditations of Descartes have supposed. But a clearer insight into his metaphysical theory will be obtained from the ninth book of the same part of the Physics, entitled De Intellectu, on the Human Understanding.

18. In this book, after much display of erudition on the tenets of philosophers, he determines the soul to be and of the an incorporeal substance, created by God, and inthe soul fused into the body, so that it resides in it as an informing and not merely a present nature, forma informans, et non simpliciter assistens.* He next distinguishes intellection or understanding from imagination or perception; which is worthy of particular notice, because in his controversy with Descartes he had thrown out doubts as to any distinction between them. We have in ourselves a kind of faculty which enables us, by means of reasoning, to understand that which by no endeavours we can imagine or represent to the mind. Of this the size of the sun, or innumerable other examples might be given; the mind having no idea suggested by the sed tentum vi propria, sen ratioemando, cam rose in sole magnitudinent comprebendit, av pari modo catera. Nempe ex boo efficitur, ut rem sine specie materials interligens, esso immateriales delevat; sicult phantasis ex comsterialis argustur, qual material specie utatur. Ac utatur qui lem e tram intellectus speciebus phantuesa perceptes, tonquam gradibus, ut ratiocirstado assequitut en que duncepa ame speciel at phantasmatisse intelligat: sed bee spaum est quod olins immaterralitatem arguit, quod altra omeem speciem materialem se protebat, quidpiamque coj se nullam habent phantasma revera agnoscat.

P 440.

[†] Itaque est in nobis intellectis species, quo ratioemando eo provehimur, ut aliquad intelligamos, quod imagiouri, sel cujus hibere obversantem imaginem, quantimenimpia animi vires contenderimus, non possinus... After maine ing the size of the sun, possini consimila seacenta afferri... Verum quidem istud aufficiat, it cuistet quid jam nus intelligere quod imaginari non heest, et intellectim ita esse distinctum a phiestasia, ut cum phantasia babeat innterisles species, sub quibus res itamen intellectus, sub quibus res itamen intellectus quibus res itamen intellectus qui qui qui mantellectus.

imagination of the sun's magnitude, but knowing it by a peculiar operation of reason. And hence we infer that the intellectual soul is immaterial, because it understands that which no material image presents to it, as we infer also that the imaginative faculty is material, because it employs the images supplied by sense. It is true that the intellect makes use of these sensible images, as steps towards its reasoning upon things which cannot be imagined; but the proof of its immateriality is given by this, that it passes beyond all material images, and attains a true knowledge of that whereof it has no image.

19. Buble observes that in what Gassendi has said on the power of the mind to understand what it cannot conceive, there is a forgetfulness of his principle, that nothing is in the understanding which has not been in the sense. But, unless we impute repeated contradictions to this philosopher, he must have meant that axiom in a less extended sense than it has been taken by some who have since employed it. By that which is "in the understanding," he could only intend definite images derived from sense, which must be present before the mind can exercise any faculty, or proceed to reason up to unimaginable things. The fallacy of the sensualist school, English and French, has been to conclude that we can have no knowledge of that which is not "in the understanding;" an inference true in the popular sense of words, but false in the metaphysical.

20. There is, moreover, Gassendi proceeds, a class of reflex operations, whereby the mind understands itself Date. and its own faculties, and is conscious that it is goodle exercising such acts. And this faculty is superior refersion to any that a material substance possesses; for no body can act reflexly on itself, but must move from one place to another. Our observation therefore of our own imaginings must be by a power superior to imagination itself; for imagination is employed on the image, not on the perception of the image, since there is no image of the act of perception.

[•] Alterum est genus reflecturum se-monum, quabas a tellectus scipsom, suas-que finationes intelligit, ne speciat in se-intelligere anumadvertet. A idelect line se, sed solius sersus alufd diversim a so munus est omni facultate corporea su- procedure possit.

21. The intellect also not only forms universal ideas, but perceives the nature of universality. And this seems peculiar to mankind; for brutes do not show any thing more than a power of association by resemblance. In our own conception of an universal, it may be urged, there is always some admixture of singularity, as of a particular form, magnitude, or colour; yet we are able, Gassendi thinks, to strip the image successively of all these particular adjuncts. He seems therefore, as has been remarked above, to have held the conceptualist theory in the strictest manner, admitting the reality of universal ideas even as images present to the mind.

22. Intellection being the proper operation of the soul, it is needless to inquire whether it does this by its own Also intellect from ma-gination nature, or by a peculiar faculty called understanding, nor should we trouble ourselves about the Aristotelian distinction of the active and passive intellect. † We have only to distinguish this intellection from mere conception derived from the phantasy, which is necessarily associated with it. We cannot conceive God in this life, except under some image thus supplied; and it is the same with all other incorporeal things. Nor do we comprehend infinite quantities, but have a sort of confused image of indefinite extension. This is surely a right account of the matter; and if Stewart had paid any attention to these and several other passages, he could not have so much misconceived the philosophy of Gassendi.

28. The mind, as long as it dwells in the body, seems to have no intelligible species, except phantasms derived from sense. These he takes for impressions on the brain, driven to and fro by the animal spirits till they reach the phantasia, or imaginative faculty, and cause it to imagine sensible things. The soul, in Gassendi's theory, consists of an incorporeal part or intellect, and of a corporeal part, the phantasy or sensitive soul, which he conceives to be diffused throughout the body. The intellectual soul instantly perceives, by its union with the phantasy, the images impressed

Et ne instes in nobis quoque, dum universale concipinus, admiseri seu per niquid suggidardatis, ut certie magaituditas, certie figure, certi coloris, de experimur tamen, aiu [sic] simul, saltem auc-cessive spolisti a nobis naturam qualibet speciasi magnitudine, qualibet speciali figura, quesibet speciali colore; atque ita de carteris.

[†] P. 446.

upon the latter, not by impulse of these sensible and material species, but by intuition of their images in the phantasy. Thus, if I rightly apprehend his meaning, we are to distinguish; first, the species in the brain, derived from immediate sense or reminiscence; secondly, the image of these conceived by the phantasy; thirdly, the act of perception in the mind itself, by which it knows the phantasy to have imagined these species, and knows also the species themselves to have, or to have had, their external archetypes. This distinction of the animus, or reasonable, from the anima, or sensitive soul, he took, as he did a great part of his philosophy, from Epicurus.

24. The phantasy and intellect proceed together, so that they might appear at first to be the same faculty. Not only, however, are they different in their operation even as to objects which fall under the senses, and are represented to the mind, but the intellect has certain operations peculiar to itself. Such is the apprehension of things which cannot be perceived by sense, as the Deity, whom though we can only imagine as corporeal, we apprehend or understand to be otherwise. I he repeats a good deal of what he had before said on the distinctive province of the understanding, by which we reason on things incapable of being imagined; drawing several instances from the geometry of infinites, as in asymptotes, wherein, he says, something is always inferred by reasoning which we presume to be true, and yet cannot reach by any effort of the imagination.

25. I have given a few extracts from Gassendi in order to confirm what has been said, his writings being the photo-little read in England, and his philosophy not having been always represented in the same man-

Eodem momento intellectus ob intimam sui prassutiam coherentiamque cum phantasia rem sandem contuctur. P. 450

[†] Hoe est autem præter phantæias cancellos, intellectuaque spains proprium, potestique adeu talis a, prehemio non jam imaginatio, sed intellectua red intellectua diei. Non quod intellectua non acceptata ansam ab ipsa phantaina ratiocuiandi esse ali quid ultra id, quod specie imaginessi representatur, neque non aimul consitan-tem talem speciem vel imaginationem habeat; sed quod apprehendat, intelligates aliquid, ad quod apprehendandum are percipiendum assurgere phantasia non possit, ut que otto un terminetar ad corporum speciem, seu umaginato appellatur.

[†] In quibus semper aliquid argumentando collegitur, quad et verum con intelligimus et marginando non assequimus tamen.

ner. Degerando has claimed, on two occasions, the priority for Gassendi in that theory of the generation of ideas which has usually been ascribed to Locke. But Stewart protests against this alleged similarity in the tenets of the French and English philosophers. "The remark," he says, "is certainly just, if restrained to Locke's doctrine as interpreted by the greater part of philosophers on the Continent; but it is very wide of the truth, if applied to it as now explained and modified by the most intelligent of his disciples in this country. The main scope, indeed, of Gassend's argument against Descartes is to materialise that class of our ideas which the Lockists as well as the Cartesians consider as the exclusive objects of the power of reflection, and to show that these ideas are all ultimately resolvable into images or conceptions borrowed from things external. It is not therefore what is sound and valuable in this part of Locke's system, but the errors grafted on it in the comments of some of his followers, that can justly be said to have been borrowed from Gassendi. Nor has Gassendi the merit of originality even in these errors; for scarcely a remark on the subject occurs in his works, but what is copied from the accounts transmitted to us of the Epicurean metaphysics." †

20. It will probably appear to those who consider what I have quoted from Gassendi, that in his latest writings he did not differ so much from Locke, and lead the way so much to the school of the French metaphysicians of the eighteenth century as Stewart has supposed. The resemblance to the Essay on the Human Understanding in several points, especially in the important distinction of what Locke has called ideas of reflection from those of sense, is too evident to be denied. I am at the same time unable to account in a satisfactory manner for the apparent discrepancy between the

Histoire comparée des Systemes (1803, vol. 1. p. 301, and Biogr Universally to the peculiar resolubiance between the systems of Gassendi and Locks, in the necessary of the own on the Gassendian phisologyly, which I have not seen. As to Locke's positive obligations to his predecessor, I should be perhaps inclined to doubt whether he, who was no great laver of large books, bud read so unwieldy a work as the Syntagma Philosophician, but the abridgement of Bermer would have sufficed.

[†] Preliminary Dissertation to Ency-hanguage of Gassendi in the Syntagma Philosophicum, and that which we find in his objections to the Meditations of Descartes. No great interval of time had intervened between the two works; for his correspondence with Descartes bears date in 1641, and it appears by that with Louis, Count of Angouleme, in the succeeding year, that he was already employed on the first part of the Syntagma Philosophicum. Whether he urged some of his objections against the Cartesian metaphysics with a regard to victory rather than truth, or, as would be the more candid and perhaps more reasonable hypothesis, he was induced by the acuteness of his great antagonist to review and reform his own opinions, I must leave to the philosophical reader.†

27. Stewart had evidently little or no knowledge of the Syntagma Philosophicum. But he had seen an Abridgement of the Philosophy of Gassendi by Primmer of Bernier, published at Lyons in 1678, and finding Bernier, published at Lyons in 1678, and finding in this the doctrine of Locke on ideas of reflection, conceived that it did not faithfully represent its own original. But this was hardly a very plausible conjecture; Bernier being a man of considerable ability, an intimate friend of Gassendi, and his epitome being so far from concise that it extends to eight small volumes. Having not indeed collated the two books, but read them within a short interval of time, I can say that Bernier has given a faithful account of the philosophy of Gassendi, as it is contained in the Syntagma Philosophicum, for he takes notice of no other work; nor has he here added any thing of his own. But in 1682 he published another little book, entitled Doutes de M. Bernier sur quelques uns des principaux Chapitres de son Abrégé de la Philosophie de Gassendi. One of these doubts relates to Gassendi Opera, vol. vi. p. 100.

 These letters are intresting to those who would study the philosophy of Grassindi.

that he should not have examined so closely the metaphysics of Descartes, if he had been treated by tem with as much publishess as he had expected. Vie do Descartes, los si. The retort of Processing O caro. (see Vol. 11. of this work, p. 444.) offended Gasserdi, and caused a colchow, which according to Badies, Softwere aggravated, acting a treacherous just in exampleshing the mind of Gasserdi.

[†] Bodiet, in his Life of Descrites, would lead on to think that Gassaidi was too much influenced by personal motives in writing against Descrites, who had mentioned the phanomena of purhelas, without alluding to a descritation of Gassaidi on the subject. The latter, it seems, owns in a letter to Rivet, the existence of space; and in another place he denies the reality of eternity or abstract duration. Bernier observes, as Descartes had done, that it is vain and even dangerous to attempt a definition of evident things, such as motion, because we are apt to mistake a definition of the word for one of the thing; and philosophers seem to conceive that motion is a real being, when they talk of a billiard-ball communicating or losing it.

28. The Cartesian philosophy, which its adversaries had expected to expire with its founder, spread more and more after his death, nor had it ever depended on any personal favour or popularity of Descartes, since he did not possess such except with a few friends. The churches and schools of Holland were full of Cartesians. The old scholastic philosophy became ridiculous, its distinctions, its maxims were laughed it, as its adherents complain; and probably a more fatal blow was given to the Aristotelian system by Descartes than even by Bacon. The Cartesian theories were obnoxious to the rigid class of theologians; but two parties of considerable importance in Holland, the Arminians and the Coccejans, generally espoused the new philosophy. Many speculations in theology were immediately connected with it, and it acted on the free and scrutinising spirit which began to sap the bulwarks of established orthodoxy. The Cartesians were denounced in ecclesiastical synods, and were hardly admitted to any office in the church. They were condemned by several universities, and especially by that of Leyden in 1678, for the position that the truth of Scripture must be proved by reason. † Nor were they less exposed to persecution in France. $ que nominis Cartesiani in disputationibus lectionibus aut publicia alias exercitus, nee pro nee contra mentio fist. L tricht, in 1644, had gone farther, and hier decree is couched in terms which might have been used by any one who wished to radicule university prejudice by a forgery. Reperte novam cham philosophiam, primo quia seteri philosophiam, quam Academie toto orbi terrarum bacterias opti no consilio docuere, adversatur, ijnas quo fundamenta subvertit, dende qui juventutem a veteri et sana philosophia

Even Gassendi has defined duration "an incorporeal flowing extension," which is a good instance of the success that can attend such definitions of simple pleas.

t Leyden had condemned the whole Cartesian system as early as 1631, on the ground that it was an imposation on the Aristotelian philosophy so long received, and ordaned, it in Academia intra Aristoteliese philosophise limites, que his bactenus recepta fut, nos conformium, utque in posterium nec philosophise, ne-

29. The Cartesian philosophy, in one sense, carried in itself the seeds of its own decline; it was the Scylla of many dogs; it taught men to think for themselves, and to think often better than Descartes had done. A new eclectic philosophy, or rather the genuine spirit of free inquiry, made Cartesianism cease as a sect, though it left much that had been introduced by it. We owe thanks to these Cartesians of the seventeenth century for their strenuous assertion of reason against prescriptive authority: the latter part of this age was signalised by the overthrow of a despotism which had fought every inch in its retreat, and it was manifestly after a struggle, on the Continent, with this new philosophy, that it was ultimately vanquished.*

30. The Cartesian writers of France, the Low Countries, and Germany, were numerous and respectable. La La Forge Forge of Saumur first developed the theory of occasional causes to explain the union of soul and body, wherein he was followed by Geulinx, Regis, Wittich, and Malebranche.† But this and other innovations displeased the stricter Cartesians who did not find them in their master. Clauberg in Germany, Clerselier in France, Le Grand in the Low Countries, should be mentioned among the leaders of the school. But no one has left so comprehensive a statement and defence of Cartesianism, as Jean Silvain Regis, whose Système de la Philosophie, in three quarto volumes, appeared at Paris in avertit, impeditique quo minus ad cubura produtiona procedure, co qued istina procumpto philosophio administrato et technologematis in auctorum libris profissorunque fretionifica et disputationibus noitoto, percipere negat, postremo quod ex-cadem varios falsie et absunde opiniones partin consequenter, partin ab improvida juventule deduci pose t jugnantes cum enteres disciplinis et facultatibus, stque imprimis com orthodoxa theologia; printere igitur et statuere omnes philosophiam in bac Academia docentes imposterum a tali instituto et incepto abstipere debere, contentos modica libertate deseateends in sugularibus nonnullis opiciotabus ad altarum celebrium Academiarum exemptum luc matata, ita ut vetera et recepte philosophie fundamenta non labefactent. Tepel. Hist. Philos. Cartesiana, p. 75.

† An account of the manner in which the Cartesians were harassed through the Jesusta is given by M Cousin, in the Journal des Sarans, March, 1838. • For the fate of the Cartesian philo-

For the fite of the Cartesian philosophy in the life of its founder, are the life of Descartes by Baillet, 2 vols, in quarto, which he afterwards abridged in 12mo. After the death of Descartes, it may be heat traced by means of Brucker. Buble, as usual, is a mere copy at of his predecessor. He has however given a fuller account of Regis. A contemporary Hustary of Cartesian Philosophy by Topel contains father a multip written summary of the continuesses it excited both in the Instance of Descartes and for a few years afterwards.

† Tennemann (Manuel de la Philosophie, 0, 99.) ascribes this theory to Geuliux. See also Brucker, v. 704.

1600. It is divided into four parts, on Logic, Metaphysics, Physics, and Ethics. In the three latter Regis claims nothing as his own except some explanations. "All that I have said being due to M. Descartes, whose method and principles I have followed, even in explanations that are different from his own." And in his Logic he professes to have gone little beyond the author of the Art de Penser. Notwithstanding this rare modesty, Regis is not a writer unworthy of being consulted by the studious of philosophy, nor deficient in clearer and fuller statements than will always be found in Descartes. It might even be said that he has many things which would be sought in vain through his master's writings, though I am unable to prove that they might not be traced in those of the intermediate Cartesians. Though our limits will not permit any further account of Regis, I will give a few passages in a note.†

• It is remarkable that Regis mys nothing about figures and modes of syllogism. Nous ne dirons rien des figures pe des syllogismes en géneral, cut bien que tout cela puisse servir de quelque chose pour la spéculation de la logique, il n'est au mons d'aucun niage pour la pratique, faquelle est l'unique but que nous pous sommes proposés dans ce traité p 57.

† Itegrs, in imitation of his master, and perhaps with more clearness, obnerves that our knowledge of our own existence is not derived from reasonable mais par une comnominate simple et intérieure, qui precede toutes les connoissar ces acquirés, et qui Jappelle conservace, En effet, quand je dis que je connois ou que je étois compostre, ce je presuppose Jus-mome mon existence, étant s'impossible que je connaisse, au reidement que je crete connaitre, et que je no sois pas quelque chose d'existant p 68. The Cartesian paradox, as it at first appears, that thenking is the essence of the soul, Regis has explained away. After coming to the conclusion. Je was done one pensic, be immediately corrects tamself Cependant de crair sençore de me di finis mal, quan't je das que je suis une pensee, qui a la propriéte de douter et d'avoir de la certitude, car quelle apparence y a-t-il que ma nature, qui doit i tre une chose bae et permanerte, comunte dans la pennée, passque je san par expersence que mes pensés sont dans un flux continuel, et que je ne pense jamas à la meme chose deux momens de suite? mais quand je considere la difficulte de plus pres, ju conçois alsement qu'elle vient de ce que le mot de pensee est équivoque, et que je m'en sers indifferenment pair signaier In perses qui constitue ma mature, et pour deserver les différentes manières d'etre de cette pensie, ce qui est une erreur extrame, car il y a cette difference es tre la pensee qui constitue ma nature, et lea penstes qui n'en sont que les manieres detre, que la premiere est une penseu fixe et permanente, et que les marcs sent des pensées changeantes et passigéres. C'est pourquoi, af n de donner une idea exacte de ma cature, je dirai que je sum une peoste qui existe en eile-meme, et qui est le sujet de toutes mes une cres de pemer. Je dik que jo suis una pensoe pour marquer es que la pensée qui constitue ma nature a de commun asce la pensée en géneral qui comi reod sous soit toutes les trameres part culieres de penset , et jujoute, qui existe en elle meme, et qui est le sujet de differentes mameres de pemer, pour designer ce que cette pensie a le particulier qui la distingue de la pensée en g utral, vu qu'elle n'ex ste que dans l'entendement de celui qui la conçoit nons que toutes les autres natures universelles, p. 70.

Every mode supposes a substance wherein it exists. From this axiom

31. Huet, Bishop of Avranches, a man of more general erudition than philosophical acuteness, yet not quite without this, arraigned the whole theory in his Censura Philosophiae Cartesianas. He had been for many years, as he tells us, a favourer of Cartesianism, but his retractation is very complete. It cannot be denied that Huet strikes well at the vulnerable parts of the Cartesian metaphysics, and exposes their alternate scepticism and dogmatism with some justice. In other respects he displays an inferior knowledge of the human mind and of the principles of reasoning to Descartes. He repeats Gassendi's cavil that, Cogito, ergo sum, involves the truth of Quod cogitat, est. The Cartesians, Huet observes, assert the major, or universal, to be deduced from the minor; which though true in things known by induction, is not so in propositions necessarily known, or as the schools say, a priori, as that the whole is greater than its part. It is not, however, probable that Descartes would have extended his reply to Gassendi's criticism so far as this; some have referred our knowledge of geometrical axioms to mere experience, but this seems not agreeable to the Cartesian theory.

32. The influence of the Cartesian philosophy was displayed

Regis deduces the objective being of space, because we have the ideas of length, breadth, and depth, which cannot belong to outselves, our souls having none of these properties, nor could the idea by suggested by a superior being, if space did not creek, because they would be the representations of monentary, which is impressible. But this transversibility proof is too subtle for the world.

It can assom of Regis that we only know things without us by means of ideas, and that things of which we have no cleas, are in regard to us as if they did not exist at all. Another amounts that all ideas, considered in respect to their representative property, depend on objects as their types, or course exemplaire. And a third, that the "recurse exemplaire" of ideas must contain all the properties which the ideas represent These amonts, according to him are the larges of all certainty in physical truth From the second amon he deduces the objectivity or "cause exemplaire" of his idea of a perfect being t and his proof seems at least more clearly put thun by Descartes. Every idea implies an objective reality, for otherwise there would be an effect without a name. Yet in this we have the suppliering and higging of questions of which we may see many instances in Spinosa.

In the second part of the first book of his metaphysics, Regis treats of the amout of soul and body, and concludes that the motions of the body only set on the soul by a special will of God, who has determined to produce certain thoughts atmultaticously with certain bodily motions, p. 124. God is the efficient first cause of all effects, his creatures are but secondardy efficient. But as they get immediately, we may averibe all modal heavys to the efficiency of second causes. And be prefers this expression to that of occasional causes, usual among the Cartesians, because he fairness the latter rather derogatory to the fixed will of took.

in a treatise of deserved reputation, L'Art de Penser, often called the Port-Royal Logic. It seems to have been the work of Antony Arnauld, with some assistance, perhaps by Nicole. Arnauld was not an entire Cartesian; he had himself been engaged in controversy with Descartes; but his understanding was clear and calm, his love of truth sincere, and he could not avoid recognising the vast superiority of the new philosophy to that received in the schools. This logic accordingly is perhaps the first regular treatise on that science that contained a protestation, though in very moderate language, against the Aristotelian method. The author tells us that after some doubt he had resolved to insert a few things rather troublesome and of little value, such as the rules of conversion and the demonstration of the syllogistic figures, chiefly as exercises of the understanding, for which difficulties are not without utility. The method of syllogism itself he deems little serviceable in the discovery of truth; while many things dwelt upon in books of logic, such as the ten categories, rather injure than improve the reasoning faculties, because they accustom men to satisfy themselves with words, and to mistake a long catalogue of arbitrary definitions for real knowledge. Of Aristotle he speaks in more houourable terms than Bacon had done before, or than Malebrauche did afterwards; acknowledging the extraordinary merit of some of his writings, but pointing out with an independent spirit his failings as a master in the art of reasoning.

33. The first part of L'Art de Penser is almost entirely metaphysical, in the usual sense of that word. It considers ideas in their nature and origin, in the chief differences of the objects they represent, in their simplicity or composition, in their extent, as universal, particular, or singular, and, lastly, in their distinctness or confusion. The word idea, it is observed, is among those which are so clear that we cannot explain them by means of others, because none can be more clear and simple than themselves." But here it may be doubtful whether the sense in which the word is to be taken must strike every one in the same way. The clearness of a word does not depend on its association with a distinct conception in our own minds, but on the generality of this same association in the minds of others.

34. No follower of Descartes has more unambiguously than this author distinguished between imagination and intellection, though he gives the name of idea to both. Many suppose, he says, that they cannot conceive a thing when they cannot imagine it. But we cannot imagine a figure of 1000 sides, though we can conceive it and reason upon it. We may indeed get a confused image of a figure with many sides, but these are no more 1000 than they are 999. Thus also we have ideas of thinking, affirming, denying, and the like, though we have no imagination of these operations. By ideas therefore we mean not images painted in the fancy, but all that is in our minds when we say that we conceive any thing, in whatever manner we may conceive it. Hence it is easy to judge of the falsehood of some opinions held in this age. One philosopher has advanced that we have no idea of God; another that all reasoning is but an assemblage of words connected by an affirmation. He glances here at Gassendi and Hobbes.* Far from all our ideas coming from the senses, as the Aristotelians have said, and as Gassendi asserts in his Logic, we may say, on the contrary, that no idea in our thinds is derived from the senses except occasionally (par occasion); that is, the movements of the brain, which is all that the organs of sense can affect, give occasion to the soul to form different ideas which it would not otherwise form, though these ideas have scarce ever any resemblance to what occurs in the organs of sense and in the brain, and though there are also very many ideas, which deriving nothing from any bodily image, cannot without absurdity be referred to the senses,† This is perhaps a clearer statement of an important truth than will be found in Malebranche or in Descartes himself.

35. In the second part Arnauld treats of words and propo-this controversy with the father of the new philosophy, and the disciples (calling the author of L'Art de Penser such in a general across) retained by equal captiousness.

† C. L.

The reflection on Gassendi is a more castl, as will appear by remarking what he has really sath, and which we have quisted a few pages above. The Cartesians were resolved in using one serves of the word idea, while Gassendi used another. He had husself been to blame in sitions. Much of it may be reckoned more within the province of grammar than of logic. But as it is inconvenient to refer the student to works of a different class, especially if it should be the case that no good grammars, written with a regard to logical principles, were then to be found, this cannot justly be made an objection. In the latter chapters of this second part, he comes to much that is strictly logical, and taken from ordinary books on that science. The third part relates to syllogisms, and notwithstanding the author's low estimation of that method, in comparison with the general regard for it in the schools, he has not omitted the common explanations of mood and figure, ending with a concise but good account of the chief sophisms.

36. The fourth and last part is entitled, On Method, and contains the principles of connected reasoning, which he justly observes to be more important than the rules of single syllogisms, wherein few make any mistake. The laws of demonstration given by Pascal are here laid down with some enlargement. Many observations not wholly bearing on merely logical proof are found in this part of the treatise.

37. The Port-Royal Logic, though not, perhaps, very much read in England, has always been reckoned among the best works in that science, and certainly had a great influence in rendering it more metaphysical, more ethical (for much is said by Arnauld on the moral discipline of the mand in order to fit it for the investigation of truth), more exempt from technical barbarisms and trifling definitions and divisions. It became more and more acknowledged that the rules of syllogism go a very little way in rendering the mind able to follow a course of inquiry without error, much less in assisting it to discover truth; and that even their vaunted prerogative of securing us from fallacy is nearly ineffectual in exercise. The substitution of the French language, in its highest polish, for the uncouth Latinity of the Aristotelians, was another advantage of which the Cartesian school legitimately availed themselves.

38. Malebranche, whose Recherche de la Vérité was published in 1674, was a warm and almost enthusiastic admirer of Descartes, but his mind was independent, searching, and foud of its own inventions; he acknowledged no master, and in some points dissents from the Cartesian school. His natural temperament was sincere and rigid; he judges the moral and intellectual failings of mankind with a severe scrutiny, and a contemptuousness not generally unjust in itself, but displaying too great confidence in his own superiority. This was enhanced by a religious mysticism, which enters, as an essential element, into his philosophy of the mind. fame of Malebranche, and still more the popularity in modern times of his Search for Truth, has been affected by that peculiar hypothesis, so mystically expressed, the seeing all things in God, which has been more remembered than any other part of that treatise. "The union," he says, " of the soul to God is the only means by which we acquire a knowledge of truth. This union has indeed been rendered so obscure by original sin, that few can understand what it means; to those who follow blindly the dictates of sense and passion it appears imaginary. The same cause has so fortified the connexion between the soul and body that we look on them as one substance, of which the latter is the principal part. And hence we may all fear that we do not well discern the confused sounds with which the senses fill the imagination from that pure voice of truth which speaks to the soul. The body speaks louder than God himself; and our pride makes us presumptuous enough to judge without waiting for those words of truth, without which we cannot truly judge at all. And the present work," he adds, "may give evidence of this; for it is not published as being infallible. But let my readers judge of my opinions according to the clear and distinct answers they shall receive from the only Lord of all men, after they shall have interrogated him by paying a serious attention to the subject." This is a strong evidence of the enthusiastic confidence in supernatural illumination which belongs to Malebranche, and which we are almost surprised to find united with so much cool and acute reasoning as his writings contain.

39. The Recherche de la Vérité is in six books; the first five on the errors springing from the senses, from the imagination, from the understanding, from the natural inclinations, and from the passions. The sixth contains the method of avoiding these, which however has been anticipated in great measure throughout the preceding. Malebranche has many repetitions, but little, I think, that can be called digressive, though he takes a large range of illustration, and dwells rather diffusely on topics of subordinate importance. His style is admirable; clear, precise, elegant, sparing in metaphors, yet not wanting them in due place, warm, and sometimes eloquent, a little redundant, but never passionate or declamatory.

40. Error, according to Malebranche, is the source of all hothers, sinner, and he would not sin if he did not consent human misery; man is miserable because he is a For the will alone judges and reasons, the understanding only perceives things and their relations—a deviation from common language, to say the least, that seems quite unnecessary. The will is active and free; not that we can avoid willing our own happiness; but it possesses a power of turning the understanding towards such objects as please us, and commanding it to examine every thing thoroughly, else we should be perpetually deceived, and without remedy, by the appearances of truth. And this liberty we should use on every occasion; it is to become slaves, against the will of God, when we acquiesce in false appearances; but it is in obedience to the voice of eternal truth which speaks within us, that we submit to those secret reproaches of reason, which accompany our refusal to yield to evidence. There are, therefore, two fundamental rules, one for science, the other for morals; never to give an entire consent to any propositions, except those which are so evidently true, that we cannot refuse to admit them without an internal uneasiness and reproach of our reason; and, never fully to love any thing, which we can abstain from loving without remorse. We may feel a great inclination to consent absolutely to a probable opinion; yet on reflection, we shall find that we are not compelled to do so by any tacit self-reproach if we do not. And we ought to consent to such probable opinions for the time until we have more fully examined the question.

41. The sight is the noblest of our senses, and if they had been given us to discover truth, it is through vision that we should have done it. But it deceives us in all that it represents, in the size of bodies, their figures and motions, in light and colours. None of these are such as they appear, as he proves by many obvious instances. Thus we measure the velocity of motion by duration of time and extent of space; but of duration the mind can form no just estimate, and the eye cannot determine equality of spaces. The diameter of the moon is greater by measurement when she is high in the heavens; it appears greater to our eyes in the horizon. On all sides we are beset with error through our senses. Not that the sensations themselves, properly speaking, deceive us. We are not deceived in supposing that we see an orb of light before the sun has risen above the horizon, but in supposing that what we see is the sun itself. Were we even delirious, we should see and feel what our senses present to us, though our judgment as to its reality would be erroneous. And this judgment we may withhold by assenting to nothing without perfect certainty.

42. It would have been impossible for a man endowed with such intrepidity and acuteness as Malebranche to overlook the question, so naturally raised by this sceptical theory, as to the objective existence of an external world. There is no necessary connexion, he observes, between the presence of an idea in the soul and the existence of the thing which it represents, as dreams and delirium prove. Yet we may be confident that extension, figure, and movement do generally exist without us when we perceive them. These are not imaginary; we are not deceived in believing their reality, though it is very difficult to prove it. But it is far otherwise with colours, smells, or sounds, for these do not exist at all beyond the mind. This he proceeds to show at considerable length.† In one of the illustrations subsequently written in order to obvinte objections, and subjoined to the Recherche de la Vérité, Malebranche comes again to this problem of the reality of matter, and concludes by subverting every argument in its favour, except what he takes to be the assertion of

+ L. a. c. 10.

^{*} L. t. c. 2. Malchemeite was engaged afterwards in a controversy with Regis on this particular question of the horizontal moon.

Scripture. Berkeley, who did not see this in the same light, had scarcely a step to take in his own famous theory, which we may consider as having been anticipated by Malebranche, with the important exception that what was only scepticism and denial of certainty in the one, became a positive and dogmatic affirmation in the other.

43. In all our sensations, he proceeds to show, there are four things distinct in themselves, but which examined as they arise simultaneously, we are apt to confound; these are the action of the object, the effect upon the organ of sense, the mere sensation, and the judgment we form as to its cause. We fall into errors as to all these, confounding the sensation with the action of bodies, as when we say there is heat in the fire or colour in the rose, or confounding the motion of the nerves with sensation, as when we refer heat to the hand; but most of all, in drawing mistaken inferences as to the nature of objects from our sensations.* It may be here remarked, that what Malebranche has properly called the judgment of the mind as to the cause of its sensations, is precisely what Reid denominates perception; a term less clear, and which seems to have led some of his school into important errors. The language of the Scottish philosopher appears to imply that he considered perception as a distinct and original faculty of the mind, rather than what it is, a complex operation of the judgment and memory, applying knowledge already acquired by experience. Neither he, nor his disciple Stewart, though aware of the mistakes that have arisen in this province of metaphysics by selecting our instances from the phenomena of vision instead of the other senses, have avoided the same source of error. The sense of sight has the prerogative of enabling us to pronounce instantly on the external cause of our sensation; and this perception is so intimately blended with the sensation itself, that it does not imply in our minds, whatever may be the case with young children, the least consciousness of a judgment. But we need only make our experiment upon sound or smell, and we shall at once acknowledge that there is no sort of necessary connexion between the sensation and our knowledge of its corresponding external object. We hear sounds continually, which we are incapable of referring to any particular body; nor does any one, I suppose, deny that it is by experience alone we learn to pronounce, with more or less of certainty according to its degree, on the causes from which these sensations proceed.

44. Sensation he defines to be "a modification of the soul in relation to something which passes in the body to which she is united." These sensations we know by experience; it is idle to go about defining or explaining them; this cannot be done by words. It is an error, according to Malebranche, to believe that all men have like sensations from the same objects. In this he goes farther than Pascal, who thinks it probable that they have, while Malebranche holds it indubitable, from the organs of men being constructed differently, that they do not receive similar impressions; instancing music, some smells and flavours, and many other things of the same kind. But it is obvious to reply that he has argued from the exception to the rule; the great majority of mankind agreeing as to musical sounds (which is the strongest case that can be put against his paradox), and most other sensations. That the sensations of different men, subject to such exceptions, if not strictly alike, are, so to say, in a constant ratio, seems as indisputable as any conclusion we can draw from their testimony.

45. The second book of Malebranche's treatise relates to the imagination, and the errors connected with it. "The imagination consists in the power of the mind to form images of objects by producing a change in the fibres of that part of the brain, which may be called principal because it corresponds with all parts of the body, and is the place where the soul, if we may so speak, immediately resides." This he supposes to be where all the filaments of the brain terminate: so difficult was it, especially in that age, for a philosopher who had the clearest perception of the soul's immateriality to free hunself from the analogies of extended presence and material inpulse. The imagination, he says, comprehends two things; the action of the will and the obedience of the annual spirits which trace images on the brain. The power of conception depends partly upon the strength of those animal spirits, partly on the qualities of the brain itself. For just as the size, the depth, and the clearness of the lines in an engraving depend on the force with which the graver acts, and on the obedience which the copper yields to it, so the depth and clearness of the traces of the imagination depend on the force of the animal spirits, and on the constitution of the fibres of the brain; and it is the difference of these which occasions almost the whole of that vast inequality which we find in the capacities of men.

46. This arbitrary, though rather specious hypothesis, which in the present more advanced state of physiology a philosopher might not in all points reject, but would certainly not assume, is spread out by Malebranche over a large part of his work, and especially the second book. The delicacy of the fibres of the brain, he supposes, is one of the chief causes of our not giving sufficient application to difficult subjects. Women possess this delicacy, and hence have more intelligence than men as to all sensible objects; but whatever is abstract is to them incomprehensible. The fibres are soft in children, and become stronger with age, the greatest perfection of the understanding being between thirty and fifty; but with prejudiced men, and especially when they are advanced in life, the hardness of the cerebral fibre confirms them in error. For we can understand nothing without attention, nor attend to it without having a strong image in the brain, nor can that image be formed without a suppleness and susceptibility of motion in the brain itself. It is therefore highly useful to get the habit of thinking on all subjects, and thus to give the brain a facility of motion analogous to that of the fingers in playing on a musical instrument. And this habit is best acquired by seeking truth in difficult things while we are young, because it is then that the fibres are most easily bent in all directions.

47. This hypothesis, carried so far as it has been by Malebranche, goes very great lengths in asserting not merely a connexion between the cerebral motions and the operations of the mind, but something like a subordination of the latter to a plastic power in the animal spirits of the brain. For if the differences in the intellectual powers of mankind, and also, as be afterwards maintains, in their moral emotions, are to be accounted for by mere bodily configuration as their regulating cause, little more than a naked individuality of consciousness seems to be left to the immaterial principle. No one, however, whether he were staggered by this difficulty or not, had a more decided conviction of the essential distinction between mind and matter than this disciple of Descartes. The soul, he says, does not become body, nor the body soul, by their union. Each substance remains as it is, the soul incapable of extension and motion, the body incapable of thought and desire. All the alliance between soul and body which is known to us consists in a natural and mutual correspondence of the thoughts of the former with the traces on the brain, and of its emotions with the traces of the animal spirits. As soon as the soul receives new ideas, new traces are imprinted on the brain; and as soon as external objects imprint new traces, the soul receives new ideas. Not that it contemplates these traces, for it has no knowledge of them; nor that the traces contain the ideas, since they have no relation to them; nor that the soul receives her ideas from the traces, for it is inconceivable that the soul should receive any thing from the body, and become more enlightened, as some philosophers (meaning Gassendi) express it, by turning itself towards the phantasms in the brain. Thus, also, when the soul wills that the arm should move, the arm moves, though she does not even know what else is necessary for its motion; and thus, when the animal spirits are put into movement, the soul is disturbed, though she does not even know that there are animal spirits in the body.

48. These remarks of Malebranche it is important to familiarise to our minds; and those who reflect upon them will neither fall into the gross materialism to which many physiologists appear prone, nor, on the other hand, out of fear of allowing too much to the bodily organs, reject any sufficient proof that may be adduced for the relation between the cerebral system and the intellectual processes. These opposite errors are by no means uncommon in the present age. But, without expressing an opinion on that peculiar hypothesis which is generally called phrenology, we might ask whether it is not quite as conceivable that a certain state of portions of the brain may be the antecedent condition of memory or imagination, as that a certain state of nervous filaments may be, what we know it is, an invariable antecedent of sensation. In neither instance can there be any resemblance or proper representation of the organic motion transferred to the soul; nor ought we to employ, even in metaphor, the analogies of impulse or communication. But we have two phænomena, between which, by the constitution of our human nature, and probably by that of the very lowest animals, there is a perpetual harmony and concomitance; an ultimate fact, according to the present state of our faculties, which may in some senses be called mysterious, inasmuch as we can neither fully apprehend its final causes, nor all the conditions of its operation, but one which seems not to involve any appearance of contradiction, and should therefore not lead us into the useless perplexity of seeking a solution that is almost evidently beyond our reach.

49. The association of ideas is far more extensively developed by Malebranche in this second book than by any of the old writers, not even, I think, with the exception of Hobbes; though he is too fond of mixing the psychological facts which experience furnishes with his precarious, however plausible, theory of cerebral traces. Many of his remarks are acute and valuable. Thus he observes that writers who make use of many new terms in science, under the notion of being more intelligible, are often not understood at all, whatever care they may take to define their words. We grant in theory their right to do this; but nature resists. words, having no ideas previously associated with them, fall out of the reader's mind, except in mathematics, where they can be rendered evident by diagrams. In all this part, Malebranche expatiates on the excessive deference shown to authority, which, because it is great in religion, we suppose equally conclusive in philosophy, and on the waste of time which mere reading of many books entails; experience, he says, having always shown that those who have studied most are the very persons who have led the world into the greatest errors. The whole of the chapters on this subject is worth perusal.

50. In another part of this second book, Malebranche has opened a new and fertile vein, which he is far from having exhausted, on what he calls the contagiousness of a powerful imagination. Minds of this character, he observes, rule those which are feebler in conception: they give them by degrees their own habit, they impress their own type; and as men of strong imagination are themselves for the most part very unreasonable, their brains being cut up, as it were, by deep traces, which leave no room for any thing else, no source of human error is more dangerous than this contagiousness of their disorder. This he explains, in his favourite physiology, by a certain natural sympathy between the cerebral fibres of different men, which being wanting in any one with whom we converse, it is vain to expect that he will enter into our views, and we must look for a more sympathetic tissue elsewhere.

- 51. The moral observations of Malebranche are worth more than these hypotheses with which they are mingled. Men of powerful imagination express themselves with force and vivacity, though not always in the most natural manner, and often with great animation of gesture; they deal with subjects that excite sensible images, and from all this they acquire a great power of persuasion. This is exercised especially over persons in subordinate relations; and thus children, servants, or courtiers adopt the opinions of their superiors. Even in religion nations have been found to take up the doctrines of their rulers, as has been seen in England. In certain authors, who influence our minds without any weight of argument, this despotism of a strong imagination is exercised, which he particularly illustrates by the examples of Tertullian, Seneca, and Montaigne. The contagious power of imagination is also manifest in the credulity of mankind as to apparitions and witchcraft; and he observes that where witches are burned, there is generally a great number of them, while, since some parliaments have ceased to punish for sorcery, the offence has diminished within their jurisdiction.
- 52. The application which these striking and original views will bear spreads far into the regions of moral philosophy in the largest scuse of that word. It is needless to dwell upon, and idle to cavil at the physiological theories to which Malebranche has had recourse. False let them be, what is derived from the experience of human nature will always be true. No one general phænomenon in the intercommunity of mankind with each other is more worthy to be remembered, or more evident to an observing eye, than this contagiousness, as Malebranche phrases it, of a powerful imagination, especially when assisted by any circumstances that secure and augment its influence. The history of every popular delusion, and even the petty events of every day in private life, are witnesses to its power.

53. The third book is entitled, Of the Understanding or Pure Spirit (l'Esprit Pur). By the pure understanding he means the faculty of the soul to know the reality of certain things without the aid of images in the brain. And he warns the reader that the inquiry will be found dry and obscure. The essence of the soul, he says, following his Cartesian theory, consists in thinking, as that of matter does in extension; will, imagination, memory, and the like, are modifications of thought or forms of the soul, as water, wood, or fire are modifications of matter. This sort of expression has been adopted by our metaphysicians of the Scots school in preference to the ideas of reflection, as these operations are called by Locke. But by the word thought (pensée) Malebranche, hke Regis, does not mean these modifications, but the soul or thinking principle absolutely, capable of all these modifications, as extension is neither round nor square, though capable of either form. The power of volition and, by parity of reasoning we may add, of thinking, is inseparable from the soul, but not the acts of volition or thinking themselves; as a body is always moveable, though it be not always in motion.

54. In this book it does not seem that Malebranche has been very successful in distinguishing the ideas of pure intellect from those which the senses or imagination present to us; nor do we clearly see what he means by the former, except those of existence and a few more. But he now hastens to his peculiar hypothesis as to the mode of perception. By ideas he understands the immediate object of the soul, which all the world, he supposes, will agree not to be the same with the external object of sense. Ideas are real existences; for they have properties, and represent very different things; but nothing can have no property. • How then do they enter into the mind, or become present to it? Is it, as the Aristotelians hold, by means of species transmitted from the external objects? Or are they produced instantaneously by some faculty of the soul? Or have they been created and posited as it were in the soul, when it began to exist? Or does God produce them in us whenever we think or perceive? Or does the soul contain in herself in some transcendental manner whatever is in the sensible world? These hypotheses of elder philosophers, some of which are not quite intelligibly distinct from each other, Malebranche having successively refuted, comes to what he considers the only possible alternative; namely, that the soul is united to an allperfect Being, in whom all that belongs to his creatures is contained. Besides the exclusion of every other supposition which by his sorites he conceives himself to have given, he subjoins several direct arguments in favour of his own theory, but in general so obscure and full of arbitrary assumption that they cannot be stated in this brief sketch. †

55. The mysticism of this eminent man displays itself throughout this part of his treatise, but rarely leading him into that figurative and unmeaning language from which the inferior class of enthusiasts are never free. His philosophy which has hitherto appeared so sceptical, assumes now the character of intense irresistible conviction. The scepticism of Malebranche is merely ancillary to his mysticism. His philosophy, if we may use so quaint a description of it, is subjectivity leading objectivity in chains. He seems to triumph in his restoration of the inner man to his pristine greatness, by subduing those false traitors and rebels, the nerves and brain, to whom, since the great lapse of Adam, his posterity had been in thrall. It has been justly remarked by

[&]quot;I Cudworth uses the same argument for the reality of sleas. "It is a ridiculous concert of a modern attribute writer that universals are nothing able but names, attributed to many singular bodies, because whatever is, is singular bodies, because whatever exists without the must be ungular, yet it is plain that there are conceptions in our mands objectively universal. Which universal of jects of our mind, though they exist not as such any where with antit, yet are they not therefore nothing, but have an rite ligible retity, for this very reason, because they are conceivable, for some nonerity is not conceasable, whatever is conceasable as an object of the mind is therefore something. Intellectual System, p. 731, —1842.

⁺ L. ui. c. 6.

Brown, that in the writings of Malebranche, as in all theological metaphysicians of the catholic church, we perceive the commanding influence of Augustin, From him, rather than, in the first instance, from Plato or Plotinus, it may be suspected that Malebranche, who was not very learned in ancient philosophy, derived the manifest tinge of Platonism, that, mingling with his warm admiration of Descartes, has rendered him a link between two famous systems, not very harmonious in their spirit and turn of reasoning. But his genius more clear, or at least disciplined in a more accurate logic than that of Augustin, taught him to dissent from that father by denying objective reality to eternal truths, such as that two and two are equal to four; descending thus one step from unintelligible mysticism.

56. "Let us repose," he concludes, "in this tenet, that God is the intelligible world, or the place of spirits, like as the material world is the place of bodies; that it is from his power they receive all their modifications; that it is in his wisdom they find all their ideas; and that it is by his love they feel all their well-regulated emotions. And since his power and his wisdom and his love are but himself, let us believe with St. Paul, that he is not far from each of us, and that in him we live, and move, and have our being." But sometimes Malebranche does not content himself with these fine effusions of piety. His theism, as has often been the case with mystical writers, expands till it becomes as it were dark with excessive light, and almost vanishes in its own effulgence. He has passages that approach very closely to the pantheism of Jordano Bruno and Spinosa; one especially, wherein he vindicates the Cartesian argument for a being of necessary existence in a strain which perhaps renders that argument less incomprehensible, but certainly cannot be said, in any legitimate sense, to establish the existence of a Deity.†

57. It is from the effect which the invention of so original and striking an hypothesis, and one that raises such magnificent conceptions of the union between the Deity and the human soul, would produce on a man of an elevated and contem-

[•] Philosophy of the Human Mind, pseudoxical, in expression at least, as any Lecture xxx. Brown a own position, that thing in Malebranche.

• the idea is the mind," seems to me as

• L. in. c. 8

plative genius, that we must account for Malebranche's forgetfulness of much that he has judiciously said in part of his treatise, on the limitation of our faculties and the imperfect knowledge we can attain as to our intellectual nature. For, if we should admit that ideas are substances, and not accidents of the thinking spirit, it would still be doubtful whether he has wholly enumerated, or conclusively refuted, the possible hypotheses as to their existence in the mind. And his more direct reasonings labour under the same difficulty from the manifest incapacity of our understandings to do more than form conjectures and dim notions of what we can so imperfectly bring before them.

58. The fourth and fifth books of the Recherche de la Vérité treat of the natural inclinations and passions, and of the errors which spring from those sources. These books are various and discursive, and very characteristic of the author's mind; abounding with a mystical theology, which extends to an absolute negation of secondary causes, as well as with poignant satire on the follies of mankind. In every part of his treatise, but especially in these books, Malebranche pursues with unsparing ridicule two classes, the men of learning, and the men of the world. With Aristotle and the whole school of his disciples he has an inveterate quarrel, and omits no occasion of holding them forth to contempt. This seems to have been in a great measure warranted by their dogmatism, their bigotry, their pertinacious resistance to modern science, especially to the Cartesian philosophy, which Malebranche in general followed. "Let them," he exclaims, "prove, if they can, that Aristotle, or any of themselves, has deduced one truth in physical philosophy from any principle peculiar to himself, and we will promise never to speak of him but in enlogy." But, until this gauntlet should be taken up, he thought himself at liberty to use very different language. "The works of the Stagirite," he observes, "are so obscure and full of indefinite words, that we have a colour for ascribing to him the most opposite opinions. In fact, we make him say what we please, because he says very little, though with much parade; just as children fancy bells to say any thing, because they make a great noise, and in reality say nothing at all,"

59. But such philosophers are not the only class of the learned he depreciates. Those who pass their time in gazing through telescopes, and distribute provinces in the moon to their friends, those who pore over worthless books, such as the Rabbinical and other Oriental writers, or compose folio volumes on the animals mentioned in Scripture, while they can hardly tell what are found in their own province, those who accumulate quotations to inform us not of truth, but of what other men have taken for truth, are exposed to his sharp, but doubtless exaggerated and unreasonable ridicule. Malebranche, like many men of genius, was much too intolerant of what might give pleasure to other men, and too narrow in his measure of utility. He seems to think little valuable in human learning but metaphysics and algebra. From the learned he passes to the great, and after enumerating the circumstances which obstruct their perception of truth, comes to the blunt conclusion that men "much raised above the rest by rank, dignity, or wealth, or whose minds are occupied in gaining these advantages, are remarkably subject to error, and hardly capable of discerning any truths which lie a little out of the common way." †

60. The sixth and last book announces a method of directing our pursuit of truth, by which we may avoid the many errors to which our understandings are liable. It promises to give them all the perfection of which our nature is capable, by prescribing the rules we should invariably observe. But it must, I think, be confessed that there is less originality

La plupart de livres de certains savans ne sont fabriqués qu'à coups de dictionnaires, et da n'ont guersa lú que les tables des levres qu'ils citent, ou quel pues lieux commans, ramassés de dell'esens auteurs. On n'oseroit entrer d'avantage dans le détail de ces choses in en donner des exemples, de peur de choquer des personnes, auves fieres et aussi balieuxs que sont ces l'ux sivans, car on pe prend pas plasir is se faire injurier en Gree et en Arsbe.

+ C. 9.

It is rather amusing to find that, while lamenting the want of a review of books, he predicts that we shall never see one, on account of the prejudice of markind in favour of authors. The prophecy was fassified almost at the time. On regarde ordinarrement les auteors comme des hommes rures et catraordinaires et besucoop élesés au-deseus des autres; on les révere donc au lieu de les impriser et de les pouir. Ainsi il n'y a garres d'apparence que les bommes engent jamus un trabanal pour exammer et pour condamner tous les livres, qui ne foct que corrompte la ration. c. 8 in this method than we might expect. We find, however, many acute and useful, if not always novel, observations on the conduct of the understanding, and it may be reckoned among the books which would supply materials for what is still wanting to philosophical literature, an ample and useful logic. We are so frequently inattentive, he observes, especially to the pure ideas of the understanding, that all resources should be employed to fix our thoughts. And for this purpose we may make use of the passions, the senses, or the imagination, but the second with less danger than the first, and the third than the second. Geometrical figures he ranges under the aids supplied to the imagination rather than to the senses. He dwells much at length on the utility of geometry in fixing our attention, and of algebra in compressing and arranging our thoughts. All sciences, he well remarks, and I do not know that it had been said before, which treat of things distinguishable by more or less in quantity, and which consequently may be represented by extension, are capable of illustration by diagrams. But these, he conceives, are inapplicable to moral truths, though sure consequences may be derived from them. Algebra, however, is far more useful in improving the understanding than geometry, and is in fact, with its sister arithmetic, the best means that we possess,* But as men like better to exercise the imagmation than the pure intellect, geometry is the more favourite study of the

* L. vi. c. 4. All conceptions of abstract ideas, he justly remarks in another place, are accompanied with some imag nation, though we are often not aware of it, because these deas have no natural images or traces associated with them, but such only as the will of man or charce has given. Thus in analysis, however general the iless, we use retters and signs, always associated with the ideas of the things, though they are not really related, and for the reason do not give us false and confused notions. Hence, he thinks, the ideas of things which can only be perceived by the understanding may become associated with the traces on the brinn, L.v. e. 2. This is evidently as applicable to language as it § 15 .- 1842] is to algebra.

Cudworth has a somewhat somilar remark in his funnatable Morality, that the cognisions we have of corporeal tangs are usually, in his technical style, both noematical and phantasmirical together, the one being as it were the soul, and the other the body of them. "Whenever we't ink of a phantasmistical universal or universalized phantasmistical universal or universalized phantasmistical universal or universalized phantasmistical universal or universalized phantasmistical and something phantasmistical together, for phantasmisthemiciaes as well as saturations are always individual though "p. 145. — [See also the questation from Gassensis storms, § 15.—1842]

61. Malebranche may, perhaps, be thought to have occupied too much of our attention at the expense of Character of Male-branche more popular writers. But for this very reason, that the Recherche de la Vérité is not at present much read, I have dwelt long on a treatise of so great celebrity in its own age, and which, even more perhaps than the metaphysical writings of Descartes, has influenced that department of philosophy. Malebranche never loses sight of the great principle of the soul's immateriality, even in his long and rather hypothetical disquisitions on the instrumentality of the brain in acts of thought; and his language is far less objectionable on this subject than that of succeeding philosophers. He is always consistent and clear in distinguishing the soul itself from its modifications and properties. He knew well and had deeply considered the application of mathematical and physical science to the philosophy of the human mind. He is very copious and diligent in illustration, and very clear in definition. His principal errors, and the sources of them in his peculiar temperament, have appeared in the course of these pages. And to these we may add his maintaining some Cartesian paradoxes, such as the system of vortices, and the want of sensation in brutes. The latter be deduced from the immateriality of a thinking principle, supposing it incredible, though he owns it had been the tenet of Augustin, that there could be an immaterial spirit in the lower animals, and also from the incompatibility of any unmerited suffering with the justice of God. Nor was Malebranche exempt from some prejudices of scholastic theology; and though he generally took care to avoid its technical language, is content to repel the objection to his denial of all secondary causation from its making God the sole author of sin, by saying that sin, being a privation of righteousness, is negative, and consequently requires no cause.

62. Malebranche bears a striking resemblance to his great contemporary Pascal, though they were not, I becontemporary r assau, lieve, in any personal relation to each other, nor could either have availed himself of the other's writings. Both of ardent minds, endowed with strong imagination and lively wit, sarcastic, severe, fearless, disdainful of popular opinion and accredited reputations; both imbued with the notion of a vast difference between the original and actual state of man, and thus solving many phenomena of his being; both, in different modes and degrees, sceptical, and rigorous in the exaction of proof; both undervaluing all human knowledge beyond the regions of mathematics; both of rigid strictness in morals, and a fervid enthusiastic piety. But in Malebranche there is a less overpowering sense of religion; his eve roams unblenched in the light, before which that of Pascal had been veiled in awe; he is sustained by a less timid desire of truth, by greater confidence in the inspirations that are breathed into his mind; he is more quick in adopting a novel opinion, but less apt to embrace a sophism in defence of an old one; he has less energy, but more copiousness and variety.

This he had borrowed from a maxim whence, it seems, that fither had inferred of Augustin, sub-justo Deo quasquam the impulation of original on to infants, mil merestur, miser case non potest, a happy mode of escaping the difficulty.

with Malebranche, held no friendship in a balance with his rigid love of truth, combated the chief with an points of the other's theory in a treatise on true and false ideas. This work I have never had the good fortune to see; it appears to assail a leading principle of Malebranche, the separate existence of ideas, as objects in the mind independent and distinguishable from the sensation itself. Armuld maintained, as Reid and others have since done, that we do not perceive or feel ideas, but real objects, and thus led the way to a school which has been called that of Scotland, and has had a great popularity among our later metaphysicians. It would require a critical examination of his work, which I have not been able to make, to determine

63. Arnauld, who, though at first in personal friendship

64. The peculiar hypothesis of Malebranche, that we see all things in God, was examined by Locke in a short piece, contained in the collection of his works. It will readily be conceived that two philosophers, one eminently mystical, and endeavouring upon this highly transcendental theme to grasp in his mind and express in his language something beyond precisely what were the opinions of this philosopher.

[·] Brucker, Buble, Reid's Intellectual Powers,

the faculties of man, the other as characteristically averse to mystery, and slow to admit any thing without proof, would have hardly any common ground even to fight upon. Locke, therefore, does little else than complain that he cannot understand what Malebranche has advanced; and most of his readers will probably find themselves in the same position.

65. He had, however, an English supporter of some celebrity in his own age, Norris; a disciple, and one of the latest we have had, of the Platonic school of Henry More. The principal metaphysical treatise of Norris, his Essay on the Ideal World, was published in two parts, 1701 and 1702. It does not therefore come withinour limits. Norris is more thoroughly Platonic than Malebranche, to whom, however, he pays great deference, and adopts his fundamental hypothesis of seeing all things in God. He is a writer of fine genius and a noble elevation of moral sentiments, such as predisposes men for the Platonic schemes of theosophy. He looked up to Augustin with as much veneration as to Plato, and respected, more perhaps. than Malebranche, certainly more than the generality of English writers, the theological metaphysicians of the schools. With these he mingled some visions of a later mysticism. But his reasonings will seldom bear a close scrutiny,

66. In the Thoughts of Pascal we find many striking remarks on the logic of that science with which he was peculiarly conversant, and upon the general foundations of certainty. He had reflected deeply upon the sceptical objections to all human reasoning, and, though sometimes out of a desire to elevate religious faith at its. expense, he seems to consider them unanswerable, he was too clear-headed to believe them just. "Reason," he says, "confounds the dogmatists, and nature the sceptics." . "We have an incapacity of demonstration, which one cannot overcome; we have a conception of truth which the others cannot disturb." † He throws out a notion of a more complete method of reasoning than that of geometry, wherein every thing shall be demonstrated, which however he holds to be unattainable; and perhaps on this account he might think the cavils of pyrrhonism invincible by pure reason. But as he afterwards admits that we may have a full certainty of propositions that cannot be demonstrated, such as the infinity of number and space, and that such incapability of direct proof is rather a perfection than a defect, this notion of a greater completeness in evidence seems neither clear nor consistent. *

[&]quot; (Euvres de Pascal, vol. i. p. 202] Perisées de Pascal, part i. art. 2. † P. 208.

67. Geometry, Pascal observes, is almost the only subject, as to which we find truths wherein all men agree. And one cause of this is that geometers alone regard the true laws of demonstration. These as enumerated by him are eight in number. 1. To define nothing which cannot be expressed in clearer terms than those in which it is already expressed: 2. To leave no obscure or equivocal terms undefined: 3. To employ in the definition no terms not already known: 4. To omit nothing in the principles from which we argue unless we are sure it is granted: 5. To lay down no axiom which is not perfectly evident: 6. To demonstrate nothing which is as clear already as we can make it: 7. To prove every thing in the least doubtful, by means of self-evident axioms, or of propositions already demonstrated: 8. To substitute mentally the definition instead of the thing defined. Of these rules, he says, the first, fourth, and sixth are not absolutely necessary in order to avoid error, but the other five are indispensable. Yet, though they may be found in books of logic, none but the geometers have paid any regard to them. The authors of these books seem not to have entered into the spirit of their own precepts. All other rules than those he has given are useless or mischievous; they contain, he says, the whole art of demonstration. +

68. The reverence of Pascal, like that of Malebranche. for what is established in religion does not extend to philosophy. We do not find in them, as we may sometimes perceive in the present day, all sorts of prejudices against the liberties of the human mind clustering together like a herd of bats, by an instinctive association. He has the same idea as Bacon, that the ancients were properly the children among mankind. Not only each man, he says, advances daily in science, but all men collectively make a constant progress, so that all generations of mankind during so many ages may be considered as one man, always subsisting and always learning; and the old age of this universal man is not to be sought in the period next to his birth, but in that which is most removed from it. Those we call ancients were truly novices in all things; and we who have added to all they knew the experience of so many succeeding ages, have a better claim to that antiquity which we revere in them. In this, with much ingenuity and much truth, there is a certain mixture of fallacy, which I shall not wait to point out.

^{*} Comme la cause qui les rend in-capables de démonstration n'est pas leur obscursté, mais au contraire leur extrème † Courres de Pascal, 1, 16

69. The genius of Pascal was admirably fitted for acute observation on the constitution of human nature, if he had not seen every thing through a refracting medium of religious prejudice. When this does not interfere to bias his judgment he abounds with fine remarks, though always a little tending towards severity. One of the most useful and original is the following: "When we would show any one that he is mistaken, our best course is to observe on what side he considers the subject, for his view of it is generally right on this side, and admit to him that he is right so far. He will be satisfied with this acknowledgment that he was not wrong in his judgment, but only inadvertent in not looking at the whole of the case. For we are less ashamed of not having seen the whole, than of being deceived in what we do see; and this may perhaps arise from an impossibility of the understanding's being deceived in what it does see, just as the perceptions of the senses, as such, must be always true." .

70. The Cartesian philosophy has been supposed to have produced a metaphysician very divergent in most of his theory from that school, Benedict Spinosa. No treatise is written in a more rigidly geometrical method than his Ethics. It rests on definitions and axioms, from which the propositions are derived in close, brief, and usually perspicuous demonstrations. The few explanations he has thought necessary are contained in scholia. Thus a fabric is erected, ^{• (}Eurres de Pascal p.149. Though contrary swerted in other passages, he Pascal here says that the perceptions of is not uniformly commutent with lamself, the series are always true, we find the astonishing and bewildering in its entire effect, yet so regularly constructed, that the reader must pause and return on his steps to discover an error in the workmanship, while he cannot also but acknowledge the good faith and intimate persuasion of having attained the truth, which the acute and deep-reflecting author every where displays.

71. Spinosa was born in 1632; we find by his correspondence with Oldenburg in 1661, that he had lis emeral already developed his entire scheme, and in that originality. with De Vries in 1668, the propositions of the Ethics are alluded to numerically, as we now read them. It was therefore the fruit of early meditation, as its fearlessness, its general disregard of the slow process of observation, its unbesitating dogmatism, might lead us to expect. In what degree he had availed himself of prior writers is not evident; with Descartes and Lord Bacon he was familiar, and from the former he had derived some leading tenets; but he observes both in him and Bacon what he calls mistakes as to the first cause and origin of things, their ignorance of the real nature of the human mind, and of the true sources of error. † The pantheistic theory of Jordano Bruno is not very remote from that of Spinosa; but the rhapsodies of the Italian, who seldom aims at proof, can hardly have supplied much to the subtle mind of the Jew of Amsterdam. Buhle has given us an exposition of the Spinosistic theory. 1 But several propositions in this I do not find in the author, and Buhle has at least, without any necessity, entirely deviated from the arrangement he found in the Ethics. This seems as upreasonable in a work so rigorously systematic, as it would be in the elements of Euclid; and I believe the following pages will prove more faithful to the text. But it is no easy task to translate and abridge a writer of such extraordinary conciseness as well as subtilty; nor is it probable that my attempt will be intelligible to those who have not habituated themselves to metaphysical inquiry.

f Cartes et Bacon tam longé a cognitione prime cause et origina omnium ; Il rerum aberrarunt, . . . Veram naturam p. 440.

^{*} Spinome Opera Posthutas, p. 398, humanst mentis non cognuterant vetam causam etroria manquam operati

[!] Hist. de la Philosophie, vol. ili.

72. The first book or part of the Ethics is entitled Concerning God, and contains the entire theory of Spinosa. It may even be said that this is found in a few of the first propositions; which being granted, the rest could not easily be denied; presenting, as they do, . little more than new aspects of the former, or evident deductions from them. Upon eight definitions and seven axioms reposes this philosophical superstructure. A substance, by the third definition, is that, the conception of which does not require the conception of any thing else as antecedent to it,* The attribute of a substance is whatever the mind perceives to constitute its essence.† The mode of a substance is its accident or affection, by means of which it is conceived. In the sixth definition he says, I understand by the name of God a being absolutely infinite; that is, a substance consisting of infinite attributes, each of which expresses an eternal and infinite essence. Whatever expresses an essence, and involves no contradiction, may be predicated of an absolutely infinite being. The most important of the axioms are the following: From a given determinate cause the effect necessarily follows; but if there be no determinate cause, no effect can follow. - The knowledge of an effect depends upon the knowledge of the cause, and includes it .- Things that have nothing in common with each other cannot be understood by means of each other; that is, the conception of one does not include that of the other. - A true idea must agree with its object. of

73. Spinosa proceeds to his demonstrations upon the basis of these assumptions alone. Two substances, having different attributes, have nothing in common with each other; and hence one cannot be the cause of the other, since one may be

Per substantiam intelligo id quod in se est, et per se cone patur; hoc est, id espis conceptus non-indiget conceptus alternas rei, a quo formari debest. The last words are omitted by opinosa in a letter to De Vices (p. 468.), where he repeats this definition.

^{*} Per attributum intelligo id quod intel estas de substantia pere pit, lanquam ejusiem essentiam constituens.

[†] Per modern sets less substantes affectiones sers als qued in also est, per qued c iam concepitur

⁶ Per Deum intelligo Ens absoluto infinitum, los est, arbeitantium constantium constantium constantium enfinitus attribués querum unconceptual. Theo also late infiniture, non autem a suo genere, querquel entre in au genere tantum infinitum est, infinita de constrabili negare pessadius, quod autem absolute infinitum est, ad que constantium peritate, querquol exact sum experiment at negationemism um involvit.

Axioxasta, m, m, v, and m.

conceived without involving the conception of the other; but an effect cannot be conceived without involving the knowledge of the cause." It seems to be in this fourth axiom, and in the proposition grounded upon it, that the fundamental fallacy lurks. The relation between a cause and effect is surely something different from our perfect comprehension of it, or indeed from our having any knowledge of it at all; much less can the contrary assertion be decided axiomatic. But if we should concede this postulate, it might perhaps be very difficult to resist the subsequent proofs, so ingeniously and with such geometrical rigour are they arranged.

74. Two or more things cannot be distinguished, except by the diversity of their attributes, or by that of their modes. For there is nothing out of ourselves except substances and their modes. But there cannot be two substances of the same attribute, since there would be no means of distinguishing them except their modes or affections; and every substance, being prior in order of time to its modes, may be considered independently of them; hence two such substances could not be distinguished at all. One substance therefore cannot be the cause of another; for they cannot have the same attribute, that is, any thing in common with one another, ! Every substance therefore is self-caused; that is, its essence implies its existence. I It is also necessarily infinite, for it would otherwise be terminated by some other of the same nature and necessarily existing; but two substances cannot have the same attribute, and therefore cannot both possess necessary existence. § The more reality or existence any being possesses, the more attributes are to be ascribed to it. This he says appears by the definition of an attribute. The proof however is surely not manifest, nor do we clearly apprehend what he meant by degrees of reality or existence. But of this theorem he was very proud, I look upon the demonstration, he says in a letter, as capital (palmariam), that the more attributes we ascribe to any being, the more we are compelled to acknowledge its existence; that is, the more we conceive it as true and not a mere chimera. And [·] Prop. ti. and iti.

[†] Prop. vi. † Prop. vii.

⁶ Prop. viii.

Prop. ix. P 463. This is in the letter to Do Vries, above quoted, from this he derived the real existence of God, though the former proof seems collateral to it. God, or a substance consisting of infinite attributes, each expressing an eternal and infinite power, necessarily exists. For such an essence involves existence. And, besides this, if any thing does not exist, a cause must be given for its non-existence, since this requires one as much as existence itself.† The cause may be either in the nature of the thing, as, e. gr. a square circle cannot exist by the circle's nature, or in something extrinsic. But neither of these can prevent the existence of God. The later propositions in Spinosa are chiefly obvious corollaries from the definitions and a few of the first propositions which contain the whole theory, which he proceeds to expand.

75. There can be no substance but God. Whatever is, is in God, and nothing can be conceived without God. t For he is the sole substance, and modes cannot be conceived without a substance; but besides substance and mode nothing exists. God is not corporeal, but body is a mode of God, and therefore uncreated. God is the permanent, but not the transient cause of all things. § He is the efficient cause of their essence, as well as their existence, since otherwise their essence might be conceived without God, which has been shown to be absurd. Thus particular things are but the affections of God's attributes, or modes in which they are determinately expressed.

76. This pantheistic scheme is the fruitful mother of many paradoxes, upon which Spinosa proceeds to dwell. There is no contingency, but every thing is determined by the necessity of the divine nature, both as to its existence and operation; nor could any thing be produced by God otherwise than as it is. This power is the same as his essence; for be is the necessary cause both of himself and of all things, and it is as impossible for us to conceive him not to act as not to exist.  God, considered in the attributes of his inf If twenty men exist, nother more not less, an extrinsic reason must be given for this precise number, since the defeat on of a man does not involve it.

Prop. vl.

Prop. viii. Schol. ii.

Prop. xiv

⁵ Deus est omnium rerum cause immanena, sed non transiera. Prop. xvni.

Prop. xxx and coroll

Trop. xxix—xxvia.
Prop. xxxix., and part ii. prop. lic. Schol.

finite substance, is the same as nature, that is, natura naturals; but nature, in another sense, or natura naturata, expresses but the modes under which the divine attributes appear. And intelligence, considered in act, even though infinite, should be referred to natura naturata; for intelligence, in this sense, is but a mode of thinking, which can only be conceived by means of our conception of thinking in the abstract, that is, by an attribute of God.† The faculty of thinking, as distinguished from the act, as also those of desiring, loving, and the rest, Spinosa explicitly denies to exist at all.

77. In an appendix to the first chapter, De Deo, Spinosa controverts what he calls the prejudice about final causes. Men are born ignorant of causes, but merely conscious of their own appetites, by which they desire their own good. Hence they only care for the final cause of their own actions or those of others, and inquire no farther when they are eatisfied about these. And finding many things in themselves and in nature, serving as means to a certain good, which things they know not to be provided by themselves, they have believed that some one has provided them, arguing from the analogy of the means which they in other instances themselves employ. Hence they have imagined gods, and these gods they suppose to consult the good of men in order to be worshipped by them, and have devised every mode of superstitious devotion to insure the favour of these divinities, And finding in the midst of so many beneficial things in nature not a few of an opposite effect, they have ascribed them to the anger of the gods on account of the neglect of men to worship them; nor has experience of calamities falling alike on the pious and impious cured them of this belief, choosing rather to acknowledge their ignorance of the reason why good and evil are thus distributed, than to give up their theory. Spinosa thinks the hypothesis of final causes refuted by his proposition that all things happen by eternal necessity. Moreover, if God were to act for an end, he must desire something which he wants; for it is acknowledged by theo-

Schol, in prop. 2212.
 Prop. 2221.
 Prop. 2221.
 The atheeun of Spination.

logians that he acts for his own sake, and not for the sake of things created,

78. Men having satisfied themselves that all things were created for them, have invented names to distinguish that as good which tends to their benefit; and believing themselves free, have gotten the notions of right and wrong, praise and dispraise. And when they can easily apprehend and recollect the relatious of things, they call them well ordered, if not, ill ordered; and then say that God created all things in order, as if order were any thing except in regard to our imagination of it; and thus they ascribe imagination to God himself, unless they mean that he created things for the sake of our imagining them.

79. It has been sometimes doubted whether the Spinosistic philosophy excludes altogether an infinite intelligence. That it rejected a moral providence or creative mind is manifest in every proposition. His Deity could at most be but a cold passive intelligence, lost to our understandings and feelings in its metaphysical infinity. It was not however in fact so much as this. It is true that in a few passages we find what seems at first a dim recognition of the fundamental principle of theism. In one of his letters to Oldenburg, he asserts an infinite power of thinking, which considered in its infinity, embraces all nature as its object, and of which the thoughts proceed according to the order of nature, being its correlative ideas. But afterwards he rejected the term, power of thinking, altogether. The first proposition of the second part of the Ethics, or that entitled On the Mind, runs thus: Thought is an attribute of God, or, God is a thinking being. Yet this, when we look at the demonstration, vanishes in an abstraction destructive of personality.† And in fact we can-wrought himself up, like Bruno, to a mystical personification of his infinite

+ Singulares cogitationes, sive line et illa cogitatio, modi sunt, qui Dei naturam certo et determinato modo expriment. Competit orgo Dei attributum, cujus conceptain angulares omnes cogitationisi involvant, per quod cham concip untur, Est igitur cogalatio unim ex infinitiv Der attributis quod Der sternam et infinitam quantiam exprimit, aire Done est res cogatans.

[·] Statuo dare in natura potentiam infinitam cognandi qua quatema mănits in se continct totain naturam objective, et cupus eeg tationes proceduit edictum, p. 441. In another place he says, perhaps at some expense of his usual candaux, Agnosco interam, id quod aummam mile probet satisfactionem et mentes tranquilidatem, consta potentia Entreaumma perfects et epus immitabili eta fieri decreto, p. 658. What follows is in the same strain. But Spinosa had not reflect at all on the propositions already laid down by Spinosa, without perceiving that they annihilate every possible hypothesis in which the being of a God can be intelligibly stated.

80. The second book of the Ethics begins, like the first, with definitions and axioms. Body he defines to be a certain and determinate mode expressing the essence of God, considered as extended. The essence of any thing he defines to be that, according to the affirmation or negation of which the thing exists or otherwise. An idea is a conception which the mind forms as a thinking being. And he would rather say conception than perception, because the latter seems to imply the presence of an object. In the third axiom he says, Modes of thinking, such as love, desire, or whatever name we may give to the affections of the mind, cannot exist without an idea of their object, but an idea may exist with no other mode of thinking." And in the fifth: We perceive no singular things besides bodies and modes of thinking; thus distinguishing, like Locke, between ideas of sensation and of reflection.

81. Extension, by the second proposition, is an attribute of God as well as thought. As it follows from the infinite extension of God, that all bodies are portions of his substance, inasmuch as they cannot be conceived without it, so all particular acts of intelligence are portions of God's infinite intelligence, and thus all things are in him. Man is not a substance, but something which is in God, and cannot be conceived without him; that is, an affection or mode of the divine substance expressing its nature in a determinate manner. The human mind is not a substance, but an idea constitutes its actual being, and it must be the idea of an existing thing. In this he plainly loses sight of the percipient in the perception; but it was the inevitable result of the fundamental sophisms of Spinosa to annihilate personal constituit, nihil aliud est quam idea rei aliculus ingularis actu existentis. This is an articipation of what we find in Hume's Treatise on Homan Nature, the negation of a substance, or Ego, to which paradox no one can come except a professed metaphysician.

Modi cogitandi, ut amor, cupiditas, vel quocunque comuse affectus an mi insignicantur, non dantur use na codem in inviduo detur idea rei annass; desideratis, de. At idea dari potest, quamvis nullus alius detur cogitandi inodus.

[†] Prop x.

¹ Quod actuale mento humana case consciousness. The human mind, he afterwards asserts, is part of the infinite intellect of God; and when we say, the mind perceives this or that, it is only that God, not as infinite, but so far as he constitutes the essence of the human mind, has such or such ideas.

82. The object of the human mind is body actually existing.† He proceeds to explain the connexion of the human body with the mind, and the association of ideas, But in all this advancing always synthetically and by demonstration, he becomes frequently obscure if not sophistical. The idea of the human mind is in God, and is united to the mind itself in the same manner as the latter is to the body. I The obscurity and subtilty of this proposition are not relieved by the demonstration; but in some of these passages we may observe a singular approximation to the theory of Malebranche. Both, though with very different tenets on the highest subjects, had been trained in the same school; and if Spinosa had brought himself to acknowledge the personal distinctness of the Supreme Being from his intelligent creation, he might have passed for one of those mystical theosophists, who were not averse to an objective pantheism.

83. The mind does not know itself, except so far as it receives ideas of the affections of the body. 5 But these ideas of sensation do not give an adequate knowledge of an external body, nor of the human body itself. The mind therefore has but an inadequate and confused knowledge of any thing, so long as it judges only by fortuitous perceptions; but may attain one clear and distinct by internal reflection and comparison. No positive idea can be called false; for there can be no such idea without God, and all ideas in God are true. that is, correspond with their object.  Falsity therefore consists in that privation of truth, which arises from inadequate ideas. An adequate idea he has defined to be one which contains no incompatibility, without regard to the reality of its supposed correlative object.

codem mode umits est monti, ur ipsa mous unus out corpori.

[·] Prop. zi., escoll.

⁺ Prop. int.

Mentis husaanse datur etiam in Doo idea, sire cognitto, que in Deo codem medo sequitar, et ad Deum codem modo referiur, se idea sive cognitio curporis humans. Prop. xx. Hwe mentiv idea Frop. sav.

[¶] Schol., prop. xxxx
 Prop. xxxx, xxxxx xxxx.

84. All bodies agree in some things, or have something in common: of these all men have adequate ideas *; and this is the origin of what are called common notious, which all men possess; as extension, duration, number. But to explain the nature of universals, Spinosa observes, that the human body can only form at the same time a certain number of distinct images; if this number be exceeded, they become confused; and as the mind perceives distinctly just so many images as can be formed in the body, when these are confused, the mind will also perceive them confusedly, and will comprehend them under one attribute, as Man, Horse, Dog; the mind perceiving a number of such images, but not their differences of stature, colours, and the like. And these notions will not be alike in all minds, varying according to the frequency with which the parts of the complex image have occurred. Thus those who have contemplated most frequently the erect figure of man will think of him as a perpendicular animal, others as two-legged, others as unfeathered, others as rational. Hence so many disputes among philosophers who have tried to explain natural things by mere images.†

85. Thus we form universal ideas; first by singulars, represented by the senses confusedly, imperfectly, and disorderly; secondly, by signs, that is, by associating the remembrance of things with words; both of which he calls imagination, or primi generis cognitio; thirdly, by what he calls reason, or secundi generis cognitio; and fourthly, by intuitive knowledge, or tertii generis cognitio.1 Knowledge of the first kind, or imagination, is the only source of error; the second and third being necessarily true. § These alone enable us to distinguish truth from falsehood. Reason contemplates things not as contingent but necessary; and whoever has a true idea, knows certainly that his idea is true. Every idea of a singular existing thing involves the eternal and infinite being of God. For nothing can be conceived without God, and the ideas of all things, having God for their cause, considered under the attribute of which they are modes, must involve the conception of the attribute, that is, the being of God.

Prop vni.
 Schol, prop. xl.

¹ Schol ii., prop. xl. 5 Prop. xh, xhi. et sequent.

86. It is highly necessary to distinguish images, ideas, and words, which many confound. Those who think ideas consist in images which they perceive, fancy that ideas of which we can form no image are but arbitrary figments. They look at ideas, as pictures on a tablet, and hence do not understand that an idea, as such, involves an affirmation or negation. And those who confound words with ideas, fancy they can will something contrary to what they perceive, because they can affirm or deny it in words. But these prejudices will be laid aside by him who reflects that thought does not involve the conception of extension; and therefore that an idea, being a mode of thought, neither consists in images nor in words, the essence of which consists in corporeal motions, not involving the conception of thought.†

87. The human mind has an adequate knowledge of the eternal and infinite being of God. But men cannot imagine God as they can bodies, and hence have not that clear perception of his being which they have of that of bodies, and have also perplexed themselves by associating the word God with sensible images, which it is hard to avoid. This is the chief source of all error, that men do not apply names to things rightly. For they do not err in their own minds, but in this application; as men who cast up wrong see different numbers in their minds from those in the true result?

88. The mind has no free will, but is determined by a cause, which itself is determined by some other, and so for ever. For the mind is but a mode of thinking, and therefore cannot be the free cause of its own actions. Nor has it any absolute faculty of loving, desiring, understanding; these being only metaphysical abstractions. Will and understanding are one and the same thing; and volitions are only affirmations or negations, each of which belongs to the essence of the idea affirmed or denied. In this there seems to be not only an extraordinary deviation from common lan-

[·] Prop. xlv.

[†] Schol. prop. xlix.

Prop xiv. Atque hine pleasque octuntur controversue, nempe, quis bomanes mentem anam non rocte explaint, vel quia alterim mentem male interpre-

⁹ Prop. zlvini. 1 Prop. zlvz.

guage, but an absence of any meaning which, to my apprehension at least, is capable of being given to his words. Yet we have seen something of the same kind said by Malebranche; and it will also be found in a recently published work of Cudworth *, a writer certainly uninfluenced by either of these, so that it may be suspected of having some older authority.

89. In the third part of this treatise, Spinosa comes to the consideration of the passions. Most who have spinosa's written on moral subjects, he says, have rather treated man as something out of nature, or as a linear and kind of imperium in imperio, than as part of the general order. They have conceived him to enjoy a power of disturbing that order by his own determination, and ascribed his weakness and inconstancy not to the necessary laws of the system, but to some strange defect in himself, which they cease not to lament, deride, or execute. But the acts of mankind, and the passions from which they proceed, are in reality but links in the series, and proceed in harmony with the common laws of universal nature.

90. We are said to act when any thing takes place within us, or without us, for which we are an adequate cause; that is, when it may be explained by means of our own nature alone. We are said to be acted upon, when any thing takes place within us which cannot wholly be explained by our own nature. The affections of the body which increase or diminish its power of action, and the ideas of those affections, he denominates passions (affectus). Neither the body can determine the mind to thinking, nor can the mind determine the body to motion or rest. For all that takes place in body must be caused by God, considered under his attribute of extension, and all that takes place in mind must be caused by God under his attribute of thinking. The mind and body are but one thing, considered under different attributes; the order of action and passion in the body being the same in nature with that of action and passion in the mind. But men, though ignorant how far the natural powers of the body reach, ascribe its operations to the determination of the mind, veiling their ignorance in specious words. For if they allege

See Codworth's Treative on Free- understanding are purposely, and, 1 will (1839), p. 20., where the wall and think, very erroneously confounded.
VOL, 111.

that the body cannot act without the mind, it may be unswered that the mind cannot think till it is impelled by the body, nor are the volitions of the mind any thing else than its appetites, which are modified by the body.

91. All things endeavour to continue in their actual being; this endeavour being nothing else than their essence, which causes them to be, until some exterior cause destroys their being. The mind is conscious of its own endeayour to continue as it is, which is in other words the appetite that seeks self-preservation; what the mind is thus conscious of seeking, it judges to be good, and not inversely. Many things increase or diminish the power of action in the body, and all such things have a corresponding effect on the power of thinking in the mind. Thus it undergoes many changes, and passes through different stages of more or less perfect power of thinking. Joy is the name of a passion, in which the mind passes to a greater perfection or power of thinking; grief, one in which it passes to a less. Spinosa, in the rest of this book, deduces all the passions from these two and from desire; but as the development of his theory is rather long, and we have already seen that its basis is not quite intelligible, it will be unnecessary to dwell longer upon the subject. His analysis of the passions may be compared with that of Hobbes.

92. Such is the metaphysical theory of Spinosa, in as Character of concise a form as I have found myself able to derive it from his Ethics. It is a remarkable proof, and his moral system will furnish another, how an undeviating adherence to strict reasoning may lead a man of great acuteness and sincerity from the paths of truth. Spinosa was truly, what Voltaire has with rather less justice called Clarke, a reasoning machine. A few leading theorems, too hastily taken up as axiomatic, were sufficient to make him sacrifice, with no compromise or hesitation, not only every principle of religion and moral right, but the clear intuitive notions of common sense. If there are two axioms more indisputable than any others, they are that ourselves exist, and that our existence, simply considered, is independent of any other Yet both these are lost in the pantheism of Spinosa, as they had always been in that delusive reverie of the imagination. In asserting that the being of the human mind consists in the idea of an existing thing presented to it, this subtle metaphysician fell into the error of the school which he most disdained, as deriving all knowledge from perception, that of the Aristotelians. And, extending this confusion of consciousness with perception to the infinite substance, or substratum of particular ideas, he was led to deny it the self, or conscious personality, without which the name of Deity can only be given in a sense deceptive of the careless reader, and inconsistent with the use of language. It was an equally legitimate consequence of his original sophism to deny all moral agency, in the sense usually received, to the human mind, and even, as we have seen, to confound action and passion themselves, in all but name, as mere phænomena in the eternal sequence of things.

93. It was one great error of Spinosa to entertain too arrogant a notion of the human faculties, in which, by dint of his own subtle demonstrations, he pretended to show a capacity of adequately comprehending the nature of what he denominated God. And this was accompanied by a rigid dogmatism, no one proposition being stated with hesitation, by a disregard of experience, at least as the basis of reasoning, and by an uniform preference of the synthetic method. Most of those, he says, who have turned their minds to those subjects have fallen into error, because they have not begun with the contemplation of the Divine nature, which both in itself and in order of knowledge is first, but with sensible things, which ought to have been last. Hence he seems to have reckoned Bacon, and even Descartes, mistaken in their methods.

94. All pantheism must have originated in overstraining the infinity of the divine attributes till the moral part of religion was annihilated in its metaphysics. It was the corruption, or rather, if we may venture the phrase, the suicide of theism; nor could this theory have arisen, except where we know it did arise, among those who had elevated their conceptions above the vulgar polytheism that surrounded them to a sense of the unity of the Divine nature.

95. Spinosa does not essentially differ from the pantheists of old. He conceived, as they had done, that the infinity of God required the exclusion of all other substance; that he was infinite ab omni parte, and not only in certain senses. And probably the loose and hyperbolical tenets of the schoolmen, derived from ancient philosophy, ascribing, as a matter of course, a metaphysical infinity to all the divine attributes, might appear to sanction those primary positions, from which Spinosa, unfettered by religion, even in outward profession, went on "sounding his dim and perilous track" to the paradoxes that have thrown discredit on his name. He had certainly built much on the notion that the essence or definition of the Deity involved his actuality or existence, to which Descartes had given vogue.

90. Notwithstanding the leading errors of this philosopher, his clear and acute understanding perceived many things which baffle ordinary minds. Thus he well saw and well stated the immateriality of thought. Oldenburg, in one of his letters, had demurred to this, and reminded Spinosa that it was still controverted whether thought might not be a bodily motion. "Be it so," replied the other, "though I am far from admitting it; but at least you must allow that extension, so far as extension, is not the same as thought." . It is from inattention to this simple truth that all materialism, as it has been called, has sprung. Its advocates confound the union between thinking and extension or matter (be it, if they will, an indissoluble one) with the identity of the two, which is absurd and inconceivable. "Body," says Spinosa, in one of his definitions, "is not terminated by thinking, nor thinking by body." † This also does not ill express the fundamental difference of matter and mind; there is an incommensurability about them, which prevents one from bounding the other, because they can never be placed in juxta-position.

97. England, about the era of the Restoration, began to make a struggle against the metaphysical creed of the Aristotelians, as well as against their natural philosophy. A remarkable work, but one so scarce

^{*} At ais, ferto cogstatio est actus corporter but, sure everyon conceiling, and for the marketable, extends into nem. I push iv.

if Corpus dicitur finitum, quia alied nemper mains rooten miss. Sie cognition no occupante terminatur. At corpus quotal extensioners, con con cognition and terminatur cognitione, nee cognition as to be hardly known at all, except by name, was published by Glanvil in 1661, with the title The Vanity of Dogmatizing. A second edition, in 1665, considerably altered, is entitled Scepsis Scientifica.* This edition has a dedication to the Royal Society, which comes in place of a fanciful preface, wherein he had expatiated on the bodily and mental perfections of his protoplast, the father of mankind. + But in proportion to the extravagant language he employs to extol Adam before his lapse, is the depreciation of his unfortunate posterity, not, as common among theologians, with respect to their moral nature, but to their reasoning faculties. scheme of Glanvil's book is to display the ignorance of man, and especially to censure the Peripatetic philosophy of the schools. It is, he says, captious and verbal, and yet does not adhere itself to any constant sense of words, but huddles together insignificant terms, and unintelligible definitions; it deals with controversies, and seeks for no new discovery or physical truth. Nothing, he says, can be demonstrated but when the contrary is impossible, and of this there are not many instances. He launches into a strain of what may be called scepticism, but answered his purpose in combating the dogmatic spirit still unconquered in our academical schools. Glanvil had studied the new philosophy, and speaks with ardent culogy of " that miracle of men, the illustrious Descartes." Many, if not most, of his own speculations are tinged with a Cartesian colouring. He was, however, far more sceptical than Descartes, or even than Malebranche. Some passages from so rare and so acute a work may deserve to be chosen, both for their own sakes, and in order

This book, I believe, especially in the second edition, in exceedingly scarce. The cilitors, however, of the Biographia Britansica, art. General, had seen it, and also Dugdid Stewart. The first edition, or Varity of Dogmatizing, is in the Bellevin Catalogue, and both are in the British Museum.

[†] Ibus, among other extravagances worthy of the Talmud, he says, "Adam needed no specialists. The acutezzas of his natural optics (if conjecture maj have credit at seed but in the of the celestial magnificence and bravery without a Galdeo's tube, and it is most probable that his resked ever could reach turn as much of this apper world as we with all the advantages of are. It may be it was as absord even in the judgment of his senses, that the sun and stars thould be so very much like those that globe, as the contant sense in ours, and it is rest ordisely that be had as clear a perception of it, earth's to turn to we have or its quiescence." p. 5, ed. 1661. In the second old, o., b. shift atheres to the hypothesis of the located degeneracy, but states it with less of chapsody.

to display the revolution which was at work in speculative philosophy.

98. "In the unious which we understand the extremes are reconciled by interceding participations of natures, which have somewhat of either. But body and spirit stand at such a distance in their essential compositions, that to suppose an uniter of a middle construction that should partake of some of the qualities of both, is unwarranted by any of our faculties, yea most absonous to our reasons; since there is not any the least affinity betwixt length, breadth, and thickness, and apprehension, judgment, and discourse; the former of which are the most immediate results, if not essentials of matter, the latter of spirit." .

99. " How is it, and by what art does it (the soul) read that such an image or stroke in matter (whether that of her vehicle or of the brain, the case is the same,) signifies such an object? Did we learn an alphabet in our embryo state? And how comes it to pass that we are not aware of any such congenite apprehensions? We know what we know; but do we know any more? That by diversity of motions we should spell out figures, distances, magnitudes, colours, things not resembled by them, we must attribute to some secret deduction. But what this deduction should be, or by what medium this knowledge is advanced, is as dark as ignorance. One that hath not the knowledge of letters may see the figures, but comprehends not the meaning included in them; an infant may hear the sounds and see the motion of the lips, but hath no conception conveyed by them, not knowing what they are intended to signify. So our souls, though they might have perceived the motions and images themselves by simple sense, yet without some implicit inference it seems inconceivable how by that means they should apprehend their antitypes. The striking of divers filaments of the brain cannot well be supposed to represent distances, except some kind of inference be allotted us in our faculties; the concession of which will only stead us as a refuge for ignorance, when we shall meet what we would seem to shun." t

+ P. 22, 23

^{*} Scepsis Scientifica, p. 16. We have just wen something similar in Spinous

Glanvil, in this forcible statement of the beterogeneity of sensations with the objects that suggest them, has but trod in the steps of the whole Cartesian school, but he did not mix this up with those crude notions that half half way between immaterialism and its opposite; and afterwards well exposes the theories of accounting for the memory by means of images in the brain, which, in various ways, Aristotle, Descartes, Digby, Gassendi, and Hobbes had propounded, and which we have seen so favourite a speculation of Malebranche.

100. It would be easy to quote many paragraphs of aucommon vivacity and acuteness from this forgotten treatise. The style is eminently sprited and eloquent; a little too figurative, like that of Locke, but less blameably, because Glanvil is rather destroying than building up. Every bold and original thought of others finds a willing reception in Glanvil's mind, and his confident impetuous style gives them an air of novelty which makes them pass for his own. He stands forward as a mutineer against authority, against educational prejudice, against reverence for antiquity. No one thanks more intrepidly for himself; and it is probable that, even in what seems mere superstition, he had been rather misled by some paradoxical hypothesis of his own ardent genius, than by slavishly treading in the steps of others, †

101. Glanvil sometimes quotes Lord Bacon, but he seems to have had the ambition of contending with the Novum Or-be learned from an index, and a poor ambilion to be tich in the inventory of anothers treasure. To beast a memory, the most that these polarits can aim at, is but a bumble estentation." p. 104.

^{*}Now if we inquire the reason why the mathematics and mechanic aris have so much got the start in grawth of other sciences, we stall find it probably resolved into this as one considerable cause, that their progress hath not been retarded by that receiveful asse of former discoveries, which both here so great a bandarice to theorical improvements.
For, as the noble Lord Verulam bath noted, we have a mistaken apprehension of antiquity, calling that so which in truth is the world's non-age. Arisquitus assecult est preenting mind. Twas this vain idoaring of authors which gave birth to that stilly vacuity of impertanent citations, and including authority in things mitter requiring nor deserving it — Methinks it as putiful piece of knowledge that can important the most that its but a bundle though
the most that it is but a hundred
the though
the most that it
but the most that it
but hought important the though important to
the though
the most that it
but hough important to
the though
the most that it but no be another's treasure
the most that it
but hough important to
the though
the most that it
but hough important to
the though
the though
the most of former discoveries, which have a operation to though important to the the most that it
but hough important to
the though
the though
the though
the most that it
but hough important to the that it is but a hundre that the though
the most of former discoveries, which hath here to great
the most that it
but hough important to
the though
the though
the most of former discoveries, which hath here to great
the most of former discoveries, which hath here to great
the most of former discoveries, which hath here to great
the most of former discoveries, which hath here to great
the most of the most of former discoveries, which is but hough important to the most of the most of former discoveries, which is but hough
the though
the most of former discoveries, which is but hough
the most of former discoveries, which is but hough
the though
the most of the most of former discove

is but a humble estentation." p. 104.

† "That the fancy of one man should bind the thoughts of another and determine them to their particular objects will be thought impossible, which yet, if we look deeply into the matter, wante not its probability." p. 146. He dwells more on this, but the passage is too long to extract. It is committable that be supposes a solute other (like that of the modern Messierists), to be the medium of communication to such eases; and had also a notion of explaining these sympathics by help of the anima mundi, or mundaine spirit.

ganum in some of his brilliant passages, and has really developed the doctrine of idols with uncommon penetration, as well as force of language. " Our initial age is like the melted wax to the prepared seal, capable of any impression from the documents of our teachers. The half-moon or cross are indifferent to its reception; and we may with equal facility write on this rasa tabula Turk or Christian. To determine this indifferency our first task is to learn the creed of our country, and our next to maintain it. We seldom examine our receptions, more than children do their catechisms, but by a careless greediness swallow all at a venture. For implicit faith is a virtue, where orthodoxy is the object, Some will not be at the trouble of a trial, others are scared from attempting it. If we do, 'tis not by a sun-beam or ray of light, but by a flame that is kindled by our affectious, and fed by the fuel of our anticipations. And thus, like the hermit, we think the sun shines no where but in our cell, and all the world to be darkness but ourselves. We judge truth to be circumscribed by the confines of our belief and the doctrines we were brought up in." * Few books, I think, are more deserving of being reprinted than the Scepsia Scientifica of Glanvil.

102. Another bold and able attack was made on the ancient philosophy by Glanvil in his "Plus Ultra, or the Progress and Advancement of Knowledge since the Days of Aristotle, 1668." His tone is peremptory and imposing, animated and intrepid, such as befits a warrior in literature. Yet he was rather acute by nature, than deeply versed in learning, and talks of Vieta and Descartes's algebra so as to show he had little knowledge of the science, or of what they had done for it. † His animosity against Aristotle is unreasonable, and he was plainly an incompetent judge of that philosopher's general deserts. Of Bacon and Boyle he speaks with just eulogy. Nothing can be more free and hold than Glanvil's assertion of the privilege of judging for himself in religion 1; and he had doubtless a perfect right to believe in witchcraft.

103. George Dalgarno, a native of Aberdeen, conceived and, as it seemed to him, carried into effect the idea of an universal language and character. His Ars Signorum, vulgo Character Universalis et Lingua Philosoplaca, Lond. 1661, is dedicated to Charles II. in this philosophical character, which must have been as great a mystery to the sovereign as to his subjects. This dedication is followed by a royal proclamation in good English, inviting all to study this useful art, which had been recommended by divers learned men, Wilkins, Wallis, Ward, and others, "judging it to be of singular use for facilitating the matter of communication and intercourse between people of different languages." The scheme of Dalgarno is fundamentally had, in that he assumes himself, or the authors he follows, to have given a complete distribution of all things and ideas; after which his language is only an artificial scheme of symbols. It is evident that until objects are truly classified, a representative method of signs can only rivet and perpetuate error. We have but to look at his tabular synopsis to see that his ignorance of physics, in the largest sense of the word, renders his scheme deficient; and he has also committed the error of adopting the combinations of the ordinary alphabet, with a little help from the Greek, which, even with his slender knowledge of species, soon leave him incapable of expressing them. But Dalgarno has several acute remarks: and it deserves especially to be observed, that he anticipated the famous discovery of the Dutch philologers, namely, that all other parts of speech may be reduced to the noun, dexterously, if not successfully, resolving the verb-substantive into an affirmative particle.

104. Wilkins, Bishop of Chester, one of the most ingenious men of his age, published in 1668 his Essay towards a Philosophical Language, which has this

The verb-substantive, he says, is equivalent to sta. Thus, Petrus est in do no, menny, Petrus — its — in do no. That is, it expresses an idea of apposition or conformity between a subject and predicate. This is a theory to which a manimish belief by the label of considering propositions log cally, and thus reducing all verbs to the verb-substantive, and it is not deficient, at least, in plausibility.

^{*} Turdem with affoliat clarior fux; accutation cornectmentando occurrent particular to accuming the particular and particular and the control of the particular cost vere costs see modes restricted a control of the decision of the particular cost vere costs see modes restricted at the conclusion by the obligated analysis, but by his own logical theories.

advantage over that of Dalgarno, that it abandons the alphabet, and consequently admits of a greater variety of characters. It is not a new language, but a more analytical scheme of characters for English. Dalgarno scems to have known something of it, though he was the first to publish, and glances at "a more difficult way of writing English." Wilkins also intimates that Dalgarno's compendious method would not succeed. His own has the same fault of a premature classification of things; and it is very fortunate that neither of these ingenious but presumptuous attempts to fasten down the progressive powers of the human mind by the cramps of association had the least success."

105. But from these partial and now very obscure endeayours of English writers in metaphysical philosophy Underwe come at length to the work that has eclipsed every other, and given to such inquiries whatever popularity they ever possessed, the Esssay of Locke on the Human Understanding. Neither the writings of Descartes, as I conceive, nor perhaps those of Hobbes, so far as strictly metaphysical, had excited much attention in England beyond the class of merely studious men. But the Essay on Human Understanding was frequently reprinted within a few years from its publication, and became the acknowledged code of English philosophy.† The assaults it had to endure in the author's lifetime, being deemed to fail, were of service to its reputation; and considerably more than half a century was afterwards to elapse before any writer in our language (nor was the case very different in France, after the patronage accorded to it by Voltaire) could with much chance of success question any leading doctrine of its author.

and Locke, as is well known, asswered the barhop. I do not know that the latter makes altogether so poor a figure as his been taken for granted; but the defines of Locke will seem in most instance a satisfactory. Its success in public opinion contributed much to the renown of his work, for Still regime, though not at all conspicuous as a ph baopher, only yed a great deal of reputation, and the world can scident understand why a man who excels in one province of intersture should fail in another.

[•] Dalgarno, many years afterwards, turned his attention to a subject of no slight interest, even in mere philosophy, the intraction of the deaf and domb. His Didascalocophias is perhaps the first attempt to found this on the analysis of language. But it is not so philosophical as what has since been effected.

[†] It was abridged at Oxford, and used by some tictors as early as 1695. But the heads of the university come afterwards to a resolution to discourage the reading of it. Strikingflest, among many others, wrote against the Essay;

Several circumstances no doubt conspired with its intrinsic excellence to establish so paramount a rule in an age that boasted of peculiar independence of thinking, and full of intelligent and inquisitive spirits. The sympathy of an English public with Locke's tenets as to government and religion was among the chief of these; and the re-action that took place in a large portion of the reading classes towards the close of the eighteenth century turned in some measure the tide even in metaphysical disquisition. It then became fashionable sometimes to accuse Locke of preparing the way for scepticism; a charge which, if it had been truly applicable to some of his opinions, ought rather to have been made against the long line of earlier writers with whom he hold them in common; sometimes, with more pretence, to allege that he had conceded too much to materialism; sometimes to point out and exaggerate other faults and errors of his Essay, till we have seemed in danger of forgetting that it is perhaps the first, and still the most complete chart of the human mind which has been laid down, the most ample repertory of truths relating to our intellectual being, and the one book which we are still compelled to name as the most important in metaphysical science. Locke had not, it may be said, the luminous perspicacity of language we find in Descartes, and, when he does not soar too high, in Malebranche; but he had more judgment, more caution, more patience, more freedom from paradox, and from the sources of paradox, vanity and love of system, than either. We have no denial of sensation to brutes, no reference of mathematical truths to the will of God, no oscillation between the extremes of doubt and of positiveness, no bewildering mysticism, no unintelligible chaos of words. Certainly neither Gassendi nor even Hobbes could be compared with him; and it might be asked of the admirers of later philosophers, those of Berkeley, or Hume, or Hartley, or Reid, or Stewart, or Brown, without naming any on the continent of Europe, whether in the extent of their researches, or in the originality of their discoveries, any of these names ought to stand on a level with that of Locke. One of the greatest whom I have mentioned, and one who, though candid towards Locke, had no prejudice whatever in his favour, has extelled the first two books of the Essay on Human Understanding, which yet he deems in many respects inferior to the third and fourth, as "a precious accession to the theory of the human mind; as the richest contribution of well-observed and well-described facts which was ever bequeathed by a single individual; and as the indisputable, though not always acknowledged, source of some of the most refined conclusions with respect to the intellectual placnomena, which have been since brought to light by succeeding inquirers."

106. It would be an unnecessary prolixity to offer in this place an analysis of so well-known a book as the Ita defecta Essay on the Human Understanding. Few have turned their attention to metaphysical inquiries without reading it. It has however no inconsiderable faults, which, though much over-balanced, are not to be passed over in a general eulogy. The style of Locke is wanting in philosophical precision; it is a good model of English language; but too idiomatic and colloquial, too indefinite and figurative, for the abstruse subjects with which he has to deal. We miss in every page the translucent simplicity of his great French predecessors. This seems to have been owing, in a considerable degree, to an excessive desire of popularising the subject, and shunning the technical pedantry which had repelled the world from intellectual philosophy. Locke displays in all his writings a respect which can hardly be too great, for men of sound understanding unprejudiced by authority, mingled with a scorn, perhaps a little exaggerated, of the gown-men or learned world; little suspecting that the same appeal to the people, the same policy of setting up equivocal words and loose notions, called the common sense of mankind, to discomfit subtle reasoning, would afterwards be turned against himself, as it was, very unfairly and unsparingly, by Reid and Beattie. Hence he falls a little into a laxity of phrase, not unusual, and not always important, in popular and practical discourse, but an inevitable source of confusion in the very abstract speculations which his Essay contains. And it may perhaps be suspected, without disparagement to his great powers, that he did not always preserve the atmost distinct-

^{*} Stewart's Preliminary Dissertation to Encycloperdia, part is ness of conception, and was liable, as almost every other metaphysician has been, to be entangled in the ambiguities of language.

107. The leading doctrine of Locke, as is well known, is the derivation of all our ideas from sensation and opposed from reflection. The former present no great difficulty; we know what is meant by the expression; locks but he is not very clear or consistent about the latter. He scens in general to limit the word to the various operations of our own minds in thinking, believing, willing, and so forth. This, as has been shown formerly, is taken from, or at least coincident with, the theory of Gassendi is his Syntagina Philosophicum. It is highly probable that Locke was acquainted with that work; if not immediately, yet through the account of the philosophy of Gassendi, published in English by Dr. Charleton, in 1663, which I have not seen, or through the excellent and copious abridgement of the Syntagma by Bernier. But he does not strictly confine his ideas of reflection to this class. Duration is certainly no mode of thinking; yet the idea of duration is reckoned by Locke among those with which we are furnished by reflection. The same may perhaps be said, though I do not know that be expresses himself with equal clearness, as to his account of several other ideas, which cannot be deduced from external sensation, nor yet can be reckoned modifications or operations of the soul itself; such as number, power, existence.

108. Stewart has been so much struck by this indefiniteness, with which the phrase "ideas of reflection" has been used in the Essay on the Human Understanding, that he "does not think, notwithstanding some casual expressions which may seem to favour the contrary supposition, that Locke would have besitated for a moment to admit, with Cudworth and Price, that the understanding is the source of new ideas." And though some might object that this is too much in opposition, not to casual expressions, but to the whole tenour of Locke's Essay, his language concerning substance almost bears it out. Most of the perplexity which has arisen on this subject, the combate of some metaphysicians with Locke, the portentous errors into which others have been led by want of attention to his language, may be referred to the equivocal meaning of the word idea. The Cartesians understood by this whatever is the object of thought, including an intellection as well as an imagination. By an intellection they meant that which the mind conceives to exist, and to be the subject of knowledge, though it may be unimaginable and incomprehensible. Gassendi and Locke (at least in this part of his essay) limit the word idea to something which the mind sees and grasps as immediately present to it. "That," as Locke not very well expresses it, " which the mind is applied about while thinking being the ideas that are there," Hence he speaks with some ridicule of "men who persuade themselves that they have clear comprehensive ideas of infinity." Such men can hardly have existed; but it is by annexing the epithets clear and comprehensive, that he shows the dispute to be merely verbal. For that we know the existence of infinites as objectively real, and can reason upon them. Locke would not have denied; and it is this knowledge to which others gave the name of idea.

^{*} Prelim. Dissertation

109. The different manner in which this all-important word was understood by philosophers is strikingly shown when they make use of the same illustration. Arnauld, if he is author of L'Art de Penser, mentions the idea of a chiliagou, or figure of 1000 sides, as an instance of the distinction between that which we imagine, and that which we conceive or understand. Locke has employed the same instance to exemplify the difference between clear and obscure ideas. According to the former, we do not imagine a figure with 1000 sides at all; according to the latter, we form a confused image of it. We have an idea of such a figure, it is agreed by both; but in the sense of Arnauld, it is an idea of the understanding alone; in the sense of Locke, it is an idea of sensation, framed, like other complex ideas, by putting together those we have formerly received, though we may never have seen the precise figure. That the word suggests to the mind an image of a polygon with many sides is indubitable; but it is arged by the Cartesians, that as we are wholly incapable of distinguishing the exact number, we cannot be said to have, in Locke's sense of the word, any idea, even an indistinct one, of a figure with 1000 sides; since all we do imagine is a polygon. And it is evident that in geometry we do not reason from the properties of the image, but from those of a figure which the understanding apprehends. Locke, however, who generally preferred a popular meaning to one more metaphysically exact, thought it enough to call this a confused idea. He was not, I believe, conversant with any but elementary geometry. Had he reflected upon that which in his age had made such a wonderful beginning, or even upon the fundamental principles of it, which might be found in Euclid, the theory of infinitesimal quantities, he must, one would suppose, have been more puzzled to apply his narrow definition of an idea. For what image can we form of a differential, which can pretend to represent it in any other sense than as dx represents it, by suggestion, not by resemblance?

110. The case is however much worse when Locke deviates, as in the third and fourth books he constantly does, from this sense that he has put on the word idea, and takes it either in the Cartesian meaning, or in one still more general and popular. Thus, in the excellent chapter on the abuse of words, he insists upon the advantage of using none without clear and distinct ideas; he who does not this "only making a noise without any sense or signification." If we combine this position with that in the second book, that we have no clear and distinct idea of a figure with 1000 sides, it follows, with all the force of syllogism, that we should not argue about a figure of 1000 sides at all, nor, by parity of reason, about many other things of far higher importance. It will be found. I incline to think, that the large use of the word idea for that about which we have some knowledge, without limiting it to what can be imagined, pervades the third and fourth books. Stewart has ingeniously conjectured that they were written before the second, and probably before the mind of Locke had been much turned to the psychological analysis which that contains. It is however certain that in the Treatise upon the Conduct of the Understanding, which was not published till after the Essay, he uses the word idea with full as much latitude as in the third and fourth books of the latter. We cannot, upon the whole, help admitting that the story of a lady who, after the perusal of the Essay on the Haman Understanding, laid it down with a remark, that the book would be perfectly charming were it not for the frequent recurrence of one very hard word, idea, though told, possibly, in ridicule of the fair philosopher, pretty well represents the state of mind in which many at first have found themselves.

111. Locke, as I have just intimated, seems to have possessed but a slight knowledge of geometry; a science which, both from the clearness of the illustrations it affords, and from its admitted efficacy inrendering the logical powers acute and cautious, may be reckoned, without excepting physiology, the most valuable of all to the metaphysician. But it did not require any geometrical knowledge, strictly so called, to avoid one material error into which he has fallen; and which I mention the rather, because even Descartes, in one place, has said something of the same kind; and I have met with it not only in Norris very distinctly and positively, but, more or less, in many or most of those who have treated of the metaphysics or abstract principles of geometry. "I doubt not," says Locke , " but it will be easily granted that the knowledge we have of mathematical truths is not only certain but real knowledge, and not the bare empty vision of vain insignificant chimeras of the brain; and yet if we well consider, we shall find, that it is only of our own ideas. The mathematician considers the truth and properties belonging to a rectangle or circle only as they are in idea in his own mind; for it is possible he never found either of them existing mathematically, that is, precisely true, in his life, All the discourses of the mathematicians about the squaring of a circle, come sections, or any other part of mathematics, concern not the existence of any of those figures; but their demonstrations, which depend on their ideas, are the same, whether there be any square or circle in the world or no." And the inference he draws from this is, that moral as well as mathematical ideas, being archetypes themselves, and so adequate and complete ideas, all the agreement or disagreement which he shall find in them will produce real knowledge, as well as in mathematical figures.

112. It is not perhaps necessary to inquire how far, upon the hypothesis of Berkeley, this notion of mathematical figures, as mere creations of the mind, could be sustained. But on the supposition of the objectivity of space, as truly existing without us, which Locke undoubtedly believed, it is certain that the passage just quoted is entirely erroncous, and that it involves a confusion between the geometrical figure itself and its delineation to the eye. A geometrical figure is a portion of space contained in boundaries determined by given relations. It exists in the infinite round about us, as the statue exists in the block.* No one can doubt, if he turns his mind to the subject, that every point in space is equidistant, in all directions, from certain other points. Draw a line through all these, and you have the circumference of a circle; but the circle itself and its circumference exist before the latter is delineated. Thus the orbit of a planet is not a regular geometrical figure, because certain forces disturb it. But this disturbance means only a deviation from a line which exists really in space, and which the planet would actually describe, if there were nothing in the universe but itself and the centre of attraction. The expression therefore of Locke, "whether there be any square or circle existing in the world or no," is highly inaccurate, the latter alternative being an absurdity. All possible figures, and that " in number numberless," exist every where; nor can we evade the perplexities into which the geometry of infinites throws our imagination, by considering them as mere beings of reason, the creatures of the geometer, which I believe some are half disposed to do, nor by substituting the

Non ha i ottimo artista aicun conrecto, Che es inarea sede i suu ora e romonarian Cossassi senerettu e soto a quali, artista La maso che cabbelliso nil intellettu

The geometer uses not the same obedient hand, but he equally feels and perceives the reality of that figure which the broad infinite around him comprehends con suo auterchio.

[Cierro has a anular expression — Quasi non in omni marmory necesse sit inesse vel Praxitella capita! illa enim spaa effecuatur detructione De Divinatiuoc, it 21 — 1842]

Michael Angelo his well conveyed this idea in four lines, which I quote from Cornant :—

vague and unphilosophical notion of indefinitude for a positive objective infinity.

113. The distinction between ideas of mere sensation and those of intellection, between what the mind comprehends, and what it conceives without comprehending, is the point of divergence between the two sects of psychology which still exist in the world. Nothing is in the intellect which has not before been in the sense, said the Aristotelian schoolmen, Every idea has its original in the senses, repeated the disciple of Epicurus, Gassendi. Locke indeed, as Gassendi had done before him, assigned another origin to one class of ideas; but these were few in number, and in the next century two writers of considerable influence, Hartley and Condillac, attempted to resolve them all into sensation. The Cartesian school, a name rather used for brevity, as a short denomination of all who, like Cudworth, held the same tenets as to the nature of ideas, lost ground both in France and England; nor had Leibnitz, who was deemed an enemy to some of our great English names, sufficient weight to restore it. In the hands of some who followed in both countries, the worst phrases of Locke were preferred to the best; whatever could be turned to the account of pyrrhonism, materialism, or atheism, made a figure in the Epicurean system of a popular philosophy. The names alluded to will suggest themselves to the reader. The German metaphysicians from the time of Kant deserve at least the credit of having successfully withstood this coarse sensualism, though they may have borrowed much that their disciples take for original, and added much that is hardly better than what they have overthrown. France has also made a rapid return, since the beginning of this century, and with more soundness of judgment than Germany, towards the doctrines of the Cartesian school. Yet the opposite philosophy to that which never rises above sensible images is exposed to a danger of its own; it is one which the infirmity of the human faculties renders perpetually at hand; few there are who in reasoning on subjects where we cannot attain what Locke has called "positive comprehensive ideas" are secure from falling into mere nonsense and repugnancy. In that part of physics which is simply conversant with quantity, this danger is probably not great, but in all such inquiries as are sometimes called transcendental, it has perpetually ship-wrecked the adventurous pavigator.

114. In the language and probably the notions of Locke as to the nature of the soul there is an indistinctness more worthy of the Aristotelian schoolmen than of the notice seed, one conversant with the Cartesian philosophy. "Bodies," he says, "manifestly produce ideas in us by impulse, the only way which we can conceive bodies to operate in. If, then, external objects be not united to our minds, when they produce ideas in it, and yet we perceive these original qualities in such of them as singly fall under our senses, it is evident that some motion must be thence continued by our nerves, or animal spirits, by some parts of our bodies to the brain, or the seat of sensation, there to produce in our minds the particular ideas we have of them. And since the extension, figure, number, and motion of bodies of an observable bigness may be perceived at a distance by the sight, it is evident some singly imperceptible bodies must come from them to the eyes, and thereby convey to the brain some motion which produces those ideas, which we have of them, in us." He so far retracts his first position afterwards, as to admit, "in consequence of what Mr. Newton has shown in the Principia on the gravitation of matter towards matter," that God not only can put into bodies powers and ways of operation above what can be explained from what we know of matter, but that he has actually done so. And he promises to correct the former passage, which however he has never performed. In fact he seems, by the use of phrases which recur too often to be thought merely figurative, to have supposed that something in the brain comes into local contact with the mind. He was here unable to divest himself, any more than the schoolmen had done, of the notion that there is a proper action of the body on the soul in perception. The Cartesians had brought in the theory of occasional causes and other solutions of the phænomena, so as to avoid what seems so irreconcileable with an immaterial principle. No one is so lavish of a cerebral instrumentality in mental images as Malebranche; he seems at every moment on the verge of materialism; he coquets, as it were, with an Epicurcan physiology; but if I may be allowed to continue the tophor.

he perceives the moment where to stop, and retires, like a dexterous fair one, with unsmirched honour to his immateriality. It cannot be said that Locke is equally successful.

115. In another and a well-known passage, he has thrown out a doubt whether God might not superadd the materialty faculty of thinking to matter; and, though he thinks it probable that this has not been the case, leaves it at last a debateable question, wherein nothing else than presumptions are to be had. Yet he has strongly argued against the possibility of a material Deity upon reasons derived from the nature of matter. Locke almost appears to have taken the union of a thinking being with matter for the thinking of matter itself. What is there, Stillingfleet well asks, like self-consciousness in matter? "Nothing at all," Locke replies, " in matter as matter. But that God cannot bestow on some parcels of matter a power of thinking, and with it self-consciousness, will never be proved by asking how it is possible to apprehend that mere body should perceive that it doth perceive." But if that we call mind, and of which we are self-conscious, were thus superadded to matter, would it the less be something real? In what sense can it be compared to an accident or quality? It has been justly observed that we are much more certain of the independent existence of mind than of that of matter. But that, by the constitution of our nature, a definite organisation, or what will be generally thought the preferable hypothesis, an organic molecule, should be a necessary concomitant of this immaterial principle, does not involve any absurdity at all, whatever want of evidence may be objected to it.

116. It is remarkable that in the controversy with Stillingfleet on this passage, Locke seems to take for granted that there is no immaterial principle in brutes; and as he had too much plain sense to adopt the Cartesian theory of their insensibility, he draws the most plausible argument for the possibility of thought in matter by the admitted fact of sensation and voluntary motion in these animal organisations.
"It is not doubted but that the properties of a rose, a peach, or an elephant superadded to matter change not the properties of matter, but matter is in these things matter still." Few perhaps at present who believe in the imma-teriality of the human soul would deny the same to an elephant; but it must be owned that the discoveries of zoology have pushed this to consequences which some might not readily adopt. The spiritual being of a sponge revolts a little our prejudices; yet there is no resting-place, and we must admit this, or be content to sink ourselves into a mass of medullary fibre. Brutes have been as slowly emancipated in philosophy as some classes of mankind have been in civil polity; their souls, we see, were almost universally disputed to them at the end of the seventeenth century, even by those who did not absolutely bring them down to machinery. Even within the recollection of many, it was common to deny them any kind of reasoning faculty, and to solve their most sagacious actions by the vague word instinct. We have come of late years to think better of our humble companions; and as usual in similar cases, the predominant bias, at least with foreign naturalists, seems rather too much of a levelling character.

117. No quality more remarkably distinguishes Locke than his love of truth. He is of no sect or party, has Hu love of no oblique design, such as we so frequently per- truth and organisty. ceive, of sustaining some tenet which he suppresses, no submissiveness to the opinions of others, nor, what very few lay aside, to his own. Without having adopted certain dominant ideas, like Descartes and Malebranche, he follows with inflexible impartiality and unwearied patience the long process of analysis to which he has subjected the human mind. No great writer has been more exempt from vanity, in which he is very advantageously contrasted with Bacon and Descartes; but he is sometimes a little sharp and contemptuous of his predecessors. The originality of Locke is real and unaffected; not that he has derived nothing from others, which would be a great reproach to himself or to them, but in whatever he has in common with other philosophers, there is always a tinge of his own thoughts, a modification of the particular tenet, or at least a peculiarity of language which renders it not very easy of detection. " It was not to be expected," says Stewart, "that in a work so composed by snatches, to borrow a phrase of the author, he should be able accurately to draw the line be his own ideas and the hints for which he was indebted to others. To those who are well acquainted with his speculations it must appear evident that he had studied diligently the metaphysical writings both of Hobbes and Gassendi, and that he was no stranger to the Essays of Montaigne, to the philosophical works of Bacon, and to Malebranche's Inquiry after Truth. That he was familiarly conversant with the Cartesian system may be presumed from what we are told by his biographer, that it was this which first inspired him with a disgust at the jargon of the schools, and led him into that train of thinking which he afterwards prosecuted so successfully. I do not, however, recollect that he has any where in his Essay mentioned the name of any one of those authors. It is probable that when he sat down to write, he found the result of his youthful reading so completely identified with the fruits of his subsequent reflections, that it was impossible for him to attempt a separation of the one from the other, and that he was thus occasionally led to mistake the treasures of memory for those of invention. That this was really the case may be further presumed from the peculiar and original cast of his phraseology, which, though in general careless and unpolished, has always the merit of that characteristical unity and raciness of style, which demonstrate that while he was writing he conceived himself to be drawing only from his own resources." .

118. The writer, however, whom we have just quoted has not quite done justice to the originality of Locke in more than one instance. Thus on this very passage we find a note in these words:—" Mr. Addison has remarked that Malebranche had the start of Locke by several years in his notions on the subject of duration. Some other coincidences not less remarkable might be easily pointed out in the opinions of the English and of the French philosopher." I am not prepared to dispute, nor do I doubt, the truth of the latter sentence. But with respect to the notions of Malebranche and Locke on duration, it must be said, that they are neither the same, nor has Addison asserted them to be so.† The one threw out an hypothesis with no attempt at proof; the other offered an explanation of the phenomena. What Locke has advanced as to our getting the idea of duration by reflecting on the succession of our ideas seems to be truly his own. Whether it be entirely the right explanation, is another question. It rather appears to me that the internal sense, as we may not improperly call it, of duration belongs separately to each idea, and is rather lost than suggested by their succession. Duration is best perceived when we are able to detain an idea for some time without change, as in watching the motion of a pendulum. And though it is impossible for the mind to continue in this state of immobility more perhaps than about a second or two, this is sufficient to give us an idea of duration as the necessary condition of existence. Whether this be an objective or merely a subjective necessity, is an abstruse question, which our sensations do not enable us to decide. But Locke appears to have looked rather at the measure of duration, by which we divide it into portions, than at the mere simplicity of the idea itself. Such a measure, it is certain, can only be obtained through the medium of a succession in our ideas.

[·] Perliminary Dissertation

119. It has been also remarked by Stewart, that Locke claims a discovery rather due to Descartes; namely, the impossibility of defining simple ideas. Descartes however, as well as the authors of the Port-Royal Logic, merely says that words already as clear as we can make them do not require, or even admit, of definition. But I do not perceive that he has made the distinction we find in the Essay on the Human Understanding, that the names of simple ideas are not capable of any definition, while the names of all complex ideas are so. "It has not, that I know," Locke says, "been observed by any body what words are and what words are not capable of being defined." The passage which I have quoted in another place, from Descartes's posthumous dialogue, even if it went to this length, was unknown to Locke; yet he might have acknowledged that he had been in some measure anticipated in other observations by that philosopher.

120. The first book of the Essay on the Human Understanding is directed, as is well known, against the doctrine of innate ideas, or innate principles in of bank the mind. This has been often censured, as combating in some places a tenet which no one would support, and as, in other passages, breaking in upon moral distinctions themselves, by disputing the universality of their acknowledgment. With respect to the former charge, it is not perhaps easy for us to determine what might be the crude and confused notions, or at least language, of many who held the theory of innate ideas. It is by no means evident that Locke had Descartes chiefly or even at all in his view. Lord Herbert, whom he distinctly answers, and many others, especially the Platonists, had dwelt upon innate ideas in far stronger terms than the great French metaphysician. if indeed he can be said to have maintained them at all. The latter and more important accusation rests upon no other pretext, than that Locke must be reckoned among those who have not admitted a moral faculty of discovering right from wrong to be a part of our constitution. But that there is a law of nature imposed by the Supreme Being, and cousequently universal, has been so repeatedly asserted in his writings, that it would imply great inattention to question it. Stewart has justly vindicated Locke in this respect from some hasty and indefinite charges of Beattie; but I must venture to think that he goes much too far when he attempts to identify the doctrines of the Essay with those of Shaftesbury. These two philosophers were in opposite schools as to the test of moral sentiments. Locke seems always to adopt what is called the selfish system in morals, resolving all morality into religion, and all religion into a regard to our own interest. And he seems to have paid less attention to the emotions than to the intellectual powers of the soul.

other tenets of this great man. But the obligations we owe to him for the Essay on the Human Understanding are never to be forgotten. It is truly the first real chart of the coasts; wherein some may be laid down incorrectly, but the general relations of all are perceived. And we who find some things to censure in Locke have perhaps learned how to censure them from himself; we have thrown off so many false notions and films of prejudice by his help that we are become capable of judging our master. This is what has been the fate of all who who have pushed onward the landmarks of science; they have made that easy for inferior men which was painfully laboured through by themselves. Among many excellent things in the Essay on Human Understanding none are more admirable than the whole third book on the nature of words, especially the three chapters on their imperfection and abuse. In earlier treatises of logic, at least in that of Port-Royal, some of this might be found; but nowhere are verbal fallacies, and above all, the sources from which they spring, so fully and conclusively exposed.

122. The same praiseworthy diligence in hunting error to its lurking-places distinguishes the short treatise on the Conduct of the Understanding; which having to the Understanding to the Under been originally designed as an additional chapter to standing. the Essay , is as it were the ethical application of its theory, and ought always to be read with it, if indeed, for the sake of its practical utility, it should not come sooner into the course of education. Aristotle himself, and the whole of his dialectical school, had pointed out many of the sophisms against which we should guard our reasoning faculties; but these are chiefly such as others attempt to put upon us in dispute. There are more dangerous fallacies by which we cheat ourselves; prejudice, partiality, self-interest, vanity, inattention, and indifference to truth. Locke, who was as exempt from these as almost any man who has turned his mind to so many subjects where their influence is to be suspected, has dwelled on the moral discipline of the intellect in this treatise better, as I conceive, than any of his predecessors, though we have already seen, and it might appear far more at length to those who should have recourse to the books, that Arnauld and Malebranche, besides other French philosophers of the age, had not been remiss in this indispensable part of logic.

123. Locke throughout this treatise labours to secure the inquirer from that previous persuasion of his own opinion, which generally renders all his pretended investigations of its truth little more than illusive and nugatory. But the indifferency which he recommends to every thing except truth itself, so that we should not even wish any thing to be true before we have examined whether it be so, seems to involve the impossible hypothesis that man is but a purely reasoning being. It is vain to press the recommendation of freedom from prejudice so far; since we cannot but conceive some propositions to be more connected with our welfare than others, and consequently to desire their truth. These exaggerations lay a fundamental condition of honest inquiry open to the sneers of its adversaries; and it is sufficient, because nothing more is really attainable, first to dispossess ourselves of the notion that our interests are concerned where they are not, and next, even when we cannot but wish one result of our inquiries rather than another, to be the more unremitting in our endeavours to exclude this bias from our reasoning.

See a letter to Molyneux, dated April, 1697. Locke's Works (fol. 1759), vol. iii. p. 509.

124. I cannot think any parent or instructor justified in neglecting to put this little treatise in the hands of a boy about the time when the reasoning faculties become developed. It will give him a sober and serious, not flippant or self-conceited, independency of thinking; and while it teaches how to distrust ourselves and to watch those prejudices which necessarily grow up from one cause or another, will inspire a reasonable confidence in what he has well considered, by taking off a little of that deference to authority, which is the more to be regretted in its excess, that, like its cousin-german, party-spirit, it is frequently united to loyalty of heart and the generous enthusiasm of youth.

CHAPTER IV.

BISTORY OF MORAL AND POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY AND OF JURISPRUDENCE, PROM 1650 TO 1700.

SECT. I .- ON MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

Parent's Provincial Letters — Taylor — Cudworth — Spinosa — Cumberland's Law of Nature — Puffendonf's Treatise on the same Subject — Rockeforeault and La Brupere — Locke on Education — Fenelon.

1. THE casuistical writers of the Roman church, and especially of the Jesuit order, belong to earlier periods; for Computer of little room was left for any thing but popular com- the Jesuita. pilations from large works of vast labour and accredited authority. But the false principles imputed to the latter school now raised a louder cry than before. Implacable and unsparing enemies, as well as ambitious intriguers themselves, they were encountered by a host of those who envied, feared, and hated them. Among those none were such willing or able accusers as the Jansenists whom they persecuted. Pascal, by his Provincial Letters, did more to ruin the name of Jesuit than all the controversies of Protestantism, Proceed Lett. or all the fulminations of the parliament of Paris. A letter of Antony Arnauld, published in 1655, wherein he declared that he could not find in Jansenius the propositions condemned by the pope, and laid himself open to censure by some of his own, provoked the Sorbonne, of which he was a member, to exclude him from the faculty of theology. Before this resolution was taken, Pascal came forward in defence of his friend, under a fictitious name, in the first of what have been always called Lettres Provinciales, but more accurately. Lettres écrites par Louis de Montalte à un Provincial de ses Amis. In the first four of them he discusses the thorny problems of Jansenism, aiming chiefly to show that St. Thomas Aguinas had maintained the same doctrine on efficacious grace which his disciples the Dominicans now rejected from another quarter. But he passed from hence to a theme more generally intelligible and interesting, the false morality of the Jesuit casuists. He has accumulated so long a list of scaudalous decisions, and dwelled upon them with so much wit and spirit, and yet with so serious a severity, that the order of Loyola became a by-word with mankind. I do not agree with those who think the Provincial Letters a greater proof of the genius of Pascal than his Thoughts, in spite of the many weaknesses in reasoning which these display. The former are at present, finely written as all confess them to be, too much filled with obsolete controversy, they quote books too much forgotten, they have too little bearing on any permanent sympathies, to be read with much interest or pleasure.

2. The Jesuits had, unfortunately for themselves, no writers at that time of sufficient ability to defend them; and being disliked by many who were not Jansenists, could make little stand against their adversaries, till public opinion had already taken its line. They have since not failed to charge Pascal with extreme misrepresentation of their eminent casuists, Escobar, Busenbaum, and many others, so that some later disciples of their school have ventured to call the Provincial Letters the immortal liars (les immortelles menteuses). It has been insinuated, since Pascal's veracity is hard to attack, that he was deceived by those from whom he borrowed his quotations. But he has declared himself, in a remarkable passage, not only that, far from repenting of these letters, he would make them yet stronger if it were to be done again, but that, although he had not read all the books he has quoted, else he must have spent great part of his life in reading bad books, yet he had read Escobar twice through; and with respect to the rest, he had not quoted a single passage without having seen it in the book, and examined the context before and after, that he might not confound an objection with an answer, which would have been reprehensible and unjust : it is therefore impossible to save the honour of Pascal, if his quotations are not fair. Nor did he stand alone in his imputations on the Jesuit casuistry. A book, called Morale des Jesuites, by Nicolas Perrault, published at Mons in 1667, goes over the same ground with less pleasantry but not less learning,

^{* (}Eurres de Pascal, vol. i. p. 400,

3. The most extensive and learned work on casuistry which has appeared in the English language is the Ductor Dubitantium of Jeremy Taylor, published in 1660. This, as its title shows, treats of subjective morality, or the guidance of the conscience. But this cannot be much discussed without establishing some principles of objective right and wrong, some standard by which the conscience in to be ruled. "The whole measure and rule of conscience," according to Taylor, "is the law of God, or God's will signified to us by nature or revelation; and by the several manners and times and parts of its communication it hath obtained several names; - the law of nature - the consent of nations - right reason - the Decalogue - the sermon of Christ — the canons of the apostles — the laws ecclesiastical and civil of princes and governors-fame or the public reputation of things, expressed by proverbs and other instances and manners of public honesty. . . . These being the full measures of right and wrong, of lawful and unlawful, will be the rule of conscience and the subject of the present book."

4. The heterogeneous combination of things so different in nature and authority, as if they were all expressions the character of the law of God, does not augur well for the distinctness of Taylor's moral philosophy, and would be disadvantageously compared with the Ecclesiastical Polity of Hooker. Nor are we deceived in the anticipations we might draw. With many of Taylor's excellencies, his vast fertility and his frequent acuteness, the Ductor Dubitanium exhibits has characteristic defects; the waste of quotations is even greater than in his other writings, and his own exuberance of mind degenerates into an intolerable prolixity. His solution of moral difficulties is often unsatisfactory; after an accumulation of arguments and authorities we have the disappointment to perceive that the knot is neither untied nor cut; there seems a want of close investigation of principles, a frequent confusion and obscurity, which Taylor's two chief faults, excessive display of erudition and redundancy of language, conspire to produce. Paley is no doubt often superficial, and sometimes mistaken; yet in clearness, in conciseness, in freedom from impertinent reference to authority, he is far superior to Taylor.

- 5. Taylor seems too much inclined to side with those who resolve all right and wrong into the positive will of God. The law of nature he defines to be "the universal law of the world, or of mankind, to which we are inclined by nature, invited by consent, prompted by reason, but which is bound upon us only by the command of God." Though in the strict meaning of the word, law, this may be truly said, it was surely required, considering the large sense which that word has obtained as coincident with moral right, that a fuller explanation should be given than Taylor has even intimated. lest the goodness of the Deity should seem something arhitrary and precarious. And, though in maintaining, against most of the scholastic metaphysicians, that God can dispense with the precepts of the Decalogue, he may be substantially right, yet his reasons seem by no means the clearest and most satisfactory that might be assigned. It may be added, that in his prolix rules concerning what he calls a probable conscience, he comes very near to the much decried theories of the Jesuits. There was indeed a vein of subtilty in Taylor's understanding which was not always without influence on his candour.
- 6. A treatise concerning eternal and immutable morality, by Codworth, was first published in 1731. Cudwotthia may be almost reckoned a portion of his Intellectual manufality. System, the object being what he has declared to be one of those which he had there in view. This was to prove that moral differences of right and wrong are antecedent to any divine law. He wrote therefore not only against the Calvinistic school, but in some measure against Taylor, though he abstains from mentioning any recent author except Descartes, who had gone far in referring all moral distinctions to the arbitrary will of God. Cudworth's reasoning is by no means satisfactory, and rests too much on the dogmatic metaphysics which were going out of use. The nature or essence of nothing, he maintains, can depend upon the will of God alone, which is the efficient, but not the formal, cause of all things; a distinction not very intelligible, but on which he seems to build his theory. For, though admitting that moral relations have no objective existence out of the mind, he holds that they have a positive essence, and therefore are not nothing; whence it follows that they must be independent of will. He pours out much ancient learning, though not so lavishly as in the Intellectual System.

7. The urgent necessity of contracting my sails in this last period, far the most abundant as it is in the variety Necte-La and extent of its literature, restrains me from more Proceste than a bare mention of several works not undeserving of regard. The Essais de Morale of Nicole are less read than esteemed, says a late biographer.† Voltaire however prophesied that they would not perish. "The chapter especially," he proceeds, "on the means of preserving peace among men is a master-piece to which nothing equal has been left to us by antiquity." These Essays are properly contained in six volumes; but so many other pieces are added in some editions that the collection under that title is very long. La Placette, minister of a French church at Copenhagen, has been called the Protestant Nicole. His Essais de Morale, in 1602 and other years, are full of a solid morality, rather strict in casuistry, and apparently not deficient in observation, and analytical views of human nature. They were much esteemed in their own age. Works of this kind tread so very closely on the department of practical religion that it is sometimes difficult to separate them on any fixed principle. A less homiletical form, a comparative absence of scriptural quotation, a more reasoning and observing mode of dealing with the subject, are the chief distinctions. But in the sermons of Barrow and some others we find a great deal of what may be justly called moral philosophy.

8. A book by Sharrock, De Officiis secundum Rationis Humanie Dictata, 1660, is occasionally quoted, and seems to be of a philosophical nature. § Velthuysen, a Dutch minister, was of more reputation. His name was

P. 15.
 † Biog. Univ.

Steele de Louis XIV.

⁵ Comberland (in praefatione) De Legibur Naturae.

rather obnoxious to the orthodox, since he was a strenuous advocate of toleration, a Cartesian in philosophy, and inclined to judge for himself. His chief works are De Principiis Justi et Decori, and De Naturali Pudore. But we must now pass on to those who have exercised a greater influence in moral philosophy, Cumberland and Puffendorf, after giving a short consideration to Spinosa.

9. The moral system, if so it may be called, of Spinosa, has Moral system been developed by him in the fourth and fifth parts of his Ethics. We are not deceived in what might naturally be expected from the unhesitating adherence of Spinosa to a rigorous line of reasoning, that his ethical scheme would offer nothing inconsistent with the fundamental pantheism of his philosophy. In nature itself, he maintains as before, there is neither perfection nor imperfection, neither good nor evil; but these are modes of speaking, adopted to express the relations of things as they appear to our minds. Whatever contains more positive attributes capable of being apprehended by us than another contains, is more perfect than it. Whatever we know to be useful to ourselves, that is good; and whatever impedes our attainment of good is evil. By this utility Spinosa does not understand happiness, if by that is meant pleasurable sensation, but the extension of our mental and bodily capacities. The passions restrain and overpower these capacities; and coming from without, that is, from the body, render the mind a less powerful agent than it seems to be. It is only, we may remember in a popular sense, and subject to his own definitions, that Spinosa acknowledges the mind to be an agent at all; it is merely so, in so far as its causes of action cannot be referred by us to any thing external. No passion can be restrained except by a stronger passion. Hence even a knowledge of what is really good or evil for us can of itself restrain no passion; but only as it is associated with a perception of joy and sorrow, which is a mode of passion. This perception is necessarily accompanied by desire or aversion; but they may often be so weak as to be controlled by other sentiments of the same class, inspired by conflicting passions. This is the cause of the [.] Biogr, Univ. Barbeyrno's notes on Putfendorf, passum.

VOL. III.

weakness and inconstancy of many, and he alone is wise and virtuous who steadily pursues what is useful to himself; that is, what reason points out as the best means of preserving his well-being, and extending his capacities. Nothing is absolutely good, nothing therefore is principally sought by a virtuous man, but knowledge, not of things external, which gives us only inadequate ideas, but of God. Other things are good or evil to us, so far as they suit our nature or contradict it; and so far as men act by reason, they must agree in seeking what is conformable to their nature. And those who agree with us in living by reason, are themselves of all things most suitable to our nature; so that the society of such men is most to be desired; and to enlarge that society by rendering men virtuous, and by promoting their advantage when they are so, is most useful to ourselves. For the good of such as pursue virtue may be enjoyed by all, and does not obstruct our own. Whatever conduces to the common society of mankind and promotes concord among them is useful to all; and whatever has an opposite tendency is pernicious. The passions are sometimes incapable of excess, but of this the only instances are joy and cheerfulness; more frequently they become pernicious by being indulged, and in some cases, such as hatred, can never be useful. We should therefore, for our own sakes, meet the hatred and malevolence of others with love and liberality. Spinosa dwells much on the preference due to a social above a solitary life, to cheerfulness above austerity, and alludes frequently to the current theological ethics with censure.

10. The fourth part of the ethics is entitled On Human Slavery, meaning the subjugation of the reason to the passions; the fifth, On Human Liberty, is designed to show, as had been partly done in the former, how the mind or intellectual man is to preserve its supremacy. This is to be effected, not by the extinction, which is impossible, but the moderation of the passions; and the secret of doing this, according to Spinosa, is to contemplate such things as are naturally associated with affections of no great violence. We find that when we look at things simply in themselves, and not in their necessary relations, they affect us more powerfully; whence it may be inferred that we shall weaken the passion by viewing them as parts of a necessary series. We promote the same end by considering the object of the passion in many different relations, and in general, by enlarging the sphere of our knowledge concerning it. Hence the more adequate ideas we attain of things that affect us, the less we shall be overcome by the passion they excite. But most of all it should be our endeavour to refer all things to the idea of God. The more we understand ourselves and our passions, the more we shall love God; for the more we understand any thing, the more pleasure we have in contemplating it; and we shall associate the idea of God with this pleasurable contemplation, which is the essence of love. The love of God should be the chief employment of the mind. But God has no passions; therefore he who desires that God should love him, desires in fact that he should cease to be God. And the more we believe others to be united in the same love of God, the more we shall love him ourselves.

11. The great aim of the mind, and the greatest degree of virtue, is the knowledge of things in their essence. This knowledge is the perfection of human nature; it is accompanied with the greatest joy and contentment; it leads to a love of God, intellectual, not imaginative, eternal, because not springing from passions that perish with the body, being itself a portion of that infinite love with which God intellectually loves himself. In this love towards God our chief felicity consists, which is not the reward of virtue, but virtue itself; nor is any one happy because he has overcome the passions, but it is by being happy, that is, by enjoying the fulness of divine love, that he has become capable of overcoming them.

12. These extraordinary effusions confirm what has been hinted in another place, that Spinosa, in the midst of his atheism, seemed often to hover over the regions of mystical theology. This last book of the Ethics speaks, as is evident, the very language of Quietism. In Spinosa himself it is not easy to understand the meaning; his sincerity ought not, I think, to be called in question; and this enthusiasm may be set down to the rapture of the imagination expatiating in the enchanting wilderness of its creation. But the possibility of combining such a tone of contemplative devotion with the systematic denial of a Supreme Being, in any personal sense, may put us on our guard against the tendency of mysticism, which may again, as it has frequently, degenerate into a similar chaos.

13. The science of ethics, in the third quarter of the seventeenth century, seemed to be cultivated by three very divergent schools; by that of the theologians who be leaded went no farther than revelation, or at least than the strong went no farther than revelation, or at least than the Platonic philosophers, who sought them in eternal and intrinsic relations; and that of Hobbes and Spinosa, who reduced them all to selfish prudence. A fourth theory, which, in some of its modifications, has greatly prevailed in the last two centuries, may be referred to Richard Cumberland, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough. His famous work, De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica, was published in 1672. It is contained in nine chapters, besides the preface or prolegomena.

14. Cumberland begins by mentioning Grotius, Selden, and one or two more who have investigated the laws of nature a posteriori, that is, by the testimony of authors and the consent of nations. But as some objections may be started against this mode of proof, which, though he does not hold them to be valid, are likely to have some effect, he prefers another line of demonstration, deducing the laws of nature, as effects, from their real causes in the constitution of nature itself. The Platonic theory of inuate moral ideas, sufficient to establish natural law, he does not admit. " For myself at least I may say that I have not been so fortunate as to arrive at the knowledge of this law by so compendious a road." He deems it therefore necessary to begin with what we learn by daily use and experience, assuming nothing but the physical laws of motion shown by mathematicians, and the derivation of all their operations from the will of a First Cause.

15. By diligent observation of all propositions which can be justly reckoned general moral laws of nature, he finds that they may be reduced to one, the pursuit of the common good of all rational agents, which tends to our own good as part of the whole; as its opposite tends not only to the misery of the whole system, but to our own. This tendency, he takes care to tell us, though he uses the present tense (conducit), has respect to the most remote consequences, and is so understood by him. The means which serve to this end, the general good, may be treated as theorems in a geometrical method.† Cumberland, as we have seen in Spinosa, was captivated by the apparent security of this road to truth.

16. This scheme, he observes, may at first sight want the two requisites of a law, a legislator and a sanction. But whatever is naturally assented to by our minds must spring from the author of nature. God is proved to be the author of every proposition which is proved to be true by the constitution of nature, which has him for its author. I Nor is a sanction wanting in the rewards, that is, the happiness which attends the observance of the law of nature, and in the opposite effects of its neglect; and in a lax sense, though not that of the jurists, reward as well as punishment may be included in the word sanction. § But benevolence, that is, love and desire of good towards all rational beings, includes picty towards God, the greatest of them all, as well as humanity. d Cumberland altogether abstains from arguments founded on revelation, and is perhaps the first writer on natural law who has done so, for they may even be found in Hobbes. And I think that he may be reckoned the founder of what is awkwardly and invidiously called the utilitarian school; for though similar expressions about the common good may sometimes be found in the ancients, it does not seem to have been the basis of any ethical system.

17. This common good, not any minute particle of it, as the benefit of a single man, is the great end of the legislator and of him who obeys his will. And such human actions as by their natural tendency promote the common good may be called naturally good, more than those which tend only to the good of any one man, by how much the whole is greater than this small part. And whatever is directed in the shortest way to this end may be called right, as a right line is the shortest of all. And as the whole system of the universe, when all things are arranged so as to produce happiness, is [·] Prologomena, acet. 9.

⁵ Sect. 14.

[†] Sect. 12.

⁴ Sect. 13.

beautiful, being aptly disposed to its end, which is the definition of beauty, so particular actions contributing to this general harmony may be called beautiful and becoming."

18. Cumberland acutely remarks, in answer to the objection to the practice of virtue from the evils which fall on good men, and the success of the wicked, that no good or evil is to be considered, in this point of view, which arises from mere necessity, or external causes, and not from our virtue or vice itself. He then shows that a regard for piety and peace, for mutual intercourse, and civil and domestic polity, tends to the happiness of every one; and in reckoning the good consequences of virtuous behaviour we are not only to estimate the pleasure intimately connected with it, which the love of God and of good men produces, but the contingent benefits we obtain by civil society which we promote by such conduct.† And we see that in all nations there is some regard to good faith and the distribution of property, some respect to the obligation of oaths, some attachments to relations and friends. All men therefore acknowledge, and to a certain extent perform, those things which really tend to the common good. And though crime and violence sometimes prevail, yet these are like diseases in the body which it shakes off; or if, like them, they prove sometimes mortal to a single community, yet human society is immortal; and the conservative principles of common good have in the end far more efficacy than those which dissolve and destroy states.

19. We may reckon the happiness consequent on virtue as a true sanction of natural law annexed to it by its author, and thus fulfilling the necessary conditions of its definition. And though some have laid less stress on these sanctions, and deemed virtue its own reward, and gratitude to God and man its best motive, yet the consent of nations and common experience show us that the observance of the first end, which is the common good, will not be maintained without remuneration or penal consequences.

20. By this single principle of common good, we simplify the method of natural law, and arrange its secondary precepts in such subordination as best conduces to the general end. Hence moral rules give way in particular cases, when they come in collision with others of more extensive importance. For all ideas of right or virtue imply a relation to the system and nature of all rational beings. And the principles thus deduced as to moral conduct are generally applicable to political societies, which in their two leading institutions, the division of property and the coercive power of the magistrate, follow the steps of natural law, and adopt these rules of polity, because they perceive them to promote the common weal.

21. From all intermixture of scriptural authority Cumberland proposes to abstain, building only on reason and experience, since we believe the Scriptures to proceed from God because they illustrate and promote the law of nature. He seems to have been the first Christian writer who sought to establish systematically the principles of moral right independently of revelation. They are indeed taken for granted by many, especially those who adopted the Platonic language; or the schoolmen may have demonstrated them by arguments derived from reason, but seldom, if ever, without some collateral reference to theological authority. In this respect, therefore, Cumberland may be deemed to make an epoch in the history of ethical philosophy, though Puffendorf, whose work was published the same year, may have nearly equal claims to it. If we compare the Treatise on the Laws of Nature with the Ductor Dubitantium of Taylor, written a very few years before, we shall find ourselves in a new world of moral reasoning. The schoolmen and fathers, the canonists and casuists, have vanished like ghosts at the first daylight; the continual appeal is to experience, and never to authority; or if authority can be said to appear at all in the pages of Comberland, it is that of the great apostles of experimental philosophy, Descartes or Huygens, or Harvey or Willis. His mind, liberal and comprehensive as well as acute, had been forcibly impressed with the discoveries of his own age, both in mathematical science and in what is now more strictly called physiology. From this armoury he chose his weapons, and employed them, in some instances, with great sagacity and depth of thought. From the brilliant success, also, of the modern analysis, as well as from the natural prejudice in favour of a mathematical method, which arises from the acknowledged superiority of that science in the determination of its proper truths, he was led to expect more from the use of similar processes in moral reasoning than we have found justified by experience. And this analogy had probably some effect on one of the chief errors of his ethical system, the reduction, at least in theory, of the morality of actions to definite calculation.

22. The prolegomena or preface to Cumberland's treatise contains that statement of his system with which we have been hitherto concerned, and which the whole volume does but expand. His manner of reasoning is diffuse, abounding in repetitions, and often excursive; we cannot avoid perceiving that he labours long on propositions which no adversary would dispute, or on which the dispute could be little else than one of verbal definition. This however is almost the universal failing of preceding philosophers, and was only put an end to, if it can be said yet to have ceased, by the sharper logic of controversy, which a more general regard to metaphysical inquiries, and a juster sense of the value of words, brought into use.

23. The question between Cumberland and his adversaries, that is, the school of Hobbes, is stated to be, whether certain propositions of immutable truth, directing the voluntary actions of men in choosing good and avoiding evil, and imposing an obligation upon them, independently of civil laws, are necessarily suggested to the mind by the nature of things and by that of mankind. And the affirmative of this question he undertakes to prove from a consideration of the nature of both; from which many particular rules might be deduced, but above all that which comprehends all the rest, and is the basis of his theory; namely, that the greatest possible benevolence (not a mere languad desire but an energetic principle) of every rational agent towards all the rest constitutes the happiest condition of each and of all, so far as depends on their own power, and is necessarily required for their greatest happiness; whence the common good is the supreme law. That God is the author of this law appears evident from his being the author of all nature and of all the physical laws according to which impressions are made on our minds.

24. It is easy to observe by daily experience that we have the power of doing good to others, and that no men are so happy or so secure as they who most exert this. And this may be proved synthetically and in that more rigorous method which he affects, though it now and then leads the reader away from the simplest argument, by considering our own faculties of speech and language, the capacities of the hand and countenance, the skill we possess in sciences and in useful arts; all of which conduce to the social life of markind and to their mutual co-operation and benefit. Whatever preserves and perfects the nature of any thing, that is to be called good, and the opposite evil; so that Hobbes has crudely asserted good to respect only the agent desiring it, and consequently to be variable. In this it will be seen that the dispute is chiefly verbal.

25. Two corollaries of great importance in the theory of ethics spring from a consideration of our physical powers. The first is, that inasmuch as they are limited by their pature, we should never seek to transgress their bounds, but distinguish, as the Stoics did, things within our reach, 72 10' hun, from those beyond it, 72 oux 15' kan, thus relieving our minds from anxious passions, and turning them to the prudent use of the means assigned to us. The other is one which applies more closely to his general principle of morals; that as all we can do in respect of others, and all the enjoyment we or they can have of particular things, is limited to certain persons, as well as by space and time, we perceive the necessity of distribution, both as to things, from which spring the rights of property, and as to persons, by which our benevolence, though a general rule in itself, is practically directed towards individuals. For the conservation of an aggregate whole is the same as that of its divided parts, that is, of single persons, which requires a distributive exercise of the powers of each. Hence property and dominion, or meum and tuum, in the most general sense, are consequences from the general law of nature. Without a support from that law, according to Cumberland, without a positive tendency to the good of all rational agents, we should have no right even to things necessary for our preservation; nor have we that right, if a greater evil would be incurred by our preservation than by our destruction. It may be added, as a more universal reflection, that as all which we see in nature is so framed as to persevere in its appointed state, and as the human body is endowed with the power of throwing off whatever is noxious and threatens the integrity of its condition, we may judge from this that the conservation of mankind in its best state must be the design of nature, and that their own voluntary actions conducing to that end must be such as the author of nature commands and approves.

26. Cumberland next endeavours, by an enlarged analysis of the mental and bodily structure of mankind, to evince their aptitude for the social virtues, that is, for the general benevolence which is the primary law of nature. We have the power of knowing these by our rational faculty, which is the judge of right and wrong, that is, of what is conformable to the great law; and by the other faculties of the mind, as well as by the use of language, we generalise and reduce to propositions the determinations of reason. We have also the power of comparison, and of perceiving analogies, by means of which we estimate degrees of good. And if we are careful to guard against deciding without clear and adequate apprehensions of things, our reason will not mislead us. The observance of something like this general law of nature by inferior animals, which rarely, as Cumberland supposes, attack those of the same species, and in certain instances live together, as if by a compact for mutual aid; the peculiar contrivances in the human body which seem designed for the maintenance of society; the possession of speech, the pathognomic countenance, the efficiency of the band, a longevity beyond the lower animals, the duration of the sexual appetite throughout the year, with several other arguments derived from anatomy, are urged throughout this chapter against the unsocial theory of Hobbes.

27. Natural good is defined by Cumberland with more latitude than has been used by Paley and by those of a later school, who confine it to happiness or pleasurable perception. Whatever conduces to the preservation of an intelligent being, or to the perfection of his powers, he accounts to be good.

without regard to enjoyment. And for this he appeals to experience, since we desire existence, as well as the extension of our powers of action, for their own sakes. It is of great importance to acquire a clear notion of what is truly good, that is, of what serves most to the happiness and perfection of every one; since all the secondary laws of nature, that is, the rules of particular virtues, derive their authority from this effect. These rules may be compared one with another as to the probability, as well as the value of their effects upon the general good; and he anticipates greater advantage from the employment of mathematical reasoning and even analytical forms in moral philosophy than the different nature of the subjects would justify, even if the fundamental principle of converting the theory of ethics into calculation could be allowed.

28. A law of nature, meaning one subordinate to the great principle of benevolence, is defined by Cumberland to be a proposition manifested by the nature of things to the mind according to the will of the First Cause, and pointing out an action tending to the good of rational beings, from the performance of which an adequate reward, or from the neglect of which a punishment, will ensue by the nature of such rational beings. Every part of this definition he proves with exceeding prolixity in the longest chapter, namely, the fifth, of his treatise; but we have already seen the foundations of his theory upon which it rests. It will be evident to the reader of this chapter that both Butler and Paley have been largely indebted to Cumberland. † Natural obligation be debues thus: - No other necessity determines the will to act than that of avoiding evil and of seeking good, so far as appears to be in our power. ! Moral obligation is more limited, and is differently defined. But the main point, as ^{*} Ea quippe tota (disciplina morum) versatur in restimandis rationibus vurium humatarum ad commune bonu, a er tum rationa curium quinqua feri variant in orani casuum possibilium varietate. Cap. ii seet. 9. The tame is laid down to several other passages. By rationibus we uniat understand ration which brings out the calculating theory in the strongest light.

[†] Agreed part of the second and third chapters of Butler's Analogy will be found in Cumberland. See cap v. seet 22

[†] Non alsa necessitas voluntatem ad agendum determinat, quant malam in quantum tale case polus constat fuguridi, bonumque qualenas nolas apparet prosequendi. Cap, v sect 7.

⁴ Sect. 27

he justly observes, of the controversy is the connexion between the tendency of each man's actions, taking them collectively through his life, to the good of the whole, and that to his own greatest happiness and perfection. This he undertakes to show, premising that it is twofold; consisting immediately in the pleasure attached to virtue, and ultimately in the rewards which it obtains from God and from man. God, as a rational being, cannot be supposed to act without an end, or to have a greater end than the general good; that is, the happiness and perfection of his creatures. And his will may not only be shown à priori, by the consideration of his essence and attributes, but by the effects of virtue and vice in the order of nature which he has established. The rewards and punishments which follow at the hands of men are equally obvious; and whether we regard men as God's instruments, or as voluntary agents, demonstrate that virtue is the highest prudence. These arguments are urged rather tediously, and in such a manner as to encounter none of the difficulties which it is desirable to overcome.

29. Two objections might be alleged against this kind of proof; that the rewards and punishments of moral actions are too uncertain to be accounted clear proofs of the will of God, and consequently of their natural obligation, and that by laying so much stress upon them we make private happiness the measure of good. These he endeavours to repel. The contingency of a future consequence has a determinate value, which, if it more than compensates, for good or evil, the evil or good of a present action, ought to be deemed a proof given by the author of nature that reward or punishment are annexed to the action, as much as if they were its necessary consequences.† This argument, perhaps sophistical, is an instance of the calculating method affected by Cumberland, and which we may presume, from the then recent application of analysis to probability, he was the first to adopt on such an occasion. Paley is sometimes fond of a similar process. But after these mathematical reasonings, he dwells, as before, on the beneficial effects of virtue, and concludes that many of them are so uniform as to leave no doubt as to the intention of the Creator. Against the charge of postponing the public good to that of the agent, he protests that it is wholly contrary to his principle, which permits no one to preserve his life, or what is necessary for it, at the expense of a greater good to the whole. But his explication of the question ends in repeating that no single man's greatest felicity can by the nature of things be inconsistent with that of all; and that every such hypothesis is to be rejected as an impossible condition of the problem. It seems doubtful whether Cumberland uses always the same language on the question whether private happiness is the final motive of action, which in this part of the chapter he wholly denies.

30. From the establishment of this primary law of universal benevolence Cumberland next deduces the chief secondary principles, which are commonly called the moral virtues. And among these he gives the first place to justice, which he seems to consider, by too lax an use of terms, or too imperfeet an analogy, as comprehending the social duties of liberality, courtesy, and domestic affection. The right of property, which is the foundation of justice, he rests entirely on its necessity for the common good; whatever is required for that prime end of moral action being itself obligatory on moral agents, they are bound to establish and to maintain separate rights. And all right so wholly depends on this instrumentality to good, that the rightful sovereignty of God over his creatures is not founded on that relation which he bears to them as their Maker, much less on his mere power, but on his wisdom and goodness, through which his omnipotence works only for their happiness. But this happuress can only be attained by means of an absolute right over them in their Maker, which is therefore to be reckoned a natural law.

31. The good of all rational beings is a complex whole, being nothing but the aggregate of good enjoyed by each. We can only act in our proper spheres, labouring to do good.

a Deo intertexitur, cam tantum habet sect 28,

^{*} Sua cujusque felicitas est para valde rationem quam habet unus homo ad agexigua fum illius, quem sir sere ratio- gregatam ex omnibus rationalibus, quie nairs prosequitur, et ad totum finem, sei- river est quam habet unics areauls ad licet comm me bonum cur a natura seu inolem universi corporis. Sect. 23. and

But this labour will be fruitless, or rather mischievous, if we do not keep in mind the higher gradations which terminate in universal benevolence. No man must seek his own advantage otherwise than that of his family permits; or provide for his family to the detriment of his country; or promote the good of his country at the expense of mankind; or serve mankind, if it were possible, without regard to the majesty of God. It is indeed sufficient that the mind should acknowledge and recollect this principle of conduct, without having it present on every single occasion. But where moral difficulties arise, Cumberland contends that the general good is the only measure by which we are to determine the lawfulness of actions, or the preference due to one above another.

32. In conclusion he passes to political authority, deriving it from the same principle, and comments with severity and success, though in the verbose style usual to him, on the system of Hobbes. It is, however, worthy of remark, that he not only peremptorily declares the irresponsibility of the supreme magistrate in all cases, but seems to give him a more arbitrary latitude in the choice of measures, so long as he does not violate the chief negative precepts of the Decalogue, than is consistent with his own fundamental rule of always seeking the greatest good. He endeavours to throw upon Hobbes, as was not uncommon with the latter's theological opponents, the imputation of encouraging rebellion while he seemed to support absolute power; and observes with full as much truth that, if kings are bound by no natural law, the reason for their institution, namely, the security of mankind, assigned by the author of the Leviathan, falls to the ground.

33. I have gone rather at length into a kind of analysis of this treatise because it is now very little read, and yet was of great importance in the annals of ethical reading philosophy. It was, if not a text-book in either of our universities, concerning which I am not confident, the basis of the system therein taught, and of the books which have had most influence in this country. Hutcheson, Law, Paley, Priestley, Bentham belong, no doubt some of them unconsciously, to the school founded by Cumberland. Hutcheson adopted the principle of general benevolence as the standard of virtue; but by limiting the definition of good to happiness alone, he simplified the scheme of Cumberland, who had included conservation and enlargement of capacity in its definition. He rejected also what encumbers the whole system of his predecessor, the including the Supreme Being among those rational agents whose good we are bound to promote. The schoolmen, as well as those whom they followed, deeming it necessary to predicate metaphysical infinity of all the divine attributes, reckoned unalterable beatitude in the number. Upon such a subject no wise man would like to dogmatise. The difficulties on both sides are very great, and perhaps among the most intricate to which the momentous problem concerning the cause of evil has given rise. Cumberland, whose mind does not seem to have been much framed to wrestle with mysteries, evades, in his lax verbosity, what might perplex his readers.

Cap. viir. seet. 14, 15.

34. In establishing the will of a supreme lawgiver as essential to the law of nature, he is followed by the bishop of Carlisle and Paley, as well as by the majority of English moralists in the eighteenth century. But while Paley deems the recognition of a future state so essential, that he even includes in the definition of virtue that it is performed "for the sake of everlasting happiness," Cumberland not only omits this erroneous and almost paradoxical condition, but very slightly alludes to another life, though he thinks it probable from the stings of conscience and on other grounds; resting the whole argument on the certain consequences of virtue and vice in the present, but guarding justly against the supposition that any difference of happiness in moral agents can affect the immediate question except such as is the mere result of their own behaviour. If any one had urged, like Paley, that unless we take a future state into consideration, the result of calculating our own advantage will either not always be in favour of virtue, or in consequence of the violence of passion will not always seem so, Cumberland would probably have denied the former alternative, and replied to the other, that we can only prove the truth of our theorems in moral philosophy, and cannot compel men to adopt them.

35. Sir James Mackintosh, whose notice of Cumberland is rather too superficial, and hardly recognises his influence on philosophy, observes, that " the forms of scholastic argument serve more to encumber his style than to insure his exactness." There is not however much of scholastic form in the treatise on the Laws of Nature, and this is expressly disclaimed in the preface. But he has, as we have intimated, a great deal too much of a mathematical line of argument which never illustrates his meaning, and has sometimes misled his judgment. We owe probably to his fondness for this specious illusion, I mean the application of reasonings upon quantity to moral subjects, the dangerous sophism that a direct calculation of the highest good, and that not relatively to particulars, but to all rational beings, is the measure of virtuous actions, the test by which we are to try our own conduct and that of others. And the intervention of general rules, by which Paley endeavoured to dilute and render palatable this calculating scheme of utility, seems no more to have occurred to Cumberland than it was adopted by Bentham.

Sb. Thus as Taylor's Ductor Dubitantium is nearly the last of a declining school, Cumberland's Law of Nature may be justly considered as the herald, especially in England, of a new ethical philosophy; of which the main characteristics were, first, that it stood complete in itself without the aid of revelation; secondly, that it appealed to no authority of earlier writers whatever, though it sometimes used them in illustration; thirdly, that it availed itself of observation and experience, alleging them generally, but abstaining from particular instances of either, and making, above all, no display of erudition; and, fourthly, that it entered very little upon casnistry, leaving the application of principles to the reader.

37. In the same year, 1672, a work still more generally distinguished than that of Cumberland was published purposed at Lund, in Sweden, by Samuel Puffendorf, a Saxon by birth, who filled the chair of moral philosophy in that recently-founded university. This large treatise, On the Law of Nature and Nations, in eight books, was abridged by the author, but not without some variations, in one perhaps more useful, On the Daties of a Man and a Citizen. Both have been translated into French and English; both were long studied in the foreign universities, and even in our own. Puffendorf has been perhaps, in moral philosophy, of greater authority than Grotius, with whom he is frequently named in conjunction; but this is not the case in international jurisprudence.

Dimertation on Ethical Philosophy, p. 48,

38. Puffendorf, after a very diffuse and technical chapter Analists of on moral beings, or modes, proceeds to assert a demonstrative certainty in moral science, but seems not to maintain an inherent right and wrong in actions autecedent to all law, referring the rule of morality altogether to the divine appointment. He ends however by admitting that man's constitution being what it is, God could not without inconsistency have given him any other law than that under which he lives. We discern good from evil by the understanding, which judgment when exercised on our own actions is called conscience; but he strongly protests against any such jurisdiction of conscience, independent of reason and knowledge, as some have asserted. This notion "was first introduced by the schoolmen, and has been maintained in these latter ages by the crafty casuists for the better securing of men's minds and fortunes to their own fortune and advantage."† Puffendorf was a good deal imbued with the Lutheran bigotry which did no justice to any religion but its own.

S9. Law alone creates obligation; no one can be obliged except towards a superior. But to compel and to oblige being different things, it is required for this latter that we should have received some great good at the hands of a superior, or have voluntarily submitted to his will. This seems to involve an antecedent moral right, which Puffendorf's general theory denies. Barbeyrac, his able and watchful commentator, derives obligation from our natural dependence on the supreme authority of God, who can punish the disobedient and reward others. In order to make laws obligatory, it is necessary, according to Puffendorf, that we should know both the law and the lawgiver's authority. Actions are good or evil, as they conform more or less to law. And, coming to consider the peculiar qualities of moral actions, he introduces the distinction of perfect and imperfect rights, objecting to that of Grotius and the Roman lawyers, expletive and distributive justice. This first book of Puffeudorf is very diffuse; and some chapters are wholly omitted in the abridgement.

40. The natural state of man, such as in theory we may suppose, is one in which he was never placed, "thrown into the world at a venture, and then left entirely to himself with no larger endowments of body or mind than such as we now discover in men." This, however, he seems to think physically possible to have been, which I should incline to question. Man in a state of nature is subject to no earthly superior; but we must not infer thence that he is incapable of law, and has a right to every thing that is profitable to himself. But, after discussing the position of Hobbes that a state of nature is a state of war, he ends by admitting that the desire of peace is too weak and uncertain a security for its preservation among mankind. †

41. The law of nature he derives not from consent of nations, nor from personal utility, but from the condition of man. It is discoverable by reason; its obligation is from He denies that it is founded on the intrinsic honesty or turpitude of actions. It was free to God whether he would create an animal to whom the present law of nature should be applicable. But supposing all things human to remain constant, the law of nature, though owing its institution to the free will of God, remains unalterable. He therefore neither agrees wholly with those who deem of this law as of one arbitrary and mutable at God's pleasure, nor with those who look upon it as an image of his essential holmess and justice. For he doubts whether the law of nature is altogether conformed to the divine attributes as to a type; since we cannot acquire a right with respect to God; so that his justice must be of a different kind from ours. Common consent, again, is an insufficient basis of natural law, few men having searched into the foundations of their assent, even if we could find a more general consent than is the case. And here he expatiates, in the style of Montaigne's school, on the variety of moral opinions. Puffendorf next attacks those who resolve right into self-interest. But unfortunately he only proves that men often mistake their interest. It is a great mistake to fancy it will be profitable to you to take away either by fraud or violence what another man has acquired by his labour; since others have not only the power of resisting you, but of taking the same freedom with your goods and possessions."† This is evidently no answer to Hobbes or Spinosa.

42. The nature of man, his wants, his powers of doing mischief to others, his means of mutual assistance, show that he cannot be supported in things necessary and convenient to him without society, so that others may promote his interests. Hence sociableness is a primary law of nature, and all actions tending towards it are commanded, as the opposite are forbidden by that law. In this he agrees with Grotius; and, after he had become acquainted with Cumberland's work, observes that the fundamental law of that writer, to live for the common good and show benevolence towards all men, does not differ from his own. He partly explains, and partly answers, the theory of Hobbes. From Grotius he dissents in denying that the law of nature would be binding without religion, but does not think the soul's immortality essential to it. ! The best division of natural law is into duties towards ourselves and towards others. But in the abridged work, the Duties of a Man and a Citizen, he adds those towards God.

4S. The former class of duties he illustrates with much probxity and needless quotation §, and passes to the right of self-defence, which seems to be the debatable frontier between the two classes of obligation. In this chapter Puffendorf is free from the extreme scrupulousness of Grotius; yet he differs from him, as well as from Barbeyrac and Locke, in denying the right of attacking the aggressor, where a stranger has been injured, unless where we are bound to him by promise.

44. All persons, as is evident, are bound to repair wilful injury, and even that arising from their neglect; but not where they have not been in fault. Yet the civil action ob pauperiem, for casual damage by a beast or slave, which Grotius held to be merely of positive law, and which our own (in the only applicable case) does not recognise, Puffendorf thinks grounded on natural right. He considers several questions of reparation, chiefly such as we find in Grotius. From these, after some intermediate disquisitions on moral duties, he comes to the more extensive province of casuistry, the obligation of promises. † These, for the most part, give perfect rights which may be enforced, though this is not universal; hence promises may themselves be called imperperfect or perfect. The former, or nuda pacta, seem to be obligatory rather by the rules of veracity, and for the sake of maintaining confidence among men, than in strict justice; yet he endeavours to refute the opinion of a jurist who held nuda pacta to involve no obligation beyond a compensation for damage. Free consent and knowledge of the whole subject are required for the validity of a promise; hence drunkenness takes away its obligation. Whether a minor is bound in conscience, though not in law, has been disputed; the Romish casuists all denying it unless he has received an advantage. La Placette, it seems, after the time of Puffendorf, though a very rigid moralist, confines the obligation to cases where the other party sustains any real damage by the non-performance. The world, in some instances at least, would exact more than the strictest casuists. Promises were invalidated, though not always mutual contracts, by error; and fraud in the other party annuls a contract. There can be no obligation, Puffendorf maintains, without a corresponding right; hence fear arising from the fault of the other party invalidates a promise. But those made to pirates or rebels, not being extorted by fear, are binding. Vows to God he deems not binding, unless accepted by him; but he thinks that we may presume their acceptance when they serve to define or specify an indeterminate daty. § Unlawful promises must not be performed by the party promising to commit an evil act, and as to performance of the other party's promise, he differs from Grotius in thinking it not binding. Barbeyrac concurs with Pullendorf, but Paley holds the contrary; and the common sentiments of mankind seem to be on that side. .

45. The obligations of veracity Puffendorf, after much needless prolixity on the nature of signs and words, deduces from a tacit contract among mankind, that words, or signs of intention, shall be used in a definite sense which others may understand, t He is rather fond of these imaginary compacts. The laxer casuists are in nothing more distinguishable from the more rigid than in the exceptions they allow to the general rule of veracity. Many, like Augustin and most of the fathers, have laid it down that all falsehood is unlawful; even some of the jurists, when treating of morality, had done the same. But Puffendorf gives considerable latitude to deviations from truth, by mental reserve, by ambiguous words, by direct falschood. Barbeyrac, in a long note, goes a good deal farther, and indeed beyond any safe limit. I An outh, according to these writers, adds no peculiar obligation; another remarkable discrepancy between their system and that of the theological casuists. Oaths may be released by the party in favour of whom they are made; but it is necessary to observe whether the dispensing authority is really the obligee.

46. We now advance to a different part of moral philosophy, the rights of property. Puffendorf first inquires into the natural right of killing animals for food; but does not defend it very well, resting this right on the want of mutual obligation between man and brutes. The arguments from physiology, and the manifest propensity in mankind to devour

[†] I in c l. Barbeyrae admits that several writers of sutnerty since Peffenderf had ma ntained the strict obligation of seracity for its own cake . Thousans, Budda is, Soudt, and, shore all, In Pointte His own not one are too much the other way, both according to the received standard of honourable and decorons character among men, and according to any sound theory of ethics. Lying, be says, as condemned in Scripture, always rooms fraud or injury to others. His doctrine is, that we are to speak the truth, or to be silent, or to lege and desamble, according as our own lawful interest, or that of our neighbour, may demand it. This is enrely as onermble one way is any paradox in Augustin or La Placette can be the other animals, are much stronger. He censures cruelty towards animals, but hardly on clear grounds; the disregard of moral emotion, which belongs to his philosophy, prevents his judging it rightly. Property itself in things he grounds on an express or tacit contract of mankind, while all was yet in common, that each should possess a separate portion. This covenant he supposes to have been gradually extended, as men perceived the advantage of separate possession, lands having been cultivated in common after severalty had been established in houses and movable goods; and he refutes those who maintain property to be coeval with mankind, and immediately founded on the law of nature, t Nothing can be the subject of property which is incapable of exclusive occupation; not therefore the ocean, though some narrow seas may be appropriated. In the remainder of this fourth book he treats on a variety of subjects connected with property, which carry us over a wide field of natural and positive jurisprudence.

47. The fifth book of Puffendorf relates to price, and to all contracts onerous or lucrative, according to the distinction of the jurists, with the rules of their interpretation. It is a running criticism on the Roman law, comparing it with right reason and justice. Price he divides into proper and eminent; the first being what we call real value, or capacity of procuring things desirable by means of exchange; the second the money value. What is said on this subject would now seem common-place and prolix; but it is rather interesting to observe the beginnings of political economy. Money, he thinks, was introduced by an agreement of civilised nations, as a measure of value. Puffendorf, of more enlarged views than Grotius, vindicates usury which the other had given up; and mentions the evasions usually practised, such as the grant of an annuity for a limited term.

48. In the sixth book we have disquisitions on matrimony and the rights incident to it, on paternal and on herile power. Among other questions he raises one whether the husband has any natural dominion over the wife. This he thinks hard

 $^{^{\}circ}$ C. 3. right of property on individual occurring this assumed compact, and rests the \pm C \pm to prove, except as his sex gives him an advantage; but fitness to govern does not create a right. He has recourse therefore to his usual solution, her tacit or express promise of obedience. Polygamy he deems contrary to the law of nature, but not incest, except in the direct line. This is consonant to what had been the general determination of philosophers. The right of parents he derives from the general duty of sociableness, which makes preservation of children necessary, and on the affection implanted in them by nature; also on a presumed consent of the children in return for their maintenance. † In a state of nature this command belongs to the mother, unless she has waived it by a matrimonial contract. In childhood, the fruits of the child's labour belong to the father, though the former seems to be capable of receiving gifts. Fathers, as heads of families, have a kind of sovereignty, distinct from the paternal, to which adult children residing with them are submitted. But after their emancipation by leaving their father's house, which does not absolutely require his consent, they are bound only to duty and reverence. The power of a master over his servant is not by nature, nor by the law of war, but originally by a contract founded on necessity. War increased the number of those in servitude. A slave, whatever Hobbes may say, is capable of being injured by his master; but the laws of some nations give more power to the latter than is warranted by those of nature. Servitude implies only an obligation to perpetual labour for a recompence (namely, at least maintenance); the evil necessary to this condition has been much exaggerated by opinion. 1

Puffendorf and Cumberland are the two great promoters, if not founders, of that school in ethics, which abandoning the higher ground of both philosophers and theologians, that of an intrinsic fitness and propriety in actions, resolved them all into their conduciveness towards good. Their utile indeed is very different from what Creero has so named, which is merely personal, but it is different also from his honextum. The sociableness of Puffendorf is perhaps much the same with the general good of Cumberland, but is somewhat less comprehensive and less clear. Paley, who had not read a great deal, had certainly read Puffeudorf; he has borrowed from him several minor illustrations, such as the equivocal promise of Timur (called by Paley Temures) to the garrison of Sebastia, and the rules for division of profits in partnership. Their minds were in some respects alike; both phlegmatic, honest, and sincere, without warmth or fancy; yet there seems a more thorough good-nature and kindliness of heart in our countryman. Though an ennobled German, Puffendorf had as little respect for the law of honour as Paley himself. They do not, indeed, resemble each other in their modes of writing; one was very laborious, the other very indolent; one sometimes misses his mark by circuity, the other by precipitance. The quotations in Pullendorf are often as thickly strewed as in Grotius, though he takes less from the poets; but he seems not to build upon their authority, which gives them still more the air of superfluity. His theory, indeed, which assigns no weight to any thing but a close geometrical deduction from axioms, is incompatible with much deference to authority; and he sets aside the customs of mankind as unstable and arbitrary. He has not taken much from Hobbes, whose principles are far from his, but a great deal from Grotius. The leading difference between the treatises of these celebrated men is that, while the former contemplated the law that ought to be observed among independent communities as his primary object, to render which more evident he lays down the fundamental principles of private right or the law of nature, the latter, on the other hand, not only begins with natural law, but makes it the great theme of his inquiries.

50. Few books have been more highly extolled or more severely blamed than the Thoughts or Maxims of nocheon the Duke of la Rochefoucault. They have, indeed, the greatest advantages for popularity; the production of a man less distinguished by his high rank than by his active participation in the factions of his country at a time when they reached the limits of civil war, and by his brilliancy among the accomplished courtiers of Louis XIV.; concise and energetic in expression; reduced to those short aphorisms which leave much to the reader's acuteness, and yet save his labour; not often obscure, and never wearisome; an evident generalisation of long experience, without pedantry, without method, without deductive reasonings, yet wearing an appearance at least of profundity, they delight the intelligent though indolent man of the world, and must be read with some admiration by the philosopher. Among the books in ancient and modern times which record the conclusions of observing men on the moral qualities of their fellows, a high place should be reserved for the Maxims of Rochefoucault.

51. The censure that has so heavily fallen upon this writer is founded on his proneness to assign a low and selfish motive to human actions, and even to those which are most usually denominated virtuous. It is impossible to dispute the partial truth of this charge. Yet it may be pleaded, that many of his maxims are not universal even in their enunciation; and that, in others, where, for the sake of a more effective expression, the position seems general, we ought to understand it with such limitations as our experience may suggest. society with which the Duke of la Rochefoucault was conversant could not elevate his notions of disinterested probity in man, or of unblemished purity in woman. Those who call themselves the world, it is easy to perceive, set aside, in their remarks on human nature, all the species but themselves, and sometimes generalise their maxims, to an amusing degree, from the manners and sentiments which have grown up in the atmosphere of a court or an aristocratic society. Rochefoucault was of far too reflecting a mind to be confounded with such mere worldlings; yet he bears witness to the contracted observation and the precipitate inferences which au intercourse with a single class of society scarcely fails to generate. The malignity of Rochefoucault is always directed against the false virtues of mankind, but never touches the reality of moral truths, and leaves us less injured than the cold, heartless indifference to right which distils from the pages of Hobbes. Nor does he deal in those sweeping denials of goodness to human nature which are so frequently hazarded under the mask of religion. His maxims are not exempt from defects of a different kind; they are sometimes refined to a degree of obscurity, and sometimes, under an epigrammatic turn, convey little more than a trivial meaning.

Perhaps, however, it would be just to say that one third of the number deserve to be remembered, as at least partially true and useful; and this is a large proportion, if we exclude all that are not in some measure original,

52. The Characters of La Bruyere, published in 1687, approach to the Maxims of La Rochefoucault by La Bruyere their refinement, their brevity, their general tendency to an unfavourable explanation of human conduct. This nevertheless is not so strongly marked, and the picture of selfishness wants the darkest touches of his contemporary's colouring. La Bruyere had a model in antiquity, Theophrastus, whose short book of Characters he had himself translated, and prefixed to his own; a step not impolitic for his own glory, since the Greek writer, with no contemptible degree of merit, has been incomparably surpassed by his imitator. Many changes in the condition of society, the greater diversity of ranks and occupations in modern Europe, the influence of women over the other sex, as well as their own varieties of character and manners, the effects of religion, learning, chivalry, royalty, have given a range to this very pleasing department of moral literature which no ancient could have compassed. Nor has Theophrastus taken much pains to search the springs of character; his delineations are bold and clear, but merely in outline; we see more of manners than of nature, and the former more in general classes than in portraiture. La Bruyere has often painted single persons; whether accurately or no, we cannot at this time determine, but with a felicity of description which at once renders the likeness probable, and suggests its application to those we ourselves have seen. His general reflections, like those of Rochefoucault, are brilliant with antithesis and epigrammatic conciseness; sometimes perhaps not quite just or quite perspicuous. But he pleases more, on the whole, from his greater variety, his greater liveliness, and his gentler spirit of raillery. Nor does he forget to mingle the praise of some with his satire. But he is rather a hold writer for his age and his position in the court, and what looks like flattery may well have been ironical. Few have been more imitated, as well as more admired, than La Brayere, who fills up the list of those whom France has bousted as most conspicuous for their knowledge of human nature. The others are Montaigne, Charron, Pascal, and Rochefoucault; but we might withdraw the second name without injustice.

53. Moral philosophy comprehends in its literature whatever has been written on the best theory and precepts of moral education, disregarding what is con-Practate. fined to erudition, though this may frequently be partially treated in works of the former class. Education, notwithstanding its recognised importance, was miserably neglected in England, and quite as much, perhaps, in every part of Europe. Schools, kept by low-born illiberal pedants, teaching little, and that little ill, without regard to any judicious discipline or moral culture, on the one hand, or, on the other, a pretence of instruction at home under some ignorant and servile tutor, seem to have been the alternatives of our juvenile gentry. Milton raised his voice against these faulty methods in his short Tractate on Education. This abounds with bursts of his elevated spirit; and sketches out a model of public colleges, wherein the teaching should be more comprehensive, more liberal, more accommodated to what he deems the great aim of education than what was in use. "That," he says, "I call a complete and generous education which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices both private and public, of peace and war." But when Milton descends to specify the course of studies he would recommend, it appears singularly ill-chosen and impracticable, nearly confined to ancient writers, even in mathematics and other subjects where they could not be sufficient, and likely to leave the student very far from that aptitude for offices of war and peace which he had held forth as the reward of his diligence.

oducation with all the advantages that a strong understanding and entire disinterestedness could give him; but, as we should imagine, with some necessary deficiencies of experience, though we hardly perceive much of them in his writings. He looked on the methods usual in his age with severity, or, some would say, with prejudice; yet I know not by what proof we can refute his testimony. In his Treatise on Education, which may be reckoned an introduction to that on the Conduct of the Understanding, since the latter is but a scheme of that education an adult person should give himself, he has uttered, to say the least, more good sense on the subject than will be found in any preceding writer. Locke was not like the pedants of his own or other ages, who think that to pour their wordy book-learning into the memory is the true discipline of childhood. The culture of the intellectual and moral faculties in their most extensive sense, the health of the body, the accomplishments which common utility or social custom have rendered valuable, enter into his idea of the best model of education, conjointly at least with any knowledge that can be imparted by books. The ancients had written in the same spirit; in Xenophon, in Plato, in Aristotle, the noble conception which Milton has expressed, of forming the perfect man, is always predominant over mere literary instruction, if indeed the latter can be said to appear at all in their writings on this subject; but we had become the dupes of schoolmasters in our riper years, as we had been their slaves in our youth. Much has been written, and often well, since the days of Locke; but he is the chief source from which it has been ultimately derived; and though the Emile is more attractive in manner, it may be doubtful whether it is as rational and practicable as the Treatise on Education. If they have both the same defect, that their authors wanted sufficient observation of children, it is certain that the caution and sound judgment of Locke have rescued him better from

55. There are, indeed, from this or from other causes, several passages in the Treatise on Education to which we cannot give an unhesitating assent. Locke appears to have somewhat exaggerated the efficacy of education. This is an error on the right side in a work that aims at persuasion in a practical matter; but we are now looking at theoretical truth alone. "I think I may say," he begins, "that of all the men we meet with nine parts of ten are what they are, good or evil, useful or not, by their education. It is this which makes the great difference in mankind. The little or almost insensible impressions on our tender infancies have very important and lasting consequences; and there 'tis as in the fountains of some rivers, where a gentle application of the hand turns the flexible waters into channels that make them take quite contrary courses; and by this little direction given them at first in the source, they receive different tendencies, and arrive at last at very remote and distant places." I imagine," he adds soon afterwards, "the minds of children as easily turned this or that way as water itself."

56. This passage is an instance of Locke's unfortunate fondness for analogical parallels, which, as far as I have observed, much more frequently obscure a philosophical theorem than shed any light upon it. Nothing would be easier than to confirm the contrary proposition by such fanciful analogies from external nature. In itself, the position is hyperbolical to extravagance. It is no more disparagement to the uses of education, that it will not produce the like effects upon every individual, than it is to those of agriculture (I purposely use this sort of idle analogy) that we do not reap the same quantity of corn from every soil. Those who are conversant with children on a large scale will, I believe, unanimously deny this levelling efficacy of tuition. The variety of characters even in children of the same family, where the domestic associations of infancy have run in the same trains, and where many physical congenialities may produce, and ordinarily do produce, a moral resemblance, is of sufficiently frequent occurrence to prove that in human beings there are intrinsic dissimilitudes, which no education can essentially overcome. Among mere theorists, however, this hypothesis seems to be popular. And as many of these extend their notion of the plasticity of human nature to the effects of government and legislation, which is a sort of continuance of the same controlling power, they are generally induced to disregard past experience of human affairs, because they flatter themselves that under a more scientific administration, mankind will become something very different from what they have been.

57. In the age of Locke, if we may confide in what he tells us, the domestic education of children must have been of the worst kind. "If we look," he says, "into the common Treatise on Education, § 2.

 The men is owing more to their education difference, "he afterwards vays, " to be than to any thing die." § 42.
 found in the manners and abelities of management of children we shall have reason to wonder, in the great dissoluteness of manners which the world complains of, that there are any footsteps at all left of virtue. I desire to know what vice can be named which parents and those about children do not season them with, and drop into them the seeds of, as often as they are capable to receive them." The mode of treatment seems to have been passionate and often barbarous severity alternating with foolish indulgence. Their spirits were often broken down, and their ingenuousness destroyed by the former; their habits of self-will and sensuality confirmed by the latter. This was the method pursued by parents; but the pedagogues of course confined themselves to their favourite scheme of instruction and reformation by punishment. Dugald Stewart has animadverted on the austerity of Locke's rules of education." And this is certainly the case in some respects. He recommends that children should be taught to expect nothing because it will give them pleasure, but only what will be useful to them; a rule fit, in its rigid meaning, to destroy the pleasure of the present moment, in the only period of life that the present moment can be really enjoyed. No father himself, Locke neither knew how ill a parent can spare the love of his child, nor how ill a child can want the constant and practical sense of a parent's love. But if he was led too far by deprecating the mischievous indulgence he had sometimes witnessed, he made some amends by his censures on the prevalent discipline of stripes. Of this he speaks with the disapprobation natural to a mind already schooled in the habits of reason and virtue,† "I cannot think any correction useful to a child where the shame of suffering for having done amiss does not work more upon him than the pain." Esteem and disgrace are the rewards and punishments to which be principally looks. And surely this is a noble foundation for moral discipline. He

^{*} Preliminary Dissertation to Ency-

if "If severity carried to the highest pitch does prevail, and works a cure upon the present unculy distemper, it is often bringing in the room of it a worse and more dangerous discase by breaking the mind, and then in the place of a disorderly young fellow, you have a low-aparited moved creature, who however with his immatural solution by he may please stilly people, who commend terms make accordance because they make no noise, nor give them any trouble, yet at last will prescribly prove as uncomformble a thing to his friends, us he will be all his his an useless thing to himself and others." § 51.

also recommends that children should be much with their parents, and allowed all reasonable liberty. I cannot think that Stewart's phrase "hardness of character," which he accounts for by the early intercourse of Locke with the l'aritans, is justly applicable to any thing that we know of him; and many more passages in this very treatise might be adduced to prove his kindliness of disposition, than will appear to any judicious person over-austere. He found, in fact, every thing wrong; a false system of reward and punishment, a false view of the objects of education, a false selection of studies, false methods of pursuing them. Where so much was to be corrected, it was perhaps natural to be too sangune about the effects of the remedy.

58. Of the old dispute as to public and private education he says, that both sides have their inconveniencies, but inclines to prefer the latter, influenced, as is evident, rather by disgust at the state of our schools than by any general principle." For he insists much on the necessity of giving a boy a sufficient knowledge of what he is to expect in the world. "The longer he is kept hoodwinked, the less he will see when he comes abroad into open daylight, and be the more exposed to be a prey to himself and others." But this experience will, as is daily seen, not be supplied by a tutor's lectures, any more than by books; nor can be given by any course save a public education. Locke urges the necessity of having a tutor well-bred, and with knowledge of the world, the ways, the humours, the follies, the cheats, the faults of the age he is fallen into, and particularly of the country he lives in, as of far more importance than his scholarship, "The only fence against the world is a thorough knowledge of it. . . . He that thinks not this of more moment to his son, and for which he more needs a governor, than the languages and learned sciences, forgets of how much more use it is to judge right of men and manage his affairs wisely with them, than to speak Greek and Latin, and argue in mood and figure, or to have his head filled with the abstruse speculations of natural philosophy and metaphysics; nay, than to be well versed in Greek and Roman writers, though that be much better for a gentleman, than to be a good Peripatetic or Cartesian; because these ancient authors observed and painted mankind well, and give the best light into that kind of knowledge. He that goes into the eastern parts of Asia will find able and acceptable men without any of these; but without virtue, knowledge of the world, and civility, an accomplished and valuable man can be found nowhere."

59. It is to be remembered, that the person whose education Locke undertakes to fashion is an English gentleman. Virtue, wisdom, breeding, and learning, are desirable for such a one in their order, but the last not so much as the rest, t It must be had, he says, but only as subscrient to greater qualities. No objections have been more frequently raised against the scheme of Locke than on account of his depreciation of classical literature and of the study of the learned languages. This is not wholly true; Latin be reckons absolutely necessary for a gentleman, though it is absurd that those should learn Latin who are designed for trade, and never look again at a Latin book. I If he lays not so much stress on Greek as a gentleman's study, though he by no means would abandon it, it is because, in fact, most gentlemen, especially in his age, have done very well without it; and nothing can be deemed indispensable in education of a child, the want of which does not leave a manifest deficiency in the man. "No man," he observes, "can pass for a scholar who is ignorant of the Greek language. But I am not here considering of the education of a professed scholar, but of a gentleman." §

60. The peculiar methods recommended by Locke in learning languages, especially the Latin, appear to be of very doubtful utility, though some of them do not want strenuous supporters in the present day. Such are the method of interlinear translation, the learning of mere words without grammar, and above all, the practice of talking Latin with a tutor who speaks it well—a phenix whom he has not shown us where to find. In general, he seems to underrate the difficulty of acquiring what even he would call a competent learning, and what is of more importance, and no rare mistake in those who write on this subject, to confound the acquisition of a language with the knowledge of its literature. The best ancient writers both in Greek and Latin furnish so much of wise reflection, of noble sentiment, of all that is beautiful and salutary, that no one who has had the happiness to know and feel what they are, will desire to see their study excluded or stinted in its just extent, wherever the education of those who are to be the first and best of the country is carried forward. And though by far the greater portion of mankind must, by the very force of terms, remain in the ranks of intellectual mediocrity, it is an ominous sign of any times when no thought is taken for those who may rise beyond it,

61. In every other part of instruction, Locke has still an eye to what is useful for a gentleman. French he justly thinks should be taught before Latin; no geometry is required by him beyond Euclid, but he recommends geography, history and chronology, drawing, and what may be thought now as little necessary for a gentleman as Homer, the jurisprudence of Grotius and Putlendorf. He strongly urges the writing English well, though a thing commonly neglected; and after speaking with contempt of the artificial systems of logic and rhetoric, sends the pupil to Chillingworth for the best example of reasoning, and to Tully for the best idea of eloquence. "And let him read those things that are well writ in English to perfect his style in the purity of our language."

62. It would be to transcribe half this treatise, were we to mention all the judicious and minute observations on the management of children it contains. Whatever may have been Locke's opportunities, he certainly availed himself of them to the utmost. It is as far as possible from a theoretical book; and in many respects the best of modern times, such as those of the Edgeworth name, might pass for developments of his principles. The patient attention to every circumstance, a pecuhar characteristic of the genius of Locke, is in none of his works better displayed. His rules for the health of children, though sometimes trivial, since the subject has been more regarded, his excellent advice as to checking effeminary and timorousness, his observations on their curiosity, presumption, idleness, on their plays and recreations, bespeak an intense, though calm, love of truth and goodness; a quality which few have possessed more fully or known so well how to exert as this admirable philosopher.

VOL. III.

63. No one had condescended to spare any thoughts for female education, till Fencion, in 1688, published his earliest work, Sur l'Education des Filles. This was & the occasion of his appointment as preceptor to the grandchildren of Louis XIV.; for much of this treatise, and perhaps the most valuable part, is equally applicable to both sexes. It may be compared with that of Locke, written nearly at the same time, and bearing a great resemblance in its spirit. Both have the education of a polished and highbred class, rather than of scholars, before them; and Fenelon rarely loses sight of his peculiar object, or gives any rule which is not capable of being practised in female education. In many respects he coincides with our English philosopher, and observes with him that a child learns much before he speaks, so that the cultivation of his moral qualities can hardly begin too soon. Both complain of the severity of parents, and deprecate the mode of bringing up by punishment. Both advise the exhibition of virtue and religion in pleasing lights, and censure the austere dogmatism with which they were inculcated, before the mind was sufficiently developed to apprehend them. But the characteristic sweetness of Fenelon's disposition is often shown in contrast with the somewhat stern inflexibility of Locke. His theory is uniformly indulgent; his method of education is a labour of love; a desire to render children happy for the time, as well as afterwards, runs through his book, and he may perhaps be considered the founder of that school which has endeavoured to dissipate the terrors and dry the tears of childhood. "I have seen," he says, "many children who have learned to read in play; we have only to read entertaining stories to them out of a book, and insensibly teach them the letters, they will soon desire to go for themselves to the source of their amusement." " Books should be given them well bound and gilt, with good engravings, clear types; for all that captivates the imagination facilitates study; the choice should be such as contain short and marvellous stories." These details are now trivial, but in the days of Fenelon they may have been otherwise.

64. In several passages he displays not only a judicious spirit, but an observation that must have been long exercised. " Of all the qualities we perceive in children," he remarks, "there is only one that can be trusted as likely to be durable, which is sound judgment; it always grows with their growth, if it is well cultivated; but the grace of childhood is effaced; its vivacity is extinguished; even its sensibility is often lost, because their own passions and the intercourse of others insensibly harden the hearts of young persons who enter into the world." It is, therefore, a solid and just way of thinking which we should most value and most improve, and this not by any means less in girls than in the other sex, since their duties and the occupations they are called upon to fill do not less require it. Hence he not only deprecates an excessive taste for dress, but, with more originality, points out the danger of that extreme delicacy and refinement which incapacitate women for the ordinary affairs of life, and give them a contempt for a country life and rural economy.

65. It will be justly thought at present, that he discourages too much the acquisition of knowledge by women. " Keep their minds," he says in one place, "as much as you can within the usual limits, and let them understand that the modesty of their sex ought to shrink from science with almost as much delicacy as from vice." This seems, however, to be confined to science or philosophy in a strict sense; for be permits afterwards a larger compass of reading. Women should write a good hand, understand orthography and the four rules of arithmetic, which they will want in domestic affairs. To these he requires a close attention, and even recommends to women an acquaintance with some of the common forms and maxims of law. Greek, Roman, and French history, with the best travels, will be valuable, and keep them from seeking pernicious fictions. Books also of eloquence and poetry may be read with selection, taking care to avoid any that relate to love; music and painting may be taught with the same precaution. The Italian and Spanish languages are of no use but to enlarge their knowledge of dangerous books; Latin is better as the language of the church; but this he would recommend only for girls of good sense and discreet conduct, who will make no display of the acquisition.

SECT. II. - ON POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.

Puffondorf - Spinora - Harrington's Oceana - Locke on Government - Political Economy,

66. In the seventh book of Puffendorf's great work, he comes to political philosophy, towards which he had been gradually tending for some time; primary societies, there's primary societies, there's or those of families, leading the way to the consideration of civil government. Grotius derives the origin of this from the natural sociableness of mankind. But this, as Puffendorf remarks, may be satisfied by the primary societies. The real cause was experience of the injuries which one man can inflict on another. And, after a prolix disquisition, he concludes that civil society must have been constituted. first, by a covenant of a number of men, each with each, to form a commonwealth, and to be bound by the majority, in which primary covenant they must be unanimous, that is, every dissentient would retain his natural liberty; next, by a resolution or decree of the majority, that certain rulers shall govern the rest; and, lastly, by a second covenant between these rulers and the rest, one promising to take care of the public weal, and the other to obey lawful commands. † This covenant, as he attempts to show, exists even in a democracy, though it is less evident than in other forms. Hobbes had admitted the first of these covenants, but denied the second; Barbeyrac, the able commentator on Puffendorf, has done exactly the reverse. A state once formed may be conceived to exist as one person, with a single will, represented by that of the sovereign, wherever the sovereignty may be placed. This sovereignty is founded on the covenants, and is not conferred.

except indirectly like every other human power, by God. Puffendorf here combats the opposite opinion, which churchmen were as prone to hold, it seems, in Germany as in England.

67. The legislative, punitive, and judiciary powers, those of making war and peace, of appointing magistrates, and levving taxes, are so closely connected that no one can be denied to the sovereign. As to his right in ecclesiastical matters, Puffendorf leaves it for others to determine. † He seems in this part of the work too fayourable to unlimited monarchy, declaring himself against a mixed government. The sovereign power must be irresponsible, and cannot be bound by the law which itself has given. He even denies that all government is intended for the good of the governed -a position strangely inconsistent with his theory of a covenant - but he contends that, if it were, this end, the public good, may be more probably discerned by the prince than by the people. 1 Yet he admits that the exorbitances of a prince should be restrained by certain fundamental laws, and holds, that having accepted such, and ratified them by oath, he is not at liberty to break them; arguing, with some apparent inconsistency, against those who maintain such limitations to be inconsistent with monarchy, and even recommending the institution of councils, without whose consent certain acts of the sovereign shall not be valid. This can only be reconciled with his former declaration against a mixed sovereignty, by the distinction familiar to our own constitutional lawyers, between the joint acts of A. and B., and the acts of A. with B.'s consent. But this is a little too technical and unreal for philosophical politics. Governments not reducible to one of the three simple forms he calls irregular; such as the Roman republic or German empire. But there may be systems of states, or aggregate communities, either subject to one king by different titles, or united by federation. He inclines to deny that the majority can bind the minority in the latter case, and seems to take it for granted that some of the confederates can quit the league at pleasure. §

68. Sovereignty over persons cannot be acquired, strictly speaking, by scizure or occupation, as in the case of lands, and requires, even after conquest, their consent to obey; which will be given, in order to secure themselves from the other rights of war. It is a problem whether, after an unjust conquest, the forced consent of the people can give a lawful title to sovereignty. Puffcadorf distinguishes between a monarchy and a republic thus unjustly subdued. In the former case, so long as the lawful heirs exist or preserve their claim, the duty of restitution continues. But in the latter, as the people may live as happily under a monarchy as under a republic, he thinks that an usurper has only to treat them well, without scruple as to his title. If he oppresses them, no course of years will make his title lawful, or bind them in conscience to obey, length of possession being only length of injury. If a sovereign has been justly divested of his power, the community becomes immediately free; but if by unjust rebellion, his right continues till by silence he has appeared to abandon it.

6 C. S.

69. Every one will agree that a lawful ruler must not be opposed within the limits of his authority. But let us put the case that he should command what is unlawful, or maltreat his subjects. Whatever Hobbes may say, a subject may be injured by his sovereign. But we should bear minor injuries patiently, and in the worst cases avoid personal resistance. Those are not to be listened to who assert that a king, degenerating into a tyrant, may be resisted and punished by his people. He admits only a right of self-defence, if he manifestly becomes a public enemy: in all this he seems to go quite as far as Grotius himself. The next question is as to the right of invaders and usurpers to obedience. This, it will be observed, he had already in some measure discussed; but Puffendorf is neither strict in method, nor free from repetitions. He labours much about the rights of the lawful prince insisting upon them, where the subjects have promised allegiance to the usurper. This, he thinks, must be deemed temporary, until the legitimate sovereign has recovered his dominions. But what may be done towards promoting this end by such as have sworn fidelity to the actual ruler, he does not intimate.†

70. Civil laws are such as emanate from the supreme power, with respect to things left indifferent by the laws of God and nature. What chiefly belongs to them is the form and method of acquiring rights or obtaining redress for wrongs. If we give the law of nature all that belongs to it, and take away from the civilians what they have hitherto engrossed and promiseuously treated, we shall bring the civil law to a much narrower compass; not to say that at present whenever the latter is deficient we must have recourse to the law of nature, and that therefore in all commonwealths the natural laws supply the defects of the civil. • He argues against Hobbes's tenet that the civil law cannot be contrary to the law of nature; and that what shall be deemed theft, murder, or adultery, depends on the former. The subject is bound generally not to obey the unjust commands of his sovereign; but in the case of war he thinks it, on the whole, safest, considering the usual difficulties of such questions, that the subject should serve, and throw the responsibility before God on the prince.† In this problem of casuistry, common usage is wholly against the stricter theory.

71. Panishment may be defined an evil inflicted by authority upon view of antecedent transgression. Hence exclusion, on political grounds, from public office, or separation of the sick for the sake of the healthy, is not punishment. does not belong to distributive justice, nor is the magistrate bound to apportion it to the malignity of the offence, though this is usual. Superior authority is necessary to punishment; and he differs from Grotius by denying that we have a right to avenge the injuries of those who have no claim upon us, Punishment ought never to be inflicted without the prospect of some advantage from it; either the correction of the offender, or the prevention of his repeating the offence. But example he seems not to think a direct end of punishment, though it should be regarded in its infliction. It is not necessary that all offences which the law denounces should be actually punished, though some jurists have questioned the right of pardon. Punishments ought to be measured according to the object of the crime, the mjury to the commonwealth, and the malice of the delinquent. Hence offences against God should be deemed most criminal, and next, such as disturb the state; then whatever affect life, the peace or honour of families, private property or reputation, following the scale of the Decalogue. But though all crimes do not require equal severity, an exact proportion of penalties is not required. Most of this chapter exhibits the vacillating, indistinct, and almost self-contradictory resolutions of difficulties so frequent in Puffendorf. He concludes by establishing a great truth, that no man can be justly punished for the offence of another; not even a community for the acts of their forefathers, not-withstanding their fictitious immortality.*

72. After some chapters on the law of nations, Puffer-dorf concludes with discussing the cessation of subjection. This may ordinarily be by voluntarily removing to another state with permission of the sovereign. And if no law or custom interferes, the subject has a right to do this at his discretion. The state has not a right to expel citizens without some offence. It loses all authority over a banished man. He concludes by considering the rare case of so great a diminution of the people, as to raise a doubt of their political identity.†

73. The political portion of this large work is not, as will appear, very fertile in original or sagacious reflection. A greater degree of both, though by no means Spinose. accompanied with a sound theory, distinguishes the Political Treatise of Spinosa, one which must not be confounded with the Theologico-political Treatise, a very different work. In this he undertakes to show how a state under a regal or aristocratic government ought to be constituted so as to secure the tranguillity and freedom of the citizens. Whether Spinosa borrowed his theory on the origin of government from Hobbes, is perhaps hard to determine: he seems acquainted with the treatise De Cive; but the philosophical system of both was such as, in minds habituated like theirs to close reasoning, could not lead to any other result. Political theory, as Spinosa justly observes, is to be founded on our experience of human kind as it is, and on no visionary notions of an Utopia or golden age; and hence politicians of practical knowledge have written better on these subjects than philosophers. We must treat of men as liable to passions, prone more to revenge than to pity, eager to rule and to compel others to act like themselves, more pleased with having done harm to others than with procuring their own good. Hence no state wherein the public affairs are intrusted to any one's good faith can be secure of their due administration; but means should be devised that neither reason nor passion should induce those who govern to obstruct the public weal; it being indifferent by what metive men act if they can be brought to act for the common good.

74. Natural law is the same as natural power; it is that which the laws of nature, that is the order of the world, give to each individual. Nothing is forbidden by this law, except what no one desires, or what no one can perform. Thus no one is bound to keep the faith he has plighted any longer than he will, and than he judges it useful to himself; for he has not lost the power of breaking it, and power is right in natural law. But he may easily perceive that the power of one man in a state of nature is limited by that of all the rest, and in effect is reduced to nothing; all men being naturally enemies to each other; while, on the other hand, by uniting their force, and establishing bounds by common consent to the natural powers of each, it becomes really more effective than while it was unlimited. This is the principle of civil government; and now the distinctions of just and unjust, right and wrong, begin to appear.

75. The right of the supreme magistrate is nothing but the collective rights of the citizens; that is, their powers. Neither he nor they in their natural state can do wrong; but after the institution of government, each citizen may do wrong by disobeying the magistrate; that, in fact, being the test of wrong. He has not to inquire whether the commands of the supreme power are just or unjust, pious or impious; that is, as to action, for the state has no jurisdiction over his judgment.

76. Two independent states are naturally enemies, and may make war on each other whenever they please. If they make peace or alliance, it is no longer binding than the cause, that is, hope or fear in the contracting parties, shall endure. All this is founded on the universal law of nature, the desire of preserving ourselves; which, whether men are conscious of it or no, animates all their actions. Spinosa in this, as in his other writings, is more fearless than Hobbes, and though he sometimes may throw a light veil over his abjuration of moral and religious principle, it is frequently placed in a more prominent view than his English precursor in the same system had deemed it secure to exhibit. Yet so slight is often the connexion between theoretical tenets and human practice, that Spinosa bore the character of a virtuous and benevolent man. We do not know, indeed, how far he was placed in circumstances to put his fidelity to the test. In this treatise of politics, especially in the broad assertion that good faith is only to be preserved so long as it is advantageous, he leaves Machiavel and Hobbes at some distance, and may be reckoned the most phlegmatically impudent of the whole school.

77. The contract or fundamental laws, he proceeds, according to which the multitude transfers its right to a king or a senate, may unquestionably be broken, when it is advantageous to the whole to do so. But Spinosa denies to private citizens the right of judging concerning the public good in such a point, reserving, apparently, to the supreme magistrate an ultimate power of breaking the conditions upon which he was chosen. Notwithstanding this dangerous admission, he strongly protests against intrusting absolute power to any one man; and observes, in answer to the common argument of the stability of despotism, as in the instance of the Turkish monarchy, that if barbarism, slavery, and desolation are to be called peace, nothing can be more wretched than peace itself. Nor is this sole power of one man a thing so possible as we imagine; the kings who seem most despotic trusting the public safety and their own to counsellors and favourites, often the worst and weakest in the state.

78. He next proceeds to his scheme of a well-regulated monarchy, which is in some measure original and the theory of ingenious. The people are to be divided into family a monarchy, lies, by which he seems to mean something like the pratrice.

of Attica. From each of these, counsellors, fifty years of age, are to be chosen by the king, succeeding in a rotation quinquennial, or less, so as to form a numerous senate. This assembly is to be consulted upon all public affairs, and the king is to be guided by its unanimous opinion. In case, however, of disagreement, the different propositions being haid before the king, he may choose that of the minority, provided at least one hundred counsellors have recommended it. The less remarkable provisions of this ideal polity it would be waste of time to mention; except that be advises that all the citizens should be armed as a militia, and that the principal towns should be fortified, and, consequently, as it seems, in their power. A monarchy thus constituted would probably not degenerate into the despotic form. Spinosa appeals to the ancient government of Aragon, as a proof of the possibility of carrying his theory into execution,

79. From this imaginary monarchy he comes to an aristocratical republic. In this he seems to have taken Venice, the idol of theoretical politicians, as his primary model, but with such deviations as affect the whole scheme of government. He objects to the supremacy of an elective doge, justly observing that the precautions adopted in the election of that magistrate show the danger of the office itself, which was rather retained in the aristocratical polity as an ancient institution than from any persuasion of its usefulness. But the most remarkable discrepancy between the aristocracy of Spinosa and that of Venice is that his great council, which ought, as he strongly urges, not to consist of less than 5000, the greatness of its number being the only safeguard against the close oligarchy of a few families, is not to be hereditary, but its vacancies to be filled up by self-election. In this election, indeed, he considers the essence of aristocracy to consist, being, as is implied in its meaning, a government by the best, who can only be pronounced such by the choice of many. It is singular that he never adverts to popular representation, of which he must have known examples. Democracy, on the contrary, he defines to be a government where political power falls to men by chance of birth, or by some means which has rendered them citizens, and who can claim it as their right, without regard to the choice of others. And a democracy, according to Spinosa, may exist, if the law should limit this privilege of power to the seniors in age, or to the elder branches of families, or to those who pay a certain amount in taxation; although the numbers enjoying it should be a smaller portion of the community than in an aristocracy of the form he has recommended. His treatise breaks off near the beginning of the chapters intended to delineate the best model of democracy, which he declares to be one wherein all persons, in their own power, and not infamous by crime, should have a share in the public government. I do not know that it can be inferred from the writings of Spinosa, nor is his authority, perhaps, sufficient to render the question of any interest, to which of the three plans devised by him as the best in their respective forms, be would have ascribed the preference.

80. The condition of France under Louis XIV, was not very tempting to speculators on political theory. Whatever short remarks may be found in those lettings excellent writers on other subjects who distinguish this period, we can select no one book that falls readily into this class. For Telemaque we must find another place. It is scarcely worth while to mention the political discourses on Tacitus, by Amelot de la Houssaye. These are a tedious and pedantic running commentary on Tacitus, affecting to deduce general principles, but much unlike the short and poignant observations of Machiavel and Bacon. A whole volume on the reign alone of Tiberius, and printed at Paris. is not likely to repay a reader's trouble; at least I have found nothing in it above the common level. I have no acquaintance with the other political writings of Amelot de la Houssaye, one of those who thought they could make great discoveries by analysing the constitution of Venice and other states.

81. England, thrown at the commencement of this period upon the resources of her own invention to replace an ancient monarchy by something new, and rich at that time in reflecting as well as learned men, with an unshackled press, and a growing disdain of authority as opposed to argument, was the natural soil of political theory. The earliest fruit was Sir James Harrington's Oceana, published in 1656. This once famous book is a political allegory, partly suggested, perhaps, by the Dodona's Grove of Howell, or by Barclay's Argenis, and a few other fictions of the preceding age. His Oceana represents England, the history of which is shadowed out with fictitious names. But this is preliminary to the great object, the scheme of a new commonwealth, which, under the auspices of Olphaus Megaletor, the Lord Archon, meaning, of course, Cromwell, not as he was, but as he ought to have been, the author feigns to have been established. The various laws and constitutions of this polity occupy the whole work.

82. The leading principle of Harrington is that power depends on property; denying the common saying, that knowledge or prudence is power. But this property must be in land, " because, as to property producing empire, it is required that it should have some certain root or foot-hold, which except in land it cannot have, being otherwise, as it were, upon the wing. Nevertheless in such cities as subsist mostly by trade, and have little or no land, as Holland and Genoa, the balance of treasure may be equal to that of land.". The law fixing the balance of lands is called by him agrarian; and without an agrarian law, he holds that no government, whether monarchical, aristocratic, or popular, has any long duration; this is rather paradoxical; but his distribution of lands varies according to the form of the commonwealth. In one best constituted the possession of lands is limited to 2000% a year; which, of course, in his time was a much greater estate than at present.

83. Harrington's general scheme of a good government is one "established upon an equal agrarian arising into the superstructure, or three orders, the senate debating and proposing, the people resolving, and the magistracy executing by an equal rotation through the suffrage of the people given by the ballot." His more particular form of polity, devised for his Oceana, it would be tedrous to give in detail: the result is a moderate aristocracy; property, though under the control of his agrarian, which prevents its excess, having so great a share in the elections that it must predominate. But it is an aristocracy of what we should call the middle ranks, and might not be unfit for a small state. In general it may be said of Harrington, that he is prolix, dull, pedantic, yet seldom profound; but sometimes redeems himself by just observations. Like most theoretical politicians of that age he had an excessive admiration for the republic of Venice. His other political writings are in the same spirit as the Oceana, but still less interesting.

84. The manly republicanism of Harrington, though sometimes visionary and perhaps impracticable, shines by Patracela comparison with a very opposite theory, which, hav- of Finer ing been countenanced in the early part of the century by our clergy, revived with additional favour after the Restoration. This was maintained in the Patriarcha of Sir Robert Filmer, written, as it appears, in the reign of Charles I., but not published till 1680, at a time when very high notions of royal prerogative were as well received by one party as they were indignantly rejected by another. The object, as the author declares, was to prove that the first kings were fathers of families; that it is unnatural for the people to govern or to choose governors; that positive laws do not infringe the natural and fatherly power of kings. He refers the tenet of natural liberty and the popular origin of government to the schoolmen, allowing that all papists and the reformed divines have imbibed it, but denying that it is found in the fathers. He seems, however, to claim the credit of an original hypothesis; those who have vindicated the rights of kings in most points not having thought of this, but with one consent admitted the natural liberty and equality of mankind. It is certain, nevertheless, that the patriarchal theory of government as the basis of actual right was laid down as explicitly as by himself in what is called Bishop Overall's Convocation Book, at the beginning of the reign of James I. But this book had not been published when Filmer wrote. His arguments are singularly insufficient; he quotes nothing but a few irrelevant texts from Genesis; he seems not to have known

• "If I be worthy to give advice to notwithstanding the difference that is in a man that would mady pointes, let him every pokey, right of any government understand Verice, he that understands in the world." Harrington's Works, Venice right, shall go nearest to judge, p. 292.

at all the strength, whatever it may be, of his own case, and it is hardly possible to find a more trifling and feeble work. It had however the advantage of opportunity to be received by a party with approbation.

85. Algernon Sidney was the first who devoted his time to a refutation of this patriarchal theory, propounded as it was, not as a plausible hypothesis to explain the origin of civil communities, but as a paramount title, by virtue of which all actual sovereigns, who were not manifest usurpers, were to reign with an unmitigated despotism. Sidney's Discourses on Government, not published till 1098, are a diffuse reply to Filmer. They contain indeed many chapters full of historical learning and judicious reflection; yet the constant anxiety to refute that which needs no refutation renders them a little tedious. Sidney does not condemn a limited monarchy like the English, but his partiality is for a form of republic which would be deemed too aristocratical for our popular theories.

86. Locke, immediately after the Revolution, attacked the Patriarcha with more brevity, and laid down his own celebrated theory of government. The fundamental principle of Filmer is, that paternal authority is naturally absolute. Adam received it from God, exercised it over his own children, and transmitted it to the eldest born for ever. This assumption Locke combats rather too diffusely according to our notions. Filmer had not only to show this absolute monarchy of a lineal ancestor, but his power of transmitting it in course of primogeniture. Locke denies that there is any natural right of this kind, maintaining the equality of children. The incapacity of Filmer renders his discomfiture not difficult. Locke, as will be seen, acknowledges a certain de facto authority in fathers of families, and possibly he might have found, as indeed he seems to admit, considerable traces of a regard to primogeniture in the early ages of the world. It is the question of natural right with which he is here concerned; and as no proof of this had been offered, he had nothing to answer.

87. In the second part of Locke's Treatise on Civil Government, he proceeds to by down what he holds to be the true principles upon which society is founded. A state of nature is a state of perfect freedom and equality; but within the bounds of the law of nature, which obliges every one, and renders a state of liberty no state of licence. And the execution of this law, in such a state, is put into every one's hands, so that he may punish trangressors against it, not merely by way of reparation for his own wrongs, but for those of others. "Every offence that can be committed in the state of nature may, in the state of nature, be punished equally, and as far forth, as it may in a commonwealth." And not only independent communities, but all men, as he thinks, till they voluntarily enter into some society, are in a state of nature.

against another's life, puts himself in a state of war against him, and exposes his own life to be taken away, either by the other party, or by any one who shall espouse his cause. And he who endeavours to obtain absolute power over another, may be construed to have a design on his life, or at least to take away his property. Where laws prevail, they must determine the punishment of those who injure others; but if the law is silenced, it is hard to think but that the appeal to Heaven returns, and the aggressor may be treated as one in a state of war.f

89. Natural liberty is freedom from any superior power except the law of nature. Civil liberty is freedom from the dominion of any authority except that which a legislature, established by consent of the commonwealth, shall confirm. No man, according to Locke, can by his own consent enslave himself, or give power to another to take away his life. For slavery, in a strict sense, is but a continuance of the state of war between a conqueror and his captive.

90. The excellent chapter on property which follows would be sufficient, if all Locke's other writings had perished, to leave him a high name in philosophy. Nothing can be more luminous than his deduction of the natural right of property from labour, not merely in gathering the fruits of the earth, or catching wild animals, but in the cultivation of land, for which occupancy is but the preliminary, and gives as it were an inchoate title. " As much land as a man tills, plants, improves, cultivates, and can use the product of, so much is his property. He by his labour does, as it were, inclose it from the common." Whatever is beyond the scanty limits of individual or family labour, has been appropriated under the authority of civil society. But labour is the primary basis of natural right. Nor can it be thought unreasonable that labour should confer an exclusive right, when it is remembered how much of every thing's value depends upon labour alone. "Whatever bread is more worth than acorns, wine than water, and cloth or silk than leaves, skins, or moss, that is wholly owing to labour and industry." The superiority in good sense and satisfactory elucidation of his principle, which Locke has manifested in this important chapter over Grotius and Puffendorf, will strike those who consult those writers, or look at the brief sketch of their theories in the foregoing pages. It is no less contrasted with the puerile rant of Rousseau against all territorial property. That property owes its origin to occupancy accompanied with labour, is now generally admitted; the care of cattle being of course to be considered as one species of labour, and requiring at least a temporary ownership of the soil.*

91. Locke, after acutely remarking that the common arguments for the power of a father over his children would extend equally to the mother, so that it should be called parental power, reverts to the train of reasoning in the first book of this treatise against the regal authority of fathers. What they possess is not derived from generation, but from the care they necessarily take of the infant child, and during his minority; the power then terminates, though reverence, support, and even compliance are still due. Children are also held in subordination to their parents by the institutions of property, which commonly make them dependent both as to maintenance and succession. But Locke, which is worthy to be remarked, inchnes to derive the origin of civil government from the patriarchal authority; one not strictly coercive, yet voluntarily conceded by habit and family consent. "Thus the natural fathers of families, by an insensible change, became the politic monarchs of them too; and as they chanced to live long, and leave worthy and able heirs for several successions or otherwise, so they laid the foundations of hereditary or elective kingdoms." .

92. The necessity that man should not live alone, produced the primary society of husband and wife, parent and children, to which that of master and servant was early added; whether of freemen engaging their service for hire, or of slaves taken in just war, who are by the right of nature subject to the absolute dominion of the captor. Such a family may sometimes resemble a little commonwealth by its numbers, but is essentially distinct from one, because its chief has no imperial power of life and death except over his slaves, nature having given him none over his children, though all men have a right to punish breaches of the law of nature in others according to the offence. But this natural power they quit and resign into the hands of the community, when civil society is instituted; and it is in this union of the several rights of its members that the legislative right of the commonwealth consists, whether this be done by general consent at the first formation of government, or by the adhesion which any individual may give to one already established. By either of these ways men pass from a state of nature to one of political society, the magistrate having now that power to redress injuries, which had previously been each man's right. Hence absolute monarchy, in Locke's opinion, is no form of civil government; for there being no common authority to appeal to, the sovereign is still in a state of nature with regard to his subjects.†

93. A community is formed by the unanimous consent of any body of men; but when thus become one body, the determination of the majority must bind the rest, else it would not be one. Unanimity, after a community is once formed, can no longer be required; but this consent of men to form a civil society is that which alone did or could give beginning to any lawful government in the world. It is idle to object that we have no records of such an event; for few commonwealths preserve the tradition of their own infancy; and whatever we do know of the origin of particular states gives indications of this mode of union. Yet he again inclines to deduce the usual origin of civil societies from imitation of patriarchal authority, which having been recognised by each family in the arbitration of disputes and even punishment of offences, was transferred with more readiness to some one person, as the father and representative head of the infant community. He even admits that this authority might tacitly devolve upon the eldest son. Thus the first governments were monarches, and those with no express limitations of power, till exposure of its abuse gave occasion to social laws, or to co-ordinate authority. In all this he follows Hooker, from the first book of whose Ecclesiastical Polity he quotes largely in his notes.

94. A difficulty commonly raised against the theory of compact is, that all men being born under some government, they cannot be at liberty to erect a new one, or even to make choice whether they will obey or no. This objection Locke does not meet, like Hooker and the jurists, by supposing the agreement of a distant ancestor to oblige all his posterity. But explicitly acknowledging that nothing can bind freemen to obey any government save their own consent, he rests the evidence of a tacit consent on the enjoyment of land, or even on mere residence within the dominions of the community; every man being at liberty to relinquish his possessions, or change his residence, and either incorporate himself with another commonwealth, or, if he can find an opportunity, set up for himself in some unoccupied part of the world. But nothing can make a man irrevocably a member of one society, except his own voluntary declaration; such perhaps as the oath of allegiance, which Locke does not mention, ought to be reckoned.t

95. The majority having, in the first constitution of a state, the whole power, may retain it themselves, or delegate it to one or more persons. I And the supreme power is, in other words, the legislature, sacred and unalterable in the hands where the community have once placed it, without which no law can exist, and in which all obedience terminates. Yet this legislative authority itself is not absolute or arbitrary over the lives and fortunes of its subjects. It is the joint power of individuals surrendered to the state; but no man has power over his own life or his neighbour's property. The laws enacted by the legislature must be conformable to the will of God, or natural justice. Nor can it take any part of the subject's property without his own consent, or that of the majority. " For if any one shall claim a power to lay and levy taxes on the people by his own authority, and without such consent of the people, he thereby invades the fundamental law of property, and subverts the end of government. For what property have I in that which another may by right take, when he pleases, to himself?" Lastly, the legislative power is inalienable; being but delegated from the people, it cannot be transferred to others. . This is the part of Locke's treatise which has been open to most objection, and which in some measure seems to charge with usurpation all the established governments of Europe. It has been a theory fertile of great revolutions, and perhaps pregnant with more. In some part of this chapter also, though by no means in the most practical corollaries, the language of Hooker has led onward his more hardy disciple.

96. Though the legislative power is alone supreme in the constitution, it is yet subject to the people themselves, who may alter it whenever they find that it acts against the trust reposed in it; all power given in trust for a particular end being evidently forfeited when that end is manifestly disregarded or obstructed. But while the government subsists the legislature is alone sovereign, though it may be the usage to call a single executive magistrate sovereign, if he has also a share in legislation. Where this is not the case, the appellation is plainly improper. Locke has in this chapter a remarkable passage, one perhaps of the first declarations in favour of a change in the electoral system of England. "To what gross absurdities the following of custom, when reason has left it, may lead, we may be satisfied when we see the bare name of a town, of which there remains not so much as the ruins, where scarce so much housing as a sheep-cote, or more inhabitants than a shepherd is to be found, send as many representatives to the grand assembly of law-makers as a whole county, numerous in people, and powerful in riches. This strangers stand amazed at, and every one must confess needs a remedy, though most think it hard to find one, because the constitution of the legislative being the original and supreme act of the society, antecedent to all positive laws in it, and depending wholly on the people, no inferior power can alter it." But Locke is less timid about a remedy, and suggests that the executive magistrate might regulate the number of representatives, not according to old custom but reason, which is not setting up a new legislature, but restoring an old one. "Whatsoever shall be done manifestly for the good of the people and the establishing the government on its true foundation, is, and always will be, just prerogative";" a maxim of too dangerous latitude for a constitutional monarchy.

97. Prerogative he defines to be "a power of acting according to discretion for the public good without the prescription of the law, and sometimes even against it." This, however, is not by any means a good definition in the eyes of a lawyer; and the word, being merely technical, ought not to have been employed in so partial if not so incorrect a sense. Nor is it very precise to say, that in England the prerogative was always largest in the hands of our wisest and best princes, not only because the fact is otherwise, but because he confounds the legal prerogative with its actual exercise. This chapter is the most loosely reasoned of any in the treatise, the

98. Conquest, in an unjust war, can give no right at all, unless robbers and pirates may acquire a right. Nor is any one bound by promises which unjust force extorts from him. If we are not strong enough to resist, we have no remedy save patience; but our children may appeal to Heaven, and repeat their appeals till they recover their ancestral rights, which was to be governed by such a legislation as themselves approve. He that appeals to Heaven must be sure that he has right on his side, and right too that is worth the trouble and cost of his appeal, as he will answer at a tribunal that cannot be deceived. Even just conquest gives no further right than to reparation of injury; and the posterity of the vanquished, he seems to hold, can forfeit nothing by their parent's offence, so that they have always a right to throw off the yoke. The title of prescription, which has commonly been admitted to silence the complaints, if not to heal the wounds, of the injured, finds no favour with Locke. But hence it seems to follow that no state composed, as most have been, out of the spoils of conquest, can exercise a legitimate authority over the latest posterity of those it has incorporated. Wales, for instance, has an eternal right to shake off the yoke of England; for what Locke says of consent to laws by representatives, is of little weight when these must be outnumbered in the general legislature of both countries; and indeed the first question for the Cambro-Britons would be to determine whether they would form part of such a common legislation.

99. Usurpation, which is a kind of domestic conquest, gives no more right to obedience than unjust war; it is necessary that the people should both be at liberty to consent, and have actually consented to allow and confirm a power which the constitution of their commonwealth does not recognise. But tyranny may exist without usurpation, whenever the power reposed in any one's hands for the people's benefit is abused to their impoverishment or slavery. Force may never be opposed but to unjust and unlawful force; in any other case, it is condemned before God and man. The king's person is in some countries sacred by law; but this, as Locke thinks, does not extend to the case where, by putting bimself in a state of war with his people, he dissolves the government. 1 A prince dissolves the government by ruling against law, by hindering the regular assembly of the legislature, by changing the form of election, or by rendering the people subject to a foreign power. He dissolves it also by neglecting or abandoning it, so that the laws cannot be put into execution. The government is also dissolved by breach of trust in either the legislature or the prince; by the former when it usurps an arbitrary power over the lives, liberties, and fortunes of the subject; by the latter, when he endeavours to corrupt the representatives or to influence the choice of the electors. If it be objected that no government will be able long to subsist, if the people may set up a new legislature whenever they take offence at the old one, he replies that mankind are too slow and averse to quit their old institutions for this danger to be apprehended. Much will be endured from rulers without mutiny or murmur. Nor is any thing more likely to restrain governments than this doctrine of the right of resistance. It is as reasonable to tell men they should not defend themselves against robbers, because it may occasion disorder, as to use the same argument for passive obedience to illegal dominion. And he observes, after quoting some other writers, that Hooker alone might be enough to satisfy those who rely on him for their ecclesiastical polity.

100. Such is, in substance, the celebrated treatise of Locke on civil government, which, with the favour on the Tree of political circumstances, and the authority of his name, became the creed of a numerous party at home; while silently spreading the fibres from its root over Europe and America, it prepared the way for theories of political society, hardly bolder in their announcement, but expressed with more passionate ardour, from which the great revolutions of the last and present age have sprung. But as we do not launch our bark upon a stormy sea, we shall merely observe that neither the Revolution of 1688, nor the administration of William III., could have borne the test by which Locke has tried the legitimacy of government. There was certainly no appeal to the people in the former, nor would it have been convenient for the latter to have had the maxim established, that an attempt to corrupt the legislature entails a forfeiture of the entrusted power. Whether the opinion of Locke, that mankind are slow to political change, be conformable to an enlarged experience, must be judged by every one according to his reading and observation; it is at least very different from that which Hooker, to whom he defers so greatly in most of his doctrine, has attered in the very first sentence of his Ecclesiastical Polity. For my own part I must confess, that in these latter chapters of Locke on Government I see, what sometimes appears in his other writings, that the influence of temporary circumstances on a mind a little too susceptible of passion and resentment, had prevented that calm and patient examination of all the bearings of this extensive subject which true philosophy requires.

101. But whatever may be our judgment of this work, it is equally true that it opened a new era of political opinion in Europe. The earlier writings on the side of popular sovereignty, whether those of Buchanan and Languet, of the Jesuits, or of the English republicans, had been either too closely dependent on temporary circumstances, or too much bound up with odious and unsuccessful factions, to sink very deep into the hearts of mapkind. Their adversaries, with the countenance of every government on their side, kept possession of the field; and no later jurist, nor theologian, nor philosopher on the Continent, while they generally followed their predecessors in deriving the origin of civil society from compact, ventured to meet the delicate problem of resistance to tyranny, or of the right to reform a constitution, except in the most cautious and indefinite language. We have seen this already in Grotius and Puffendorf. But the success of the English Revolution, the necessity which the powers allied against France found of maintaining the title of William, the peculiar interest of Holland and Hanover, states at that time very strong in the literary world, in our new scheme of government, gave a weight and authority to principles which, without some such application, it might still have been thought seditious to propound. Locke too, long an exile in Holland, was intimate with Le Clerc, who exerted a considerable influence over the Protestant part of Europe. Barbeyrac, some time afterwards, trod nearly in the same steps, and without going all the lengths of Locke, did not fail to take a very different tone from the two older writers upon whom he has commented.

102. It was very natural that the French Protestants, among whom traditions of a turn of thinking not the most favourable to kings may have been preserved, ahould, in the hour of severe persecution, mutiny in words and writings against the despotism that oppressed them. Such, it appears, had been the language of those exiles, as it is of all exiles, when an anonymous tract, entitled Avis aux Refugiéz, was published with the date of Amsterdam in 1690. This, under pretext of giving advice, in the event of their being permitted to return home, that they should get rid of their spirit of satire, and of their republican theories, is a bitter and able attack on those who had taken refuge in Holland. It asserts the principle of passive obedience, extolling also the King of France and his government, and censuring the English Revolution. Public rumour ascribed this to Bayle; it has usually passed for his, and is even inserted in the collection of his miscellaneous works. Some, however, have ascribed it to Pelisson, and others to Larroque; one already, and the other soon after, proselytes to the church of Rome. Basnage thought it written by the latter, and published by Bayle, to whom he ascribed the preface. This is apparently in a totally opposite strain, but not without strong suspicion of irony or ill faith. The style and manner of the whole appear to suggest Bayle; and though the supposition is very discreditable to his memory, the weight of presumption seems much to incline that way.

103. The separation of political economy from the gerelated neral science which regards the well-being of comphilosophers as in modern times. It does not follow that national wealth engaged none of their attention. Few, on the contrary, of those who have taken comprchensive views could have failed to regard it. In Bodin, Botero, Bacon, Hobbes, Puffendorf, we have already seen proofs of this. These may be said to have discussed the subject, not systematically, nor always with thorough knowledge, but with acuteness and in a philosophical tone. Others there were of a more limited range, whose habits of life and experience led them to particular departments of economical inquiry, especially as to commerce, the precious metals, and the laws affecting them. The Italians led the way; Serra has been mentioned in the last period, and a few more might find a place in this. De Witt's Interest of Holland can hardly be reckoned among economical writings; and it is said by Morhof, that the Dutch were not fond of promulgating their commercial knowledge *; little at least was contributed from that country, even at a later period, towards the theory of becoming rich. But England now took a large share in this new literature. Free, inquisitive, thriving rapidly in commerce, so that her progress even in the nineteenth century has hardly been in a greater ratio than before and after the middle of the seventeenth, if we may trust the statements of contemporaries, she produced some writers who, though few of them merit the name of philosophers, may yet not here be overlooked, on account of their influence, their reputation, or their position as links in the chain of science.

104. The first of these was Thomas Mun, an intelligent merchant in the earlier part of the century, whose posthumous treatise, England's Treasure by Foreign forces Trade, was published in 1664, but seems to have been written soon after the accession of Charles I. ! Mun is generally reckoned the founder of what has been called the mercantile system. His main position is that "the ordinary means to increase our wealth and treasure is by foreign trade, wherein we must ever observe this rule to sell more to strangers yearly than we consume of theirs in value." 4 We must therefore sell as cheap as possible; it was by underselling the Venetians of late years, that we had exported a great deal of cloth to Turkey. § It is singular that Mun should not have perceived the difficulty of selling very cheap the productions of a country's labour, whose gold and silver were in great abundance. He was, however, too good a merchant not to acknowledge the inefficacy and impolicy of restraining by law the exportation of coin, which is often a means of increasing our treasure in the long run; advising instead a due regard to the balance of trade, or general surplus of exported goods, by which we shall infallibly obtain a stock of gold and silver. These notions have long since been covered with ridicule; and it is plain that, in a merely economical view, they must always be delusive. Mun, however, looked to the accumulation of a portion of this imported treasure by the state; a $ P 11 (edit 1654). $ P. 18.

Polyhistor, part iii lib iii. § 3,
 Mr W Culloch says (Introductory Discourse to Sm.th's Wealth of Nations)
 it had most probably been written about resource in critical emergencies which we have now learned to despise, since others have been at hand, but which in reality had made a great difference in the events of war, and changed the balance of power between many commonwealths.

¹⁶⁴⁵ or 1640. I remarked some things which serve to carry it up a little ligher.

Mun was followed, about 1670, by Sir Josiah Child, in a discourse on Trade, written on the same principles of the mercantile system, but more copious and varied. The chief aim of Child is to effect a reduction of the legal interest of money from six to four per cent., drawing an erroneous inference from the increase of wealth which had followed similar enactments.

105. Among the many difficulties with which the government of William III. had to contend, one of the most embarrassing was the scarcity of the precious metals and depreciated condition of the coin. This opened the whole field of controversy in that province of political economy; and the bold spirit of inquiry, unshackled by prejudice in favour of ancient custom, which in all respects was characteristic of that age, began to work by reasonings on general theorems, instead of collecting insulated and inconclusive details. Locke stood forward on this, as on so many subjects, with his masculine sense and habitual closeness of thinking. His "Considerations of the Consequences of lowering Interest, and raising the Value of Money" were pub-Two further treatises are in answer to the lished in 1691. pamphlets of Lowndes. These economical writings of Locke are not in all points conformable to the modern principles of the science. He seems to incline rather too much towards the mercantile theory, and to lay too much stress on the possession of the precious metals. From his excellent sense, bowever, as well as from some expressions, I should conceive that he only considers them, as they doubtless are, a portion of the exchangeable wealth of the nation, and by their inconsumable nature, as well as by the constancy of the demand for them, one of the most important. "Riches do not consist," he says, "in having more gold and silver, but in having thore in proportion than the rest of the world or than our neighbours, whereby we are enabled to procure to ourselves a greater plenty of the conveniences of life."

106. Locke had the sagacity to perceive the impossibility of regulating the interest of money by law. It was an empirical proposition at that time, as we have just seen in Sir Josiah Child, to render loans more easy to the borrower by reducing the legal rate to four per cent. The whole drift of his reasoning is against any limitation, though from fear of appearing too paradoxical, he does not arrive at that inference, For the reasons he gives in favour of a legal limit of interest, namely, that courts of law may have some rule where nothing is stipulated in the contract, and that a few money-lenders in the metropolis may not have the monopoly of all loans in England, are, especially the first, so trifling, that he could not have relied upon them; and indeed he admits that, in other circumstances, there would be no danger from the second. But his prudence having restrained him from speaking out, a fumous writer almost a century afterwards came forward to assert a paradox, which he loved the better for seeming such, and finally to convince the thinking part of mankind.

107. Laws fixing the value of silver Locke perceived to be nugatory, and is averse to prohibit its exportation. The value of money, he maintains, does not depend on the rate of interest, but on its plenty relatively to commodities. Hence the rate of interest, he thinks, but perhaps erroneously, does not govern the price of land; arguing from the higher rate of land relatively to money, that is, the worse interest it gave, in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, than in his own time. But one of Locke's positious, if generally received, would alone have sufficed to lower the value of land. "It is in vain," he says, "in a country whose great fund is land, to hope to lay the public charges of the government on any thing else; there at last it will terminate." The legislature soon proceeded to act on this mistaken theory in the annual land-tax; an impost of tremendous severity at that time, the gross unfairness, however, of which has been compensated in later times by the taxes on personal succession.

108. In such a monetary crisis as that of his time, Locke was naturally obliged to consider the usual resource of raising the denomination of the coin. This, he truly says, would be to rob all creditors of such a proportion of their debts. It is probable, that his influence, which was very consideration.

may have put a stop to the scheme. He contends in his Further Considerations, in answer to a tract by Lowndes, that clipped money should go only by weight. This seems to have been agreed by both parties; but Lowndes thought the loss should be defrayed by a tax; Locke that it should fall on the holders. Honourably for the government, the former opinion prevailed.

109. The Italians were the first who laid any thing like a Statement foundation for statistics or political arithmetic; that which is to the political economist what general history is to the philosopher. But their numerical reckonings of population, houses, value of lands or stock, and the like, though very curious, and sometimes taken from public documents, were not always more than conjectural, nor are they so full and minute as the spirit of calculation demands. England here again took the lead, in Graunt's Observations on the Bills of Mortality, 1661, in Petty's Political Arithmetic (posthumous in 1691), and other treatises of the same ingenious and philosophical person, and we may add in the Observations of Gregory King on the Natural and Political State of England; for though these were not published till near the end of the eighteenth century, the manuscripts had fallen into the hands of Dr. Charles Davenant, who has made extracts from them in his own valuable contributions to political arithmetic. King seems to have possessed a sagacity which has sometimes brought his conjectures nearer to the mark, than from the imperfection of his data it was reasonable to expect. Yet he supposes that the population of England, which he estimated, perhaps rightly, at five millions and a half, would not reach the double of that number before A.D. 2800. Sir William Petty, with a mind capable of just and novel theories, was struck by the necessary consequences of an uniformly progressive population. Though the rate of movement seemed to him, as in truth it then was, much slower than we have latterly found it, he clearly saw that its continuance would in an ascertainable length of time overload the world. "And then according to the prediction of the Scriptures there must be wars and great slaughter." He conceived that in the ordinary course of things, the population of a country would be doubled in two hundred years; but the whole conditions of the problem were far less understood than at present. Davenant's Essay on Ways and Means, 1693, gained him a high reputation, which he endeavoured to augment by many subsequent works, some falling within the seventeenth century. He was a man of more enlarged reading than his predecessors, with the exception of Petty, and of close attention to the statistical documents which were now more copiously published than before; but he seldom launches into any extensive theory, confining himself rather to the accumulation of facts and to the immediate inferences, generally for temporary purposes, which they supplied.

SECT. III. — ON JURISPRUDENCE.

110. In 1667, a short book was published at Frankfort, by a young man of twenty-two years, entitled Methodi Novæ discendæ docendæque Jurisprudentiæ. The science which of all had been deemed to require the most protracted labour, the ripest judgment, the most experienced discrimination, was, as it were, invaded by a boy, but by one who had the genius of an Alexander, and for whom the glories of an Alexander were reserved. This is the first production of Leibnitz; and it is probably in many points of view the most remarkable work that has prematurely united erudition and solidity. We admire in it the vast range of learning, (for though he could not have read all the books he names, there is evidence of his acquaintance with a great number, and at least with a well-filled chart of literature,) the originality of some ideas, the commanding and comprehensive views he embraces, the philosophical spirit, the compressed style in which it is written, the entire absence of juvenility, of ostentatious paradox , of imagination, ardour,

. I use the epithet ostentations, be- perty by testament is derived from the came some of his original theories are a immortality of the soul, the living heirs little juridoxical. thus he has a singular being as it were the attency of these notion that the right of bequeathing proand enthusiasm, which, though Leibnitz did not always want them, would have been wholly misplaced on such a subject. Faults have been censured in this early performance, and the author declared himself afterwards dissatisfied with it.

111. Leibuitz was a passionate admirer of the Roman jurisprudence; he held the great lawyers of antiquity second only to the best geometers for strong, and subtle, and profound reasoning; not even acknowledging, to any considerable degree, the contradictions (antinomiae juris), which had perplexed their disciples in later times, and on which many volumes had been written. But the arrangement of Justinian he entirely disapproved; and in another work, Corporis Juris reconcinnandi Ratio, published in 1668, he pointed out the necessity and what he deemed the best method of a new distribution. This appears to be not quite like what he had previously sketched, and which was rather a philosophical than a very convenient method; in this new arrangement, he proposes to retain the texts of the Corpus Juris Civilis, but in a form rather like that of the Pandects than of the Institutes; to the latter of which, followed as it has been among us by Hale and Blackstone, he was very

112. There was only one man in the world who could have left so noble a science as philosophical jurisprudence for pursuits of a still more exalted nature, and for which he was still more fitted; and that man was Leibnitz himself. He passed onward to reap the golden harvests of other fields. Yet the study of law has owed much to him; he did much to unite it with moral philosophy on the one hand, and with revers adding vivint, ideo manent dominirutin, quos vero intredes reliquerant, emeigiendi sunt ut procuratores in remtuam. In our own discussions on the law of entail, I am not aware that this argument has ever been explicitly urged, though the advocates of perpetual control seem to have none better.

This tract, and all the other works of Leibnitz on jurisprudence, will be found in the fourth volume of his works by Dutens. An analysis by Bon, professor of law at Furm, is prefixed to the Methodi Novin, and he has pointed out a few errors. Leibnitz says in a letter, about 1676, that his book was effusus points quam scriptus, in itnere, sine librat, &c., and that it contained some things he no longer would have said, though there were others of which he did not repeat. Lessanier, Hist. du Droit, p. 130

f In his Methodi Nove be divided law, in the didactic part, according to the several sources of rights, namely, 1. Nature, which gives in right over reasonables, things where there is no prior property 2. Succession 3 Possession. 4. Contract. 5. Injury, which gives right to reparation.

history on the other; a great master of both, he exacted perhaps a more comprehensive course of legal studies than the capacity of ordinary lawyers could grasp. In England also, its conduciveness to professional excellence might be hard to prove. It is however certain that, in Germany at least, philology, history, and philosophy have more or less since the time of Leibnitz marched together under the robe of law. "He did but pass over that kingdom," says Lerminier, "and he has reformed and enlarged it."

113. James Godefroy was thirty years engaged on an edition of the Theodosian Code, published several years after his death, in 1665. It is by far the Conference Demand.

best edition of that body of laws, and retains a standard value in the historical department of jurisprudence, Domat, a French lawyer, and one of the Port-Royal connexion, in his Loix Civiles dans leur Ordre Naturel, the first of five volumes of which appeared in 1689, carried into effect the project of Leibnitz, by re-arranging the laws of Justinian, which, especially the Pandects, are well known to be confusedly distributed, in a more regular method, prefixing a book of his own on the nature and spirit of law in general. This appears to be an useful digest or abridgement, something like those made by Viner and earlier writers of our own text, but perhaps with more compression and choice; two editions of an English translation were published. Domat's Public Law, which might, perhaps, in our language, have been called constitutional, since we generally confine the epithet public to the law of nations, forms a second part of the same work, and contains a more extensive system, wherein theological morality, ecclesiastical ordinances, and the fundamental laws of the French monarchy are reduced into method. Domat is much extolled by his countrymen; but in philosophical jurisprudence, he seems to display little force or originality. Gravina, who obtained a high name in this literature at the beginning of the next century, was known merely as a professor at the close of this; but a Dutch jurist, Gerard Noodt, may deserve mention Noodt on for his treatise on Usury, in 1698, wherein he both Gury endeavours to prove its natural and religious lawfulness, and traces its history through the Roman law. Several other works of Noodt on subjects of historical jurisprudence seem to fall within this century, though I do not find their exact dates of publication.

^{*} Broge, Univ. Lerminier, Hot. du Druit

114. Grotius was the acknowledged master of all who studied the theory of international right. It was, Nations - perhaps, the design of Puffendorf, as we may conjecture by the title of his great work on the Law of Nature and Nations, to range over the latter field with as assiduous diligence as the former. But from the length of his prolix labour on natural law and the rights of sovereigns, he has not more than one twentieth of the whole volume to spare for international questions; and this is in great measure copied or abridged from Grotius. In some instances he disagrees with his master. Puffendorf singularly denies that compacts made during war are binding by the law of nature, but for weak and unintelligible reasons. Treaties of peace extorted by unjust force, he denies with more reason to be binding; though Grotius had held the contrary, The inferior writers on the law of nations, or those who, like Wicquefort in his Ambassador, confined themselves to merely conventional usages, it is needless to mention.

^{*} B, viii. chap, 7.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF POETRY, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

SECT. I .- ON ITALIAN POETRY.

Filicoja — Gudi — Menzim — Arcadian Society.

1. THE imitators of Marini, full of extravagant metaphors, and the false thoughts usually called concetti, were 100 percent in their vigour at the commencement of this period. The head But their names are now obscure, and have been postry. overwhelmed by the change of public taste which has condemned and proscribed what it once most applauded. This change came on long before the close of the century, though not so decidedly but that some traces of the former manner are discoverable in the majority of popular writers. The general characteristics, however, of Italian poetry became a more masculine tone, a wider reach of topics, and a selection of the most noble, an abandonment, except in the lighter lyrics, of amatory strains, and especially of such as were languishing and querulous, an anticipation, in short, as far as the circumstances of the age would permit, of that severe and elevated style which has been most affected for the last fifty years. It would be futile to seek an explanation of this manlier spirit in any social or political causes; never had Italy in these respects been so lifeless; but the world of poets is often not the world around them, and their stream of living waters may flow, like that of Arethusa, without imbibing much from the surrounding brine. Chiabrera had led the way by the Pindaric majesty of his odes, and had disciples of at least equal name with himself.

2. Florence was the mother of one who did most to invigorate Italian poetry, Vincenzo Filicaja; a man gifted with a serious, pure, and noble spirit, from which congenial thoughts spontaneously arose, and with an imagination rather vigorous than fertile. The siege of Vienna in 1683, and its glorious deliverance by Sobieski, are the subjects of six odes. The third of these, addressed to the King of Poland himself, is generally most esteemed, though I do not perceive that the first or second are inferior. His ode to Rome, on Christina's taking up her residence there, is in many parts highly poetical; but the flattery of representing this event as sufficient to restore the eternal city from decay is too gross. It is not on the whole so successful as those on the siege of Vienna. A better is that addressed to Florence on leaving it for a rural solitude, in consequence of his poverty and the neglect he had experienced. It breathes an injured spirit, something like the complaint of Cowley, with which posterity are sure to sympathise. The sonnet of Filicaja, "Italia mia," is known by every one who cares for this poetry at all. This sonuet is conspicuous for its depth of feeling, for the spirit of its commencement, and above all, for the noble lines with which it ends; but there are surely awkward and feeble expressions in the intermediate part. Armenti for regiments of dragoous could only be excused by frequent usage in poetry, which, I presume, is not the case, though we find the same word in one of Filicaja's odes. A foreigner may venture upon this kind of criticism.

3. Filicaja was formed in the school of Chiabrera; but with his pomp of sound and boldness of imagery he is animated by a deeper sense both of religion and patriotism. We perceive more the language of the heart; the man speaks in his genuine character, not with assumed and mercenary sensibility, like that of Pindar and Chiabrera. His genius is greater than his skill; he abandons himself to an impetuosity which he cannot sustain, forgetful of the economy of strength and breath, as necessary for a poet as a race-horse. He has rarely or never any conceits or frivolous thoughts; but the expression is sometimes rather feeble. There is a general want of sunshine in Filicaja's poetry; unprosperous himself, he views nothing with a worldly eye; his notes of triumph are without brilliancy, his predictions of success are without joy. He seems also deficient in the charms of grace and felicity. But his poetry is always the effusion of a fine soul; we venerate and love Filicaja as a man, but we also acknowledge that he was a real poet.

4. Guidi, a native of Pavia, raised himself to the highest point that any lyric poet of Italy has attained. His odes are written at Rome from about the year 1685 to the end of the century. Compared with Chiabrera, or even Filicaja, he may be allowed the superiority; if he never rises to a higher pitch than the latter, if he has never chosen subjects so animating, if he has never displayed so much depth and truth of feeling, his enthusiasm is more constant, his imagination more creative, his power of language more extensive and more felicitous. " He falls sometimes," says Corniani, "into extravagance, but never into affectation. His peculiar excellence is poetical expression, always brilliant with a light of his own. The magic of his language used to excite a lively movement among the hearers when he recited his verses in the Arcadian society." Corniani adds that he is sometimes exuberant in words and hyperbolical in images.*

5. The ode of Guidi on Fortune appears to me at least equal to any in the Italian language. If it has been suggested by that of Celio Magno, entitled Iddio, the resemblance does not deserve the name of imitation; a nobleness of thought, imagery, and language prevails throughout. But this is the character of all his odes. He chose better subjects than Chiabrera; for the ruins of Rome are more glorious than the hving house of Medici. He resembles him indeed rather than any other poet, so that it might not always be easy to discern one from the other in a single stanza; but Guidi is a bolder, a more imaginative, a more enthusiastic poet. Both adorn and amplify a little to excess; and it may be imputed to Guidi that he has abused an advantage which his native language afforded. The Italian is rich in words, where the sound so well answers to the meaning, that it is hardly possible to hear them without an associated sentiment; their effect is closely analogous to musical expression. Such are the adjectives denoting mental elevation, as superbo, altiero, audace, gagliardo, indomito, maestoso. These recur in the poems of Guidi with every noun that will admit of them; but sometimes the artifice is a little too transparent, and though the meaning is not sacrificed to sound, we feel that it is too much enveloped in it, and are not quite pleased that a great poet should rely so much on a resource which the most mechanical slave of music can employ.

6. The odes of Benedetto Menzini are elegant and in poetical language, but such as does not seem very original, nor do they strike us by much vigour or animation of thought. The allusions to mythology which we never find in Filicaja, and rarely in Guidi, are too frequent. Some of these odes are of considerable beauty, among which we may distinguish that addressed to Magalotti, beginning, "Un verde ramuscello in piaggia aprica." Menzini was far from confining himself to this species of poetry; he was better known in others. As an Anacreontic poet he stands, I believe, only below Chiabrera and Redi. His satires have been preferred by some to those of Ariosto; but neither Cormani nor Salti acquiesce in this praise. Their style is a mixture of obsolete phrases from Dante with the idioms of the Florentine populace; and though spirited in substance, they are rather full of common-place invective. Menzini strikes boldly at priests and governments, and, what was dangerous to Orpheus, at the whole sex of women. His Art of Poetry, in five books, published in 1681, deserves some praise. As his atrabilious humour prompted, he inveighs against the corruption of contemporary literature, especially on the stage, riduciling also the Pindaric pomp that some affected, not perhaps without allusion to his enemy Guidi. His own style is pointed, animated, sometimes poetical, where didactic verse will admit of such ornament, but a little too diffuse and minute in criticism.

7. These three are the great restorers of Italian poetry after the usurpation of false taste. And it is to be Bose - Rech observed that they introduced a new manner, very different from that of the sixteenth century. Several others deserve to be mentioned, though we can only do so briefly. The Satires of Salvator Rosa, full of force and vehemence, more vigorous than elegant, are such as his ardent genius and rather savage temper would lead us to expect. A fur superior poet was a man not less eminent than Salvator, the philosophical and every way accomplished Redi. Few have done so much in any part of science who have also shone so brightly in the walks of taste. The sonnets of Redi are esteemed; but his famous dithyrambic, Bacco in Toscana, is admitted to be the first poem of that kind in modern language, and is as worthy of Monte Pulciano wine, as the wine is worthy of it.

8. Maggi and Lemene bore an honourable part in the restoration of poetry, though neither of them is reckoned other part altogether to have purified himself from the infection of the preceding age. The sonnet of Pastorini on the imagined resistance of Genoa to the oppression of Louis XIV. in 1684, though not borne out by historical truth, is one of those breathings of Italian nationality which we always admire, and which had now become more common than for a century before. It must be confessed, in general, that when the protestations of a people against tyranny become loud enough to be heard, we may suspect that the tyranny has been relaxed.

9. Rome was to poetry in this age what Florence had once been, though Rome had hitherto done less for the Italian muses than any other great city. Nor participate of latter was this so much due to her bishops and cardinals, as to a stranger and a woman. Christina finally took up her abode there in 1688. Her palace became the resort of all the learning and genius she could assemble round her; a literary academy was established, and her revenue was liberally dispensed in pensions. If Filicaja and Guidi, both sharers of her bounty, have exaggerated her praises, much may be pardoned to gratitude, and much also to the natural admiration which those who look up to power must feel for those who have renounced it. Christina died in 1690, and her own academy could last no longer; but a phenix sprang at once from its ashes. Crescimbeni, then young, has the credit of having planned the Society of Arcadia which began in 1690, and has eclipsed in celebrity most of the earlier academies of Italy. Fourteen, says Cormani, were the original founders of this society; among whom were Crescimbeni, and Gravina, and Zappi. In course of time the Arcadians vastly increased, and established colonies in the chief cities of Italy. They determined to assume every one a pastoral name and a Greek birthplace, to hold their meetings in some verdant meadow, and to mingle with all their compositions, as far as possible, images from pastoral life; images always agreeable, because they recall the times of primitive innocence. This poetical tribe adopted as their device the pipe of seven reeds bound with laurel, and their president or director was denominated general shepherd or keeper (custode generale). The fantastical part of the Arcadian society was common to them with all similar justitutions; and mankind has generally required some ceremonial follies to keep alive the wholesome spirit of association. Their solid aim was to purify the national taste. Much had been already done, and in great measure by their own members, Menzini and Guidi; but their influence, which was of course more felt in the next century, has always been reckoned both important and auspicious to Italian literature.

SECT. II. - ON FRENCH POETRY.

Foulaine - Boileau - Minor French Poets.

10. We must pass over Spain and Portugal as absolutely destitute of any name which requires commemoration. In France it was very different; if some earlier periods had been not less rich in the number of versifiers, none had produced poets who have descended with so much renown to posterity. The most popular of these was La Fontaine. Few writers have left such a number of verses which, in the phrase of his country, have made their fortune, and been, like ready money, always at hand for prompt quotation. His lines have at once a proverbial truth and a humour of expression which render them constantly applicable. This is chiefly true of his Fables; for his Tales, though no one will deny that they are lively enough, are not reckoned so well written, nor do they supply so much for general use.

Corniani, vin 301. Tirabouchi, xi. 43. Crescimbeni, Storia d'Arcadia (re-printed by Mathias).

11. The models of La Fontaine's style were partly the ancient fabulists whom he copied, for he pretends to Character of no originality; partly the old French poets, espe- her fahres. cially Marot. From the one he took the real gold of his fables themselves, from the other he caught a peculiar archness and vivacity, which some of them had possessed, perhaps, in no less degree, but which becomes more captivating from his intermixture of a solid and serious wisdom, For notwithstanding the common anecdotes, sometimes, as we may suspect, rather exaggerated, of La Fontaine's simplicity, he was evidently a man who had thought and observed much about human nature, and knew a little more of the world than he cared to let the world perceive. Many of his fables are admirable; the grace of the poetry, the happy inspiration that seems to have dictated the turns of expression, place him in the first rank among fabulists. Yet the praise of La Fontaine should not be indiscriminate. It is said that he gave the preference to Phedrus and Æsop above himself, and some have thought that in this he could not have been sincere. It was at least a proof of his modesty. But, though we cannot think of putting Phædrus on a level with La Fontaine, were it only for this reason, that in a work designed for the general reader, and surely fables are of this description, the qualities that please the many are to be valued above those that please the few, yet it is true that the French poet might envy some talents of the Roman. Phædrus, a writer scarcely prized enough, because he is an early school-book, has a perfection of elegant beauty which very few have rivalled. No word is out of its place, none is redundant, or could be changed for a better; his perspicuity and case make every thing appear unpremeditated, yet every thing is wrought by consummate art. In many fables of La Fontaine this is not the case; he beats round the subject, and misses often before he hits. Much, whatever La Harpe may assert to the contrary, could be retrenched; in much the exigencies of rhyme and metre are too manifest." He has, on the other hand, far more humour than Phedrus; and, whether it be praise or not, thinks less of his fable and more of its moral. One pleases by enlivening, the other pleases but does not enliven; one has more felicity, the other more skill; but in such skill there is felicity.

12. The first seven satires of Boileau appeared in 1666; and these, though much inferior to his later productions, are characterised by La Harpe as the earliest poetry in the French language where the mechanism of its verse was fully understood, where the style was always pure and elegant, where the ear was uniformly gratified. The Art of Poetry was published in 1673, the Lutrin in 1674; the Epistles followed at various periods. Their elaborate though equable strain, in a kind of poetry which, never requiring high flights of fancy, escapes the censure of mediocrity and monotony which might sometimes fall upon it, generally excites more admiration in those who have been accustomed to the numerous defects of less finished poets, than it retains in a later age, when others have learned to emulate and preserve the same uniformity. The fame of Pope was transcendant for this reason, and Boileau is the analogue of Pope in French literature.

13. The Art of Poetry has been the model of the Essay His Art of On Criticism; few poems more resemble each other. I will not weigh in opposite scales two compositions, of which one claims an advantage from its having been the original, the other from the youth of its author. Both are uncommon efforts of critical good sense, and both are distin-

. Let us take, for example, the first happy; but there can be no doubt about that in stalles, which sports the effect of the preceding, and is feebly redundant. The last words are almost equally bad; no question could arise about the serpent's guilt, which had been assumed before. But these petty blematics are abandantly redeemed by the rest of the fable, which is beautiful in choice of the lights and language, and may be classed with the best in the collection, lines of L'Horome et la Couleuvre.

La hotteme vit une consentre.
Ab en son de pour en vas faire un œuvre Agressive à trait en tress?
A res muits l'amines presents.
(Chest le sempent que je soon dure,
Ré son l'amine on pourroit alidement é'y

A commer c respond so lateaunt attrapper Est pro mis est in our , et, ce quillet in pies,. Ou cess, il ca mert, the recomposite on mos

None of these lines appear to me very guished by their short and pointed language, which remains in the memory. Boileau has very well incorporated the thoughts of Horace with his own, and given them a skilful adaptation to his own times. He was a bolder critic of his contemporaries than Pope. He took up arms against those who shared the public favour, and were placed by half Paris among great dramatists and poets, Pradon, Desmarests, Brebouf. This was not true of the heroes of the Dunciad. His scorn was always bitter and probably sometimes unjust; yet posterity has ratified almost all his judgments. False taste, it should be remembered, had long infected the poetry of Europe; some steps had been lately taken to repress it, but extravagance, affectation, and excess of refinement are weeds that can only be eradicated by a thorough cleansing of the soil, by a process of burning and paring which leaves not a seed of them in the public mind. And when we consider the gross blemishes of this description that deform the earlier poetry of France, as of other nations, we cannot blame the severity of Boileau, though he may occasionally have condemned in the mass what contained some intermixture of real excellence. We have become of late years in England so enamoured of the heauties of our old writers, and certainly they are of a superior kind, that we are sometimes more than a little blind to their faults.

14. By writing satires, epistles, and an art of poetry, Boileau has challenged an obvious comparison with Comparison Horace. Yet they are very unlike; one easy, collisionally abandoning himself to every change that arises in his mind, the other uniform as a regiment under arms, always equal, always laboured, incapable of a bold neglect. Poetry seems to have been the delight of one, the task of the other. The pain that Boileau must have felt in writing communicates itself in some measure to the reader; we are fearful of losing some point, of passing over some epithet without sufficiently perceiving its selection; it is as with those pictures, which are to be viewed long and attentively, till our admiration of detached proofs of skill becomes wearisome by repetition.

15. The Lutrin is the most popular of the poems of

Boileau. Its subject is ill chosen; neither interest nor variety could be given to it. Tassoni and Pope have the advantage in this respect; if their leading theme is trifling, we lose sight of it in the gay liveliness of description and episode. In Boileau, after we have once been told that the canons of a church spend their lives in sleep and eating, we have no more to learn, and grow tired of keeping company with a race so stupid and sensual. But the poignant wit and satire, the elegance and correctness of numberless couplets, as well as the ingenious adaptation of classical passages, redeem this poem, and confirm its high place in the mock-heroic line.

16. The great deficiency of Boileau is in sensibility. Far below Pope or even Dryden in this essential quality, the second which the moral epistle or satire not only admits but requires, he rarely quits two paths, those of reason and of raillery. His tone on moral subjects is firm and severe, but not very noble; a trait of pathos, a single touch of pity or tenderness, will rarely be found. This of itself serves to give a dryness to his poetry, and it may be doubtful, though most have read Boileau, whether many have read him twice.

17. The pumpous tone of Ronsard and Du Bartas had become ridiculous in the reign of Louis XIV. Even that of Malherhe was too elevated for the public taste; none at least imitated that writer, though the critics had set the example of admiring him. Boileau. who had done much to turn away the world from imagination to plain sense, once attempted to emulate the grandiloquent strains of Pindar in an ode on the taking of Namur, but with no such success as could encourage himself or others to repeat the experiment. Yet there was no want of gravity or elevation in the prose writers of France, nor in the tragedies of Racine. But the French language is not very well adapted for the higher kind of lyric poetry, while it suits admirably the lighter forms of song and epigram. And their poets, in this age, were almost entirely men living at Paris, either in the court, or at least in a refined society, the most adverse of all to the poetical character. The influence of wit and politeness is generally directed towards rendering enthusiasm or warmth of fancy ridiculous; and without these no great energy of genius can be displayed. But, in their proper department, several poets of considerable merit appeared.

18. Benserade was called peculiarly the poet of the court; for twenty years it was his business to compose Benserade. verses for the ballets represented before the king. His skill and tact were shown in deheate contrivances to make those who supported the characters of gods and goddesses in these fictions, being the nobles and ladies of the court, betray their real inclinations, and sometimes their gallantries. He even presumed to shadow in this manner the passion of Louis for Mademoiselle La Valière, before it was publicly acknowledged. Benserade must have had no small ingenuity and adroitness; but his verses did not survive those who called them forth. In a different school, not essentially, perhaps, much more vicious than the court, but more careless of appearances, and rather proud of an immorality which it had no interest to conceal, that of Ninon l'Enclos, several of higher reputation grew up; Chapelle (whose real name was L'Huillier), La Fare, Bachaumont, Lainezer, and Chaulien. The first, perhaps, and certainly the last of these, are worthy to be remembered. La Harpe has said, that Chaulieu alone retains a claim to be read in a style where Voltaire has so much left all others behind, that no comparison with him can ever be admitted. Chaulien was an original genius, his poetry has a marked character, being a happy mixture of a gentle and peaceable philosophy with a lively imagination. His verses flow from his soul, and though often negligent through indolence, are never in bad taste or affected. Harmony of versification, grace and gaiety, with a voluptuous and Epicurean, but mild and benevolent, turn of thought, belong to Chaulieu, and these are qualities which do not fail to attract the majority of readers.

19. It is rather singular that a style so uncongenial to the spirit of that age as pastoral poetry appears was radoral quite as much cultivated as before. But it is still isotro true that the spirit of the age gained the victory, and drove the shepherds from their shady bowers, though without substituting any thing more rational in the fairy tales which superseded the pastoral romance. At the middle of the century, and partially till near its close, the style of D'Urfé and Scudery retained its popularity. Three poets of the age of Louis were known in pastoral; Segrais, Madame Deshoulieres, and Fontenelle. The first belongs most to the genuine school of modern pastoral; he is elegant, romantic, full of complaining love; the Spanish and French romances had been his model in invention, as Virgil was in style. La Harpe allows him nature, sweetness, and sentiment; but he cannot emulate the vivid colouring of Virgil, and the language of his shepherds, though simple, wants elegance and harmony. The tone of his pastorals seems rather insipid, though La Harpe has quoted some pleasing lines. Madame Deshoulières, Deshous Green with a purer style than Segrais, according to the same critic, has less genius. Others have thought her Idylls the best in the language. But these seem to be merely trivial moralities addressed to flowers, brooks, and sheep, sometimes expressed in a manuer both ingenious and natural, but on the whole too feeble to give much pleasure. Bouterwek observes that her poetry is to be considered as that of a woman, and that its pastoral morality would be somewhat childish in the mouth of man; whether this says more for the lady, or against her sex, I must leave to the reader. She has occasionally some very pleasing and even poetical passages.† The third among these poets of the pipe is Fontenelle. But his pastorals, as Bouterwek Fontenelle. says, are too artificial for the ancient school, and too cold for the romantic. La Harpe blames, besides this general fault, the negligence and prosaic phrases of his style. The best is that entitled Ismene. It is in fact a poem for the world; yet as love and its artifices are found every where, we cannot censure any passage as absolutely unfit for pastoral, save a certain refinement which belonged to the author in every thing, and which interferes with our sense of rural

^{*} La Harpe, Bouterwek, vi. 127. Biogr. Univ.

20. In the superior walks of poetry France had nothing of simplicity.

Biogr. Univ.

which she has been inclined to boast. Chapelain, a man of some credit as a critic, produced his long-laboured points. La Pucelle, in 1656, which is only remembered by the insulting ridicule of Boileau. A similar fate has fallen on the Clovis of Desmarests, published in 1684, though the German historian of literature has extolled the richness of imagination it shows, and observed that if those who saw nothing but a fantastic writer in Desmarests had possessed as much fancy, the national poetry would have been of a higher character. Brebæuf's translation of the Pharsalia is spirited, but very extravagant.

21. The literature of Germany was now more corrupted by bad taste than ever. A second Silesian school, German but much inferior to that of Opitz, was founded by Hoffmanswaldau and Lohenstein. The first had great facility, and imitated Ovid and Marini with some success. The second, with worse taste, always tunid and striving at something elevated, so that the Lohenstein swell became a by-word with later critics, is superior to Hoffmanswaldau in richness of fancy, in poetical invention, and in warmth of feeling for all that is noble and great. About the end of the century arose a new style, known by the unhappy name spiritless (geistlos), which, avoiding the tone of Lohenstein, became wholly tame and flat.†

SECT. III. - ON ENGLISH POETRY.

Wallet - Butler - Millon - Dryden - The Mover Poets.

22. We might have placed Waller in the former division of the seventeenth century, with no more impropriety than we might have reserved Cowley for the latter; both belong by the date of their writings to the two periods. And perhaps the poetry of Waller bears rather the stamp of the first Charles's age than of that which ensued. His reputation was great, and somewhat more durable than that of similar poets has generally been; he did not witness its decay in his own protracted life, nor was it much dininished at the beginning of the next century. Nor was this wholly undeserved. Waller has a more uniform elegance, a more sure facility and happiness of expression, and, above all, a greater exemption from glaring faults, such as pedantry, extravagance, conceit, quaintness, obscurity, ungrammatical and unmeaning constructions, than any of the Caroline era with whom he would naturally be compared. We have only to open Carew or Lovelace to perceive the difference; not that Waller is wholly without some of these faults, but that they are much less frequent. If others may have brighter passages of fancy or sentiment, which is not difficult, he husbands better his resources, and though left behind in the beginning of the race, comes sooner to the goal. His Panegyric on Cromwell was celebrated. "Such a series of verses," it is said by Johnson, " had rarely appeared before in the English language. Of these lines some are grand, some are graceful, and all are musical. There is now and then a feeble verse, or a trifling thought; but its great fault is the choice of its hero." It may not be the opinion of all, that Cromwell's actions were of that obscure and pitiful character which the majesty of song rejects, and Johnson has before observed, that Waller's choice of encomiastic topics in this poem is very judicious. Yet his deficiency in poetical vigour will surely be traced in this composition; if he rarely sinks, he never rises very high, and we find much good sense and selection, much skill in the mechanism of language and metre, without ardour and without imagination. In his amorous poetry, he has little passion or sensibility; but he is never free and petulant, never tedious, and never absurd. His praise consists much in negations; but in a comparative estimate, perhaps negations ought to count for a good deal.

Bouterwek, vi. 137
 1d. vol. n. p. 288. Hemsius, iv. iv. 776.

23. Hudibras was incomparably more popular than Paramanera dise Lost; no poem in our language rose at once to greater reputation. Nor can this be called ephemeral, like that of most political poetry. For at least half a century after its publication it was generally read, and perpetually quoted. The wit of Butler has still preserved many lines; but Hudibras now attracts comparatively few readers. The eulogies of Johnson seem rather adapted to what he remembered to have been the fame of Butler, than to the feelings of the surrounding generation; and since his time, new sources of amusement have sprung up, and writers of a more intelligible pleasantry have superseded those of the seventeenth century. In the fiction of Hudibras there was never much to divert the reader, and there is still less left at present. But what has been censured as a fault, the length of dialogue, which puts the fiction out of sight, is in fact the source of all the pleasure that the work affords. The sense of Butler is masculine, his wit inexhaustible, and it is supplied from every source of reading and observation. But these sources are often so unknown to the reader that the wit loses its effect through the obscurity of its allusions, and he yields to the bane of wit, a purblind mole-like pedantry. His versification is sometimes spirited, and his rhymes humorous; yet he wants that case and flow which we require in light poetry.

24. The subject of Paradise Lost is the finest that has ever been chosen for heroic poetry; it is also ma- Paradha naged by Milton with remarkable skill. The Iliad Cross of wants completeness; it has an unity of its own, but "beet it is the unity of a part where we miss the relation to a whole. The Odyssey is not imperfect in this point of view; but the subject is hardly extensive enough for a legitimate epic. The Æneid is spread over too long a space, and perhaps the latter books, by the diversity of scene and subject, lose part of that intimate connexion with the former which an epic poem requires. The Pharsalia is open to the same criticism as the Iliad. The Thebaid is not deficient in unity or greatness of action; but it is one that possesses no sort of interest in our eyes. Tasso is far superior both in choice and management of his subject to most of these. Yet the Fall of Man has a more general interest than the Crusade.

25. It must be owned, nevertheless, that a religious epic labours under some disadvantages; in proportion as it attracts those who hold the same tenets with the owned in author, it is regarded by those who dissent from him with indifference or aversion. It is said that the discovery of Milton's Arianism, in this rigid generation, has already impaired the sale of Paradisc Lost. It is also difficult to enlarge or adorn such a story by fiction. Milton has done much in this way; yet he was partly restrained by the necessity of conforming to Scripture.

26. The ordennance or composition of the Paradise Lost tu arrange. is admirable; and here we perceive the advantage which Milton's great familiarity with the Greek theatre and his own original scheme of the poem had given him. Every part succeeds in an order, noble, clear, and natural. It might have been wished indeed that the vision of the eleventh book had not been changed into the colder narrative of the twelfth. But what can be more majestic than the first two books, which open this great drama? It is true that they rather serve to confirm the sneer of Dryden that Satan is Milton's hero; since they develop a plan of action in that potentate, which is ultimately successful; the triumph that he and his host must experience in the fall of man being hardly compensated by their temporary conversion into serpents; a fiction rather too grotesque. But it is, perhaps, only pedantry to talk about the hero, as if a high personage were absolutely required in an epic poem to predominate over the rest. The conception of Satan is doubtless the first effort of Milton's genius. Dante could not have ventured to spare so much lustre for a ruined archangel, in an age when nothing less than horns and a tail were the orthodox creed.

* Coloridge has a line passage which carnot resist my desire to transcribe. The character of Satan is pride and usual indulgence, finding in itself the office of ict. in. It is the character so then seem in bittle on the political stage.

But around this character in has thrown a segularity of during, a granten seem in bittle on the political stage.

Carlot is all the restlessness, tementry, it counting which have marked the ights hasters of mankind from Ni arod.

To reading such a paragraph in this, we are street by the wast in provenient of the highest criticism, the p basephy of each et exceed to discondition. His papers is the Spectator on Paratra Lost were perhaps superior to any restriction that had been written in our long ange; and we must always takeambedge their good sense, their judiciousness, and the Coloridge has a time passage which I carnot result my disks to transcribe. The character of Satan is pride and sensial indulgance, finding in itself the motive of action. It is the character so often seen to little on the political stage. It is done all the restlessness, temerity, and counting which have marked the mighty harters of mankind from Ni acod to Aspoleon. The common fuscination of man is that these great man, as they are called, must set from some great mative. Militarian set from some great mative. Militarian set from some great mative. Militarian set from some great matical of exotom which would enther regain held than serve in heaven. It places the last of self in opposition to demail of self or duty, and to show what

27. Milton has displayed great skill in the delineations of Adam and Eve; he does not dress them up, after the fashion of orthodox theology, which had no spell of Adam to bind his free spirit, in the fancied robes of primitive righteousness. South, in one of his sermons, has drawn a picture of unfallen man, which is even poetical; but it might be asked by the reader, Why then did he fall? The first pair of Milton are innocent of course, but not less frail than their posterity; nor except one circumstance, which seems rather physical intoxication than any thing else, do we find any sign of depravity superinduced upon their transgression. It might even be made a question for profound theologians whether Eve, by taking amiss what Adam had said, and by self-conceit, did not sin before she tasted the fatal apple. The necessary pancity of actors in Paradise Lost is perhaps the apology of Sin and Death; they will not bear exact criticism, yet we do not wish them away.

28. The comparison of Milton with Homer has been founded on the acknowledged pre-eminence of each in his own language, and on the lax application of the word epic to their great poems. But there was not much in common either between their genius or its products; and Milton has taken less in direct imitation from Homer than from several other poets. His favourites had rather been Sophocles and Euripides; to them he owes the structure of his blank verse, his swell and dignity of style, his grave enunciation of moral and abstract sentiment, his tone of description, neither condensed like that of Dante, nor apread out with the diffuseness of the other Italians and vast service they did to our hterature, in settling the Paradise List on its proper level. But how little they satisfy us, even in treating of the meturo naturatio, the poem itself, and have little conseption, they show of the natural naturation, the individual genius of the author? Liven in the period call criticism of the present day, in the midst of much that is affected, much that is precipitate, much that is written for mere display, we find occaniously reflections of a profundity and discrimination which we should seek in vain through Tryden or Addison, or the two Wartons, in even Johnson, though much superior to the rest. If ned has perhaps the ment of being the first who in the country aimed at philosophical criticism; he had great ingenity, a good deal of reading, and a facility in applying it; but he did not feel very deeps, was somewhat of a coxemb, and having always before his eyes a model menther good in itself, nor made for him to omidate, he assumes a dogmatic arrogance, which, as it always offends the reader, so for the most part itands in the way of the author's own search for truth.

of Homer himself. Next to these Greek tragedians, Virgil seems to have been his model; with the minor Latin poets. except Ovid, he does not, I think, show any great familiarity; and though abundantly conversant with Ariosto, Tasso, and Marini, we cannot say that they influenced his manner, which, unlike theirs, is severe and stately, never light, nor in the sense we should apply the words to them.

rapid and animated.

29. To Dante, however, he bears a much greater likeness. Compared He has in common with that poet an uniform seri-ousness, for the brighter colouring of both is but the smile of a pensive mind, a foudness for argumentative speech, and for the same strain of argument. This indeed proceeds in part from the general similarity, the religious and even theological cast of their subjects; I advert particularly to the last part of Dante's poem. We may almost say, when we look to the resemblance of their prose writings, in the proud sense of being born for some great achievement, which breathes through the Vita Nuova, as it does through Milton's earlier treatises, that they were twin spirits, and that each might have animated the other's body, that each would, as it were, have been the other, if he had lived in the other's age. As it is, I incline to prefer Milton, that is, the Paradise Lost, both because the subject is more extensive, and because the resources of his genius are more multifarious. Dante sins more against good taste, but only perhaps because there was no good taste in his time; for Milton has also too much a disposition to make the grotesque accessory to the terrible. Could Milton have written the lines on Ugolino? Perhaps he could. Those on Francesca? Not, I think, every line. Could Dante have planned such a poem as Paradise Lost? Not certainly, being Dante in 1800; but living when Milton did, perhaps he could. It is however useless to go on with questions that no one can fully answer. To compare the two poets, read two or three cantos of the Purgatory or Paradise, and then two or three

The solemnity of Milton is striking wholly uncongenial to him. A few lines in those passages where some other poets in Paraduo Lost are rather too plain, would indulge a little in voluptuousness, and their gravity makes them worse. and the more so, because this is not hundred lines of Paradise Lost. Then take Homer, or even Virgil, the difference will be striking. Yet notwithstanding this analogy of their minds, I have not perceived that Milton imitates Dante very often, probably from having committed less to memory while young (and Dante was not the favourite poet of Italy when Milton was there), than of Ariosto and Tasso.

30. Each of these great men chose the subject that suited his natural temper and genius. What, it is curious to conjecture, would have been Milton's success in his original design, a British story? Far less surely than in Paradise Lost; he wanted the rapidity of the common heroic poem, and would always have been sententious, perhaps arid and heavy. Yet even as religious poets, there are several remarkable distinctions between Milton and Dante. been justly observed that, in the Paradise of Dante, he makes use of but three leading ideas, light, music, and motion, and that Milton has drawn Heaven in less pure and spiritual colours. The philosophical imagination of the former, in this third part of his poem, almost defecated from all sublanary things by long and solitary musing, spiritualises all that it touches. The genius of Milton, though itself subjective, was less so than that of Dante; and he has to recount, to describe, to bring deeds and passions before the eye. And two peculiar causes may be assigned for this difference in the treatment of celestial things between the Divine Comedy and the Paradise Lost; the dramatic form which Milton had originally designed to adopt, and his own theological bias towards anthropomorphitism, which his posthumous treatise on religion has brought to light. This was no doubt in some measure inevitable in such a subject as that of Paradise Lost; yet much that is ascribed to God, sometimes with the sauction of Scripture, sometimes without it, is not wholly pleasing; such as " the oath that shook Heaven's whole circumference," and several other images of the same kind, which bring down the Deity in a manner not consonant to philosophical religion, shown in the delineation of Eve. an ^{*} Quarterly Review, June, 1825. This article contains some good and opinion not that of Addison or of many some questionable remarks on Milton; others, who have thought her exquisitely among the latter I reckets the proposi-

however it may be borne out by the sensual analogies, or mythic symbolism of Oriental writing.*

31. We rarely meet with feeble lines in Paradise Lost t, though with many that are hard, and, in a common use of the word, might be called prosaic. Yet few are truly prosaic; few wherein the tone is not some way distinguished from prose. The very artificial style of Milton, sparing in English idiom, and his study of a rhythm, not always the most grateful to our ears, but preserving his blank verse from a trivial flow, is the cause of this elevation. It is at least more removed from a prosaic cadence than the slovenly rhymes of such contemporary poets as Chamberlayne. His versification is entirely his own, framed on a Latin and chiefly a Virgilian model, the pause less frequently resting on the close of the line than in Homer, and much less than in our own dramatic poets. But it is also possible that the Italian and Spanish blank verse may have had some effect upon his ear.

32. In the numerous imitations, and still more numerous Reblad. traces of older poetry which we perceive in Paradise Lost, it is always to be kept in mind that he had only his recollection to rely upon. His blindness seems to have been complete before 1651; and I scarcely think that he had begun his poem, before the auxiety and trouble into which the public strife of the commonwealth and the restoration had thrown him gave leisure for immortal occupatious. Then the remembrance of early reading came over his dark and lonely path like the moon emerging from the clouds. Then it was that the muse was truly his; not only as she uniting themselves with the soul, as well as assuming all kinds of form, though their natural appearance is almost always anthropomorphie. And, after all Sutan does not animate a real toad, but takes the shape of one. "Squat like a toad close by the ear of Eve." But he does enter a real serpent, so that the instance of Johnson is all chosen. If he had mentioned the serpent, every one would have seen that the identity of the yet his animat on of the serpent was ab- an inal serpent with Satan is part of the

† One of the few exceptions is in the aublime description of Death, where a wretched benustich, "Fierce as ten furies," stands as an unsightly blemush,

[.] Johnson thinks that Milton should have secured the consistency of this poem. by keeping immateriality out of night, and entiring his reader to drop it from his thoughts. But here the subject for-bad him to preserve consistency, if indeed there be inconsistency in supposing a rapid assumption of form by spiritual beings. For though the instance that Johnson alleges of inconsistency in Satan's animating a toad was not necessary, solutely indispensable. And the same original account. has been done by other ports, who do not scruple to suppose their gods, their fairies or deads, or their allegorical personages, inspiring thoughts, and even poured her creative inspiration into his mind, but as the daughter of Memory, coming with fragments of ancient melodies, the voice of Euripides, and Homer, and Tasso; sounds that he had loved in youth, and treasured up for the solace of his age. They who, though not enduring the calamity of Milton, have known what it is, when afar from books, in solitude or in travelling, or in the intervals of worldly care, to feed on poetical recollections, to murmur over the beautiful lines whose cadence has long delighted their ear, to recall the sentiments and images which retain by association the charm that early years once gave them - they will feel the inestimable value of committing to the memory, in the prime of its power, what it will easily receive and indelibly retain. I know not indeed whether an education that deals much with poetry, such as is still usual in England, has any more solid argument among many in its fayour, than that it lays the foundation of intellectual pleasures at the other extreme of life.

· 33. It is owing, in part, to his blindness, but more perhaps to his general residence in a city, that Milton, Ha seed on the words of Coleridge, is " not a picture sque but for munic a musical poet;" or, as I would prefer to say, is the latter more of the two. He describes visible things, and often with great powers of rendering them manifest, what the Greeks called evapores, though seldom with so much circumstantial exactness of observation as Spenser or Dante; but he feels music. The sense of vision delighted his imagination, but that of sound wrapped his whole soul in ecstasy. One of his trifling faults may be connected with this, the excessive passion he displays for stringing together sonorous names, sometimes so obscure that the reader associates nothing with them, as the word Namancos in Lycidas, which long baffled the commentators. Hence his catalogues, unlike those of Homer and Virgil, are sometimes merely ornamental and misplaced. Thus the names of unbuilt cities come strangely forward in Adam's vision *, though he has afterwards gone over the same ground with better effect in Paradise Regained. In this there was also a mixture of his pedantry. But, though he was rather too ostentatious of learning, the nature of his subject demanded a good deal of episodical ornament. And this, rather than the precedents he might have alleged from the Italians and others, is perhaps the best Faulte in apology for what some grave critics have censured, his frequent allusions to fable and mythology. These give much relief to the severity of the poem, and few readers would dispense with them. Less excuse can be made for some affectation of science which has produced hard and unpleasing lines; but he had been born in an age when more credit was gained by reading much than by writing well. The faults, however, of Paradise Lost are in general less to be called faults, than necessary adjuncts of the qualities we most admire, and idiosyncrasies of a mighty genius. The verse of Milton is sometimes wanting in grace, and almost always in ease; but what better can be said of his prose? His foreign idioms are too frequent in the one; but they predominate in the other.

34. The slowness of Milton's advance to glory is now generally owned to have been much exaggerated; we might say that the reverse was nearer the truth. "The sale of 1300 copies in two years," says Johnson, "in opposition to so much recent enmity, and to a style of versification new to all and disgusting to many, was an uncommon example of the prevalence of genius. The demand did not immediately increase; for many more readers than were supplied at first the nation did not afford. Only 3000 were sold in eleven years." It would hardly however be said, even in this age, of a poem 8000 copies of which had been sold in eleven years, that its success had been small; and some, perhaps, might doubt whether Paradise Lost, published eleven years since, would have met with a greater demand. There is sometimes a want of congeniality in public taste which no power of genius will overcome. For Milton it must be said by every one conversant with the literature of the age that preceded Addison's famous criticism, from which some have dated the reputation of Paradise Lost, that he took his place among great poets from the beginning. The fancy of Johnson that few dared to praise it, and that "the revolution put an end to the secrecy of love," is without foundation; the government of Charles II. was not so absurdly tyrannical, nor did Dryden, the court's own poet, hesitate, in his preface to the State of Innocence, published soon after Milton's death, to speak of its original, Paradise Lost, as " undoubtedly one of the greatest, most noble, and most sublime poems which either this age or nation has produced."

35. The neglect which Paradise Lost never experienced seems to have been long the lot of Paradise Re-Paradise gained. It was not popular with the world; it was long believed to manifest a decay of the poet's genius, and in spite of all that the critics have written, it is still but the favourite of some whose predilections for the Miltonic style are very strong. The subject is so much less capable of calling forth the vast powers of his mind, that we should be unfair in comparing it throughout with the greater poem; it has been called a model of the shorter epic, an action comprehending few characters and a brief space of time. The love of Milton for dramatic dialogue, imbibed from Greece, is still more apparent than in Paradise Lost; the whole poem in fact may almost be accounted a drama of primal simplicity, the narrative and descriptive part serving rather to diversify and relieve the speeches of the actors, than their speeches, as in the legitimate epic, to enliven the narration, Paradise Regained abounds with passages equal to any of the same nature in Paradise Lost; but the argumentative tone is kept up till it produces some tediousness, and perhaps on the whole less pains have been exerted to adorn and elevate even that which appeals to the imagination.

36. Samson Agonistes is the latest of Milton's poems; we see in it, perhaps more distinctly than in Paradise gamen Regained, the ebb of a mighty tide. An air of Archates uncommon grandeur prevails throughout; but the language is less poetical than in Paradise Lost; the vigour of thought remains, but it wants much of its ancient elequence. Nor is the lyric tone well kept up by the chorus; they are too sententious, too slow in movement, and, except by the metre, are not easily distinguishable from the other personages. But this metre is itself infelicitous; the lines being frequently of a number of syllables not recognised in the usage of English poetry, and, destitute of rhythmical measure, fall into prose. Milton seems to have forgotten that the ancient chorus had a musical accompaniment.

37. The style of Samson, being essentially that of Paradise Lost, may show us how much more the latter poem is founded on the Greek tragedians than on Homer. In Samson we have sometimes the pompous tone of Æschylus, more frequently the sustained majesty of Sophocles; but the religious solemnity of Milton's own temperament, as well as the nature of the subject, have given a sort of breadth, an unbroken severity to the whole drama. It is perhaps not very popular even with the lovers of poetry; yet upon close comparison we should find that it deserves a higher place than many of its prototypes. We might search the Greek tragedies long for a character so powerfully conceived and maintained as that of Samson himself; and it is but conformable to the sculptural simplicity of that form of drama which Milton adopted, that all the rest should be kept in subordination to it. "It is only," Johnson says, "by a blind confidence in the reputation of Milton, that a drama can be praised in which the intermediate parts have neither cause nor consequence, neither hasten nor retard the catastrophe." Such a drama is certainly not to be ranked with Othello and Macbeth, or even with the Gidipus or the Hippolytus; but a similar criticism is applicable to several famous tragedies in the less artificial school of antiquity, to the Prometheus and the Persæ of Æschylus, and if we look strictly, to not a few of the two other masters.

S8. The poetical genius of Dryden came slowly to perfection. Born in 1631, his first short poems, or, as we might rather say, copies of verses, were not written till he approached thirty; and though some of his dramas, not indeed of the best, belong to the next period of his life, he had reached the age of fifty, before his high rank as a poet had been confirmed by indubitable proof.
Yet he had manifested a superiority to his immediate contemporaries; his Astrea Redux, on the Restoration, is well versified; the lines are seldom weak, the couplets have that pointed manner which Cowley and Denham had taught the world to require; they are harmonious, but not so varied as the style he afterwards adopted. The Annus Mirabilis, in 1667, is of a higher cast; it is not so animated as the later poetry of Dryden, because the alternate quatrain, in which he followed Davenant's Gondibert, is hostile to animation; but it is not less favourable to another excellence, condensed and vigorous thought. Davenant indeed and Denham may be reckoned the models of Dryden, so far as this can be said of a man of original genius, and one far superior to theirs. The distinguishing characteristic of Dryden, it has been said by Scott, was the power of reasoning and expressing the result in appropriate language. This indeed was the characteristic of the two whom we have named, and so far as Dryden has displayed it, which he eminently has done, he bears a resemblance to them. But it is insufficient praise for this great poet. His rapidity of conception and readiness of expression are higher qualities. He never loiters about a single thought or image, never labours about the turn of a phrase. The impression upon our minds that he wrote with exceeding ease, is irresistible, and I do not know that we have any evidence to repel it. The admiration of Dryden gains upon us, if I may speak from my own experience, with advancing years, as we become more sensible of the difficulty of his style, and of the comparative facility of that which is merely imaginative.

S9. Dryden may be considered as a satirical, a reasoning, a descriptive and narrative, a lyric poet, and as a Aberton and translator. As a dramatist, we must return to him Actuarpted. again. The greatest of his satires is Absalom and Achitophel, that work in which his powers became fully known to the world, and which, as many think, he never surpassed, The admirable fitness of the English couplet for satire had never been shown before; in less skilful hands it had been ineffective. He does not frequently, in this poem, carry the sense beyond the second line, which, except when skilfully contrived, as it often is by himself, is apt to enfeeble the emphasis; his triplets are less numerous than usual, but energetic. The spontaneous ease of expression, the rapid transitions, the general elasticity and movement, have never been excelled. It is superfluous to praise the discrimination and vivacity of the chief characters, especially Shaftesbury and Buckingham, Satire, however, is so much easier than panegyric, that with Ormoud, Ossory, and Mulgrave he has not been quite so successful. In the second part of Absalom and Achitophel, written by Tate, one long passage alone is inserted by Dryden. It is excellent in its line of satire, but the line is less elevated; the persons delineated are less important, and he has indulged more his natural proneness to virulent ribaldry. This fault of Dryden's writings, it is just to observe, belonged less to the man than to the age. No libellous invective, no coarseness of allusion, had ever been spared towards a private or political enemy. We read with nothing but disgust the satirical poetry of Cleveland, Butler, Oldham, and Marvell, or even of men whose high rank did not soften their style, Rochester, Dorset, Mulgrave. In Dryden, there was, for the first time, a poignancy of wit which atones for his severity, and a discretion even in his taunts which made them more cutting.

40. The Medal, which is in some measure a continuation of Absalom and Achitophel, since it bears wholly on Shaftesbury, is of unequal merit, and on the whole falls much below the former. In Mac Flecknoe, his satire on his rival Shadwell, we must allow for the inferiority of the subject, which could not bring out so much of Dryden's higher powers of mind; but scarcely one of his poems is more perfect. Johnson, who admired Dryden almost as much as he could any one, has yet, from his proneness to critical censure, very much exaggerated the poet's defects. "His faults of negligence are beyond recital. Such is the unevenness of his compositions, that ten lines are seldom found together without something of which the reader is ashamed." This might be true, or more nearly true, of other poets of the seventeenth century. Ten good consecutive lines will, perhaps, rarely be found, except in Denham, Davenant, and Waller. But it seems a great exaggeration as to Dryden. I would particularly instance Mac Flecknoe as a poem of about four hundred lines, in which no one will be condemned as weak or negligent, though three or four are rather too ribaldrous for our taste. There are also passages, much exceeding ten lines, in Absalom and Achitophel, as well as in the later works, the Fables, which excite in the reader none of the shame for the poet's carelessness, with which Johnson has furnished him.

- 41. The argumentative talents of Dryden appear, more or less, in the greater part of his poetry; reason in The Hard rhyme was his peculiar delight, to which he seems and Penthec. to escape from the mere excursions of fancy. And it is remarkable that he reasons better and more closely in poetry than in prose. His productions more exclusively reasoning are the Religio Laici and the Hind and Panther. The latter is every way an extraordinary poem. It was written in the hey-day of exultation, by a recent proselyte to a winning side, as he dreamed it to be, by one who never spared a weaker foe, nor repressed his triumph with a dignified moderation. A year was hardly to elapse before he exchanged this fulness of pride for an old age of disappointment and poverty. Yet then too his genius was unquenched, and even his satire was not less severe.
- 42. The first lines in the Hind and Panther are justly reputed among the most musical in our language; In singular and perhaps we observe their rhythm the better be- false. cause it does not gain much by the sense; for the allegory and the fable are seen, even in this commencement, to be awkwardly blended. Yet, notwithstanding their evident incoherence, which sometimes leads to the verge of absurdity, and the facility they give to ridicule, I am not sure that Dryden was wrong in choosing this singular fiction. It was his aim to bring forward an old argument in as novel a style as he could; a dialogue between a priest and a parson would have made but a dull poem, even if it had contained some of the excellent paragraphs we read in the Hind and Panther. It is the grotesqueness and originality of the fable that give this poem its peculiar zest, of which no reader, I conceive. is insensible; and it is also by this means that Dryden has contrived to relieve his reasoning by short but beautiful touches of description, such as the sudden stream of light from heaven which announces the conception of James's unfortunate heir near the end of the second book.
- 43. The wit in the Hind and Panther is sharp, ready, and pleasant, the reasoning is sometimes admirably close and strong; it is the energy of Bossuet in verse. I do not know that the main argument of the Roman church could be better stated; all that has been well said for tradition and authority, all that serves to expose the inconsistencies of a vacillating protestantism, is in the Hind's mouth. It is such an answer as a caudid man should admit to any doubts of Dryden's sincerity. He who could argue as powerfully as the Hind may well be allowed to have thought himself in the right. Yet he could not forget a few bold thoughts of his more sceptical days, and such is his bias to sarcasm that he cannot restrain himself from reflections on kings and priests when he is most contending for them."

44. The Fables of Dryden, or stories modernised from Boccaccio and Chaucer, are at this day probably the most read and the most popular of Dryden's poems. They contain passages of so much more impressive beauty, and are altogether so far more adapted to general sympathy than those we have mentioned, that I should not hesitate to concur in this judgment. Yet Johnson's accusation of negligence is better supported by these than by the earlier poems. Whether it were that age and misfortune, though they had not impaired the poet's vigour, had rendered its continual exertion more wearisome, or, as is perhaps the better supposition, he reckoned an easy style, sustained above prose, in some places, rather by metre than expression, more fitted to narration, we find much which might appear slovenly to critics of Johnson's temper. The latter seems, in fact, to have conceived, like Milton, a theory, that good writing, at least in verse, is never either to follow the change of fashion, or to sink into familiar phrase, and that any deviation from this rigour should be branded as low and colloquial. But Dryden wrote on a different plan. He thought like Ariosto, and like Chaucer himself, whom he had to improve, that a story, especially when not heroic, should be told in easy and flowing language, without too much difference from that of prose, relying on his harmony, his occasional inversions, and his concealed skill in the choice of words, for its effect on the reader. He found [•] By education next have been maled. So they benear he dust they to were bred. The preservest, was what the turne began, And thus the civil imposes on the ins.

Part til

[&]quot;Call you this backing of your friends?" his new albest might have said, also a tone of popular idiom, not perhaps old English idiom, but such as had crept into society, current among his contemporaries; and though this has in many cases now become insufferably vulgar, and in others looks like affectation, we should make some allowance for the times in condemning it. This last blemish, however, is not much imputable to the Fables. Their beauties are innumerable; yet few are very well chosen; some, as Guiscard and Sigismunda, he has injured through coarseness of mind, which neither years nor religion had purified; and we want in all the power over emotion, the charm of sympathy, the skilful arrangement and selection of circumstance, which narrative poetry claims as its highest graces.

45. Dryden's fame as a lyric poet depends a very little on his Ode on Mrs. Killigrew's death, but almost entirely on that for St. Cecilia's Day, commonly called His Ories — Asstander's Feast.

Alexander's Feast. The former, which is much praised by Johnson, has a few fine lines, mingled with a far greater number ill conceived and ill expressed; the whole composition has that spirit which Dryden hardly ever wanted, but it is too faulty for high praise. The latter used to pass for the best work of Dryden and the best ode in the language. Many would now agree with me that is neither one nor the other, and that it was rather over-rated during a period when criticism was not at a high point. Its beauties indeed are undeniable; it has the raciness, the rapidity, the mastery of language which belong to Dryden; the transitions are animated, the contrasts effective. But few lines are highly poetical, and some sink to the level of a common drinking song. It has the defects, as well as the merits of that poetry which is written for musical accompaniment.

46. Of Dryden as a translator it is needless to say much. In some instances, as in an ode of Horace, he has done extremely well; but his Virgil is, in my apprehension, the least successful of his chief works. Lines of consummate excellence are frequently shot, like threads of gold, through the web, but the general texture is of an

of gold, through the web, but the general texture is of an ordinary material. Dryden was little fitted for a translator of Virgil; his mind was more rapid and vehement than that of his original, but by far less elegant and judicious. This translation seems to have been made in haste; it is more negligent than any of his own poetry, and the style is often almost studiously, and as it were spitefully, vulgar.

47. The supremacy of Dryden from the death of Milton in 1674 to his own in 1700 was not only unapproached by any English poet, but he held almost a complete monopoly of English poetry. This latter period of the seventeenth century, setting aside these two great names, is one remarkably sterile in poetical genius. Under the first Stuarts, men of warm imagination and sensibility, though with deficient taste and little command of language, had done some honour to our literature; though once neglected, they have come forward again in public esteem, and if not very extensively read, have been valued by men of kindred minds full as much as they deserve. The versifiers of Charles II. and William's days have experienced the opposite fate; popular for a time, and long so far known at least by name as to have entered rather largely into collections of poetry, they are now held in no regard, nor do they claim much favour from just criticism. Their object in general was to write like men of the world; with ease, wit, sense, and spirit, but dreading any soaring of fancy, any ardour of moral emotion, as the probable source of ridicule in their readers. Nothing quenches the flame of poetry more than this fear of the prosaic multitude; unless it is the community of habits with this very multitude, a life such as these poets generally led, of taverns and brothels, or, what came much to the same, of the court, We cannot say of Dryden, that "he bears no traces of those sable streams;" they sully too much the plumage of that stately swan, but his indomitable genius carries him upwards to a purer empyrean. The rest are just distinguishable from one another, not by any high gifts of the muse, but by degrees of spirit, of case, of poignancy, of skill and barmony in versification, of good sense and acuteness. They Same meter may easily be disposed of. Cleveland is sometimes humorous, but succeeds only in the lightest kinds of poetry. Marvell wrote sometimes with more taste and feeling than was usual, but his satires are gross and stupid. Oldham, far superior in this respect, ranks perhaps next to Dryden; he is spirited and pointed, but his versification is so too negligent, and his subjects temporary. Roscommon, one of the best for harmony and correctness of language, has little vigour, but he never offends, and Pope has justly praised his "unspotted bays." Mulgrave affects ease and spirit, but his Essay on Satire belies the supposition that Dryden had any share in it. Rochester, endowed by nature with more considerable and varied genius, might have raised himself to a higher place than he holds. Of Otway, Duke, and several more, it is not worth while to give any character. The Revolution did nothing for poetry; William's reign, always excepting Dryden, is our nader in works of imagination. Then came Blackmore with his epic poems of Prince Arthur and King Arthur, and Pomfret with his Choice, both popular in their own age, and both intolerable by their frigid and tame monotony in the next. The lighter poetry, meantime, of song and epigram did not sink along with the serious; the state of society was much less adverse to it. Rochester, Dorset, and some more whose names are unknown, or not easily traced, do credit to the Caroline period.

48. In the year 1699, a poem was published, Garth's Dispensary, which deserves attention, not so much for its own merit, though it comes nearest to Dryden, at whatever interval, as from its indicating a transitional state in our versification. The general structure of the couplet through the seventeenth century may be called abnormous; the sense is not only often carried beyond the second line, which the French avoid, but the second line of one couplet and the first of the next are not seldom united in a single sentence or a portion of one, so that the two, though not rhyming, must be read as a couplet. The former, when as dexterously managed as it was by Dryden, adds much to the beauty of the general versification; but the latter, a sort of adultery of the lives already wedded to other companions at shyme's altar, can scarcely ever be pleasing, unless it be in narrative poetry, where it may bring the sound nearer to prose. A tendency, however, to the French rule of constantly terminating the sense with the couplet will be perceived to have increased from the Restoration. Roscommon seldom deviates from it, and in long passages of Dryden himself there will hardly be found an exception. But, perhaps, it had not been so uniform in any former production as in the Dispensary. The versification of this once famous mock-heroic poem is smooth and regular, but not forcible; the language clear and neat; the parodies and allusions happy. Many lines are excellent in the way of pointed application, and some are remembered and quoted, where few call to mind the author. It has been remarked that Garth enlarged and altered the Dispensary in almost every edition, and what is more uncommon, that every alteration was for the better. This poem may be called an imitation of the Lutrin, inasmuch as but for the Lutrin it might probably not have been written, and there are even particular resemblances. The subject, which is a quarrel between the physicians and anothecaries of London, may vie with that of Boileau in want of general interest; yet it seems to afford more diversity to the satirical poet. Garth, as has been observed, is a link of transition between the style and turn of poetry under Charles and William, and that we find in Addison, Prior, Tickell, and Pope, during the reign of Anne.

SECT. IV .- ON LATIN POETRY.

49. The Jesuits were not unmindful of the credit their Latin verses had done them in periods more favourable to that exercise of taste than the present. Even in Italy, which had ceased to be a very genial soil, one of their number, Ceva, may deserve mention. His Jesus Puer is a long poem, not inelegantly written, but rather singular in some of its descriptions, where the poet has been more solicitous to adorn his subject than attentive to its proper character; and the same objection might be made to some of its episodes. Ceva wrote also a philosophical poem, extolled by Corniani, but which has not fallen into my hands. Averani, a Florentine of various erudition, Cappellari, Strozzi, author of a poem on chocolate, and several others, both within the order of Loyola and without it, cultivated Latin poetry with some success. But, though some might be superior as poets, none were more remarkable or famous than Sergardi, best known by some biting satires under the name of Q. Sectanus, which he levelled at his personal enemy Gravina. The reputation, indeed, of Gravina with posterity has not been affected by such libels; but they are not wanting either in poignancy and spirit, or in a command of Latin phrase.

[.] Corntani, vist. 214. Sal6, siv. 257.

50. The superiority of France in Latin verse was no longer contested by Holland or Germany. Several or contested poets of real merit belong to this period. The first in time was Claude Quillet, who, in his Callipsedia, bears the Latinised name of Leti. This is written with much elegance of style and a very harmonious versification. No writer has a more Virgilian cadence. Though inferior to Sammarthanus, he may be reckoned high among the French poets. He has been reproached with too open an exposition of some parts of his subject; which applies only to the second book.

51. The Latin poems of Menage are not unpleasing; he has indeed no great fire or originality, but the harmonious couplets glide over the ear, and the mind is pleased to recognise the tesselated fragments of Ovid and Tibullus. His affected passion for Mademoiselle Lavergne and lamentations about her cruelty are ludicrous enough, when we consider the character of the man, as Vadius in the Femmes Savantes of Molière. They are perfect models of want of truth; but it is a want of truth to nature, not to the conventional forms of modern Latin verse.

52. A far superior performance is the poem on gardens by the Jesuit Réné Rapin. For skill in varying and Region adorning his subject, for a truly Virgilian spirit in expression, for the exclusion of feeble, prosaic, or awkward lines, he may perhaps be equal to any poet, to Sammarthanus, or to Samnazarius himself. His cadences are generally very gratifying to the ear, and in this respect he is much above Vida. I But his subject, or his genius, has prevented ^{*} Bibl. Choisie, vol. xxis. Salfi, xiv. 238., et post.

[†] Salfi, xiv. 299. Corniani, viti. 280, † As the poem of Rapin is not in the him from rising very high; he is the poet of gardens, and what gardens are to nature, that is he to mightier poets. There is also too monotonous a repetition of nearly the same images, as in his long enumeration of flowers in the first book; the descriptions are separately good, and great artifice is shown in varying them; but the variety could not be sufficient to remove the general sameness that belongs to an horticultural catalogue. Rapin was a great admirer of box and all topiary works, or trees cut into artificial forms.

53. The first book of the Gardens of Rapiu is on flowers, the second on trees, the third on waters, and the fourth ou fruits. The poem is of about 3000 lines, sustained with equa-All kinds of graceful associations are mingled ble dignity. with the description of his flowers, in the fanciful style of Ovid and Darwin; the violet is lanthis, who lurked in valleys to shun the love of Apollo, and stained her face with purple to preserve her chastity; the rose is Rhodanthe, proud of her beauty, and worshipped by the people in the place of Diana, but changed by the indignant Apollo to a tree, while the populace, who had adored her, are converted into her thorns, and her chief lovers into snails and butterflies. A tendency to conceit is perceived in Rapin, as in the two poets to whom we have just compared him. Thus, in some pretty lines, he supposes Nature to have "tried her prentice hand" in making a convolvalus before she ventured upon a lily.*

54. In Rapin there will generally be remarked a certain redundancy, which fastidious critics might call tautology of expression. But this is not uncommon in Virgil. The Georgies have rarely been more happily imitated, especially lands of every one who has taste for Latin poetry, I will give as a specimen the introduction to the second book

Me nemora utque cinitia netocrata pulcherri-

Et spales protrandiere late fordanda per hortum Ablactic reages deems and weather evidents;

Ablactic reages deems and grave a rate

As grander fact or ally a april or evidents;

ta mil la vilangat ventro de la curre radios. Le le abere qui afo velant a va trat, a ca ratés, Tosc et aanum moretaru capsti Indpossassa coro-

Jam as contenti frondosa cae imita quercus Inclimat, plaudanique comii nemera alta com-

ton plausim responsat Gallia style

Nee me delade mo teneat chamore Citharen, New above to diese their extrato crubes. You Delegar the to adeque Mileson Authorise Careline, Ant right has no but action from the closer, by the man carrier but a careful for a careful from the first three from a first section to the careful from the first three from a first section for a first section for the first first for a first a first for a first for a first for a first first for a first first for a f

One or two words in these lines are not strictly correct; but they are lighly Virgilian, both in manner and rhythin.

* Et tu rumple humum, et multo to flore pro-fund a

Qu' 1 A antec sorp a convolvable valtes,
Folder connection meditants has quondam Natura; cum sest opera ad majora pararet

in their didactic parts, than by Rapin in the Gardens; but he has not the high flights of his prototype; his digressions are short and belong closely to the subject; we have no plague, no civil war, no Eurydice. If he praises Louis XIV., it is more as the founder of the garden of Versailles, than as the conqueror of Flanders, though his concluding lines emulate, with no unworthy spirit, those of the last Georgic. It may be added, that some French critics have thought the famous poem of Delille on the same subject inferior to that of Rapin.

55. Santeul (or Santolius) has been reckoned one of the best Latin poets whom France ever produced. He began by celebrating the victories of Louis and the virtues of contemporary heroes. A nobleness of thought and a splendour of language distinguish the poetry of Santeul, who furnished many inscriptions for public monuments. The hymns which he afterwards wrote for the breviary of the church of Paris have been still more admired, and at the request of others he enlarged his collection of sacred verse. But I have not read the poetry of Santeul, and give only the testimony of French critics. †

56. England might justly boast, in the earlier part of the century, her Milton; nay, I do not know that, with the exception of a well-known and very pleasing poem, though perhaps hardly of classical simplicity, by Cowley on himself. Epitaphium Vivi Auctoris, we can by Cowley on himself, Epitaphium Vivi Auctoris, we can produce any thing equally good in this period. The Latin verse of Barrow is foreible and full of mind, but not sufficiently redolent of antiquity. I Yet versification became, about the time of the Restoration, if not the distinctive study, at least the favourite exercise, of the university of Oxford. The collection entitled Musæ Anglicanæ, published near the end of the century, contains little from any other quarter. Many of these poems relate to the political themes of the day, and

[•] The magni incloses vestigss sacra Maronis, the expect horron. Clare, do morée caterhor. La tetra in magna, quo tempere francea tellus Rege bes a une extenções aperba is suid a, Pa um pre pegud e artidate, ara e circo Corperat et but pain severa impo nevo inclino

[†] Buillet. Biogr. Universelle. † The following stanzas on an erring conscience will infliciently prove this —

Tyranne vite far tenevaria, Infide dua igue biar e neu am. Sidos 5 de 2 de aer giu a prasania, I agecto e y vestro soti Assetores certas y tradicar poperas Ment a propago quam secusi. Dena Sascie, sed orba prim patium Attributt, regimenque exactum dec eulogise the reigning king, Charles, James, or William; others are on philosophical subjects, which they endeavour to decorate with classical phrase. Their character does not, on the whole, pass mediocrity; they are often incorrect and somewhat turgid, but occasionally display a certain felicity in adapting ancient lines to their subject, and some liveliness of invention. The golden age of Latin verse in England was yet to come.

CHAPTER VI.

HISTORY OF DRAMATIC LITERATURE, FROM 1650 to 1700.

SECT. I.

Racine - Minor French Tragedians - Mohère - Regnard, and other Come Wrsters.

1. Few tragedies or dramatic works of any kind are now recorded by historians of Italian literature; those of trains and Delfino, afterwards patriarch of Aquileia, which are esteemed among the best, were possibly written before the middle of the century, and were not published till after its termination. The Corradino of Caraccio, in 1694, was also valued at the time. Nor can Spain arrest us longer; the school of Calderon in national comedy extended no doubt beyond the death of Philip IV. in 1665, and many of his own religious pieces are of as late a date; nor were names wholly wanting, which are said to merit remembrance, in the feeble reign of Charles II., but they must be left for such as make a particular study of Spanish literature, † We are called to a nobler stage.

2. Corneille belongs in his glory to the earlier period of this century, though his inferior tragedies, more Barber Bost numerous than the better, would fall within the later. tracelles Fontenelle, indeed, as a devoted admirer, attributes considerable merit to those which the general voice both of critics and of the public had condemned. \ Meantime, another luminary [†] Bouterwek. † Hist, du Théitre François, in Ruvrea de Fontenelle, in. 111. St.

Walker's Memoer on Italian Tra-gody, p 201. Sala, 23, 57.
 Eviction d also despised the French public for not admiring the Sophoneshe of Corneille, which he had made too Roman for their taste.

arose on the opposite side of the horizon. The first tragedy of Jean Racine, Les Frères Ennemis, was represented in 1004, when he was twenty-five years of age. It is so far below his great works as to be scarcely mentioned, yet does not want indications of the genius they were to display. Alexandre, in 1665, raised the young poet to more distinction. It is said that he showed this tragedy to Corneille, who praised his versification, but advised him to avoid a path which he was not fitted to tread. It is acknowledged by the advocates of Racine that the characters are feebly drawn, and that the conqueror of Asia sinks to the level of a hero in one of those romances of gallantry which had vitiated the taste of France.

S. The glory of Racine commenced with the representation of his Andromaque in 1667, which was not printed till the end of the following year. He was now at once compared with Corneille, and the scales long continued to oscillate. Criticism, satire, epigrams, were unsparingly launched against the rising poet. But his rival pursued the worst policy by obstinately writing bad tragedies. The public naturally compare the present with the present, and forget the past. When he gave them Pertharite, they were dispensed from looking back to Cinna. It is acknowledged even by Fontenelle that, during the height of Racine's fame, the world placed him at least on an equality with his predecessor; a decision from which that critic, the relation and friend of Corneille, appeals to what he takes to be the verdict of a later age.

4. The Andromaque was sufficient to show that Racine had more skill in the management of a plot, in the display of emotion, in power over the sympathy of the spectator, at least where the gentler feelings are concerned, in beauty and grace of style, in all except nobleness of character, strength of thought, and impetuosity of language. He took his fable from Euripides, but changed it according to the requisitions of the French theatre and of French manners. Some of these changes are for the better, as the substitution of Astyanax for an unknown Molossus of the Greek tragedian, the supposed son of Andromache by Pyrrhus. "Most of those," says Racine himself very justly, "who have heard of Andromache, know her only as the widow of Hector and the mother of Astyanax. They cannot reconcile themselves to her loving another husband and another son." And he has finely improved this happy idea of preserving Astyanax, by making the Greeks, jealous of his name, send an embassy by Orestes to demand his life; at once deepening the interest and developing the plot.

5. The female characters, Andromache and Hermione, are drawn with all Racine's delicate perception of ideal beauty; the one, indeed, prepared for his hand by those great masters in whose school he had disciplined his own gifts of nature, Homer, Euripides, Virgil; the other more original and more full of dramatic effect. It was, as we are told, the fine acting of Mademoiselle de Champmelé in this part, generally reckoned one of the most difficult on the French stage, which secured the success of the play. Racine, after the first representation, threw himself at her feet in a transport of gratitude, which was soon changed to love. It is more easy to censure some of the other characters. Pyrrhus is bold, haughty, passionate, the true son of Achilles, except where he appears as the lover of Andromache. It is inconceivable and truly ridiculous that a Greek of the heroic age, and such a Greek as Pyrrhus is represented by those whose imagination has given him existence, should feel the respectful passion towards his captive which we might reasonably expect in the romances of chivalry, or should express it in the tone of conventional gallantry that suited the court of Versailles. But Orestes is far worse; love-mad, and yet talking in gallant conceits, cold and polite, he discredits the poet, the tragredy, and the son of Agamemnon himself. It is better to kill one's mother than to utter such trash. In hinting that the previous madness of Orestes was for the love of Hermione, Racine has presumed too much on the ignorance, and too much on the bad taste, of his audience. But far more injudicious is his fautastic remorse and the supposed vision of the Furies in the last scene. It is astonishing that Racine should have challenged comparison with one of the most celebrated scenes of Europides in circumstances that deprived him of the possibility of rendering his own effective. For the style of the Andromaque, it abounds with grace and beauty; but there are, to my apprehension, more insipid and feeble lines, and a more effeminate tone, than in his later tragedies.

6. Britannicus appeared in 1669; and in this admirable play Racine first showed that he did not depend on the tone of gallantry usual among his courtly hearers, nor on the languid sympathies that it excites. Terror and pity, the twin spirits of tragedy, to whom Aristotle has assigned the great moral office of purifying the passions, are called forth in their shadowy forms to sustain the consummate beauties of his diction. His subject was original and happy; with that historic truth which usage required, and that poetical probability which fills up the outline of historic truth without disguising it. What can be more entirely dramatic, what more terrible in the sense that Aristotle means, (that is, the spectator's sympathy with the dangers of the innocent,) than the absolute master of the world, like the veiled prophet of Khorasan, throwing off the appearances of virtue, and standing out at ouce in the maturity of enormous guilt? A presaging gloom, like that which other poets have sought by the hacknied artifices of superstition, haugs over the scenes of this tragedy, and deepens at its close. We sympathise by turns with the guilty alarms of Agrippina, the virtuous consternation of Burrhus, the virgin modesty of Junia, the unsuspecting ingenuousness of Britannicus. Few tragedies on the French stage, or indeed on any stage, save those of Shakspeare, display so great a variety of contrasted characters. None, indeed, are ineffective, except the confidante of Agrippina; for Narcissus is very far from being the mere confidant of Nero; he is, as in history, his preceptor in crime; and his cold villainy is well contrasted with the fierce passion of the despot. The criticisms of Fontenelle and others on small incidents in the plot, such as the concealment of Nero behind a curtain that he may hear the dialogue between Junia and Britannicus, which is certainly more fit for comedy , ought not to weigh against such excellence as we find in all the more essential requisites of a tragic drama. Racine had much improved his language since Andromaque; the conventional phraseology about flames and fine eyes, though not wholly relinquished, is less frequent; and if he has not here reached, as he never did, the peculiar impetuosity of Corneille, nor given to his Romans the grandeur of his predecessor's conception, he is full of lines wherein, as every word is effective, there can hardly be any deficiency of vigour. It is the vigour indeed of Virgil, not of Lucan.

[.] It is, however, taken from Tacatus.

7. In one passage, Racine has, I think, excelled Shakspeare. They have both taken the same idea from Plutarch. The lines of Shakspeare are in Antony and Cleopatra:—

The demon, that's the spirit that keeps thee, is Noble, courageous, high, unmatchable, Where Casar's is not; but near him, thy angel Becomes a fear, as being o'erpowered.

These are, to my apprehension, not very forcible, and obscure even to those who know, what many do not, that by "a fear" he meant a common goblin, a supernatural being of a more plebeian rank than a demon or angel. The single verse of Racine is magnificent:

Mon génie étonné tremble devant le sien,

- 8. Berenice, the next tragedy of Racine, is a surprising proof of what can be done by a great master; but it Bergare. must be admitted that it wants many of the essential qualities that are required in the drama. It might almost be compared with Timon of Athens by the absence of fable and movement. For nobleness and delicacy of sentiment, for grace of style, it deserves every praise; but is rather tedious in the closet, and must be far more so on the stage. This is the only tragedy of Racine, unless perhaps we except Athalie, in which the story presents an evident moral; but no poet is more uniformly moral in his sentiments. Corneille, to whom the want of dramatic fable was never any great objection, attempted the subject of Berenice about the same time with far inferior success. It required what he could not give, the picture of two hearts struggling against a poble and a blameless love.
- !). It was unfortunate for Racine that he did not more frequently break through the prejudices of the French theatre in favour of classical subjects. A field was open of almost boundless extent, the medieval history of Europe, and especially of France herself. His predecessor had been too successful in the Cid to leave it doubtful whether an audience would approve such an innovation at the hands of a favoured tragedian. Racine however did not venture on a step which in the next century Voltaire turned so much to account, and which made the fortune of some inferior tragedies. But considering the distance of place equivalent, for the ends of the drama, to that of time, he founded on an event in the Turkish history not more than thirty years old, his next tragedy, that of Bajazet. The greater part indeed of the fable is due to his own invention. Bajazet is reckoned to fall below most of his other tragedies in beauty of style; but the fable is well connected; there is a great deal of movement, and an unintermitting interest is sustained by Bajazet and Atalide, two of the noblest characters that Racine has drawn. Atalide has not the ingenuous simplicity of Junie, but displays a more dramatic flow of sentiment and not less dignity or tenderness of soul. The character of Roxane is conceived with truth and spirit; nor is the resemblance some have found in it to that of Hermione greater than belongs to forms of the same type. Acomat, the vizir, is more a favourite with the French critics; but in such parts Racine does not rise to the level of Corneille. No poet is less exposed to the imputation of bombastic exaggeration; yet in the two lines with which Acomat concludes the fourth act, there is at least an approach to burlesque; and one can hardly say that they would have been out of place in Tom Thumb : -

> Mourous, moi, cher Osman, comme un viele, et tol, Comme le favori d'un homme tel que mos.

has been thought to have wrestled against Corneille on his own ground, the display of the unconquerable mind of a hero. We find in the part of Mithridate, a great depth of thought in compressed and energetic language. But, unlike the masculine characters of Corneille, he is not merely sententious. Racine introduces no one for the sake of the speeches he has to utter. In Mithridates he took what history has delivered to us, blending with it no improbable fiction according to the manners of the East. His love for Monime has nothing in it extraordinary, or unlike what we might expect from the king of Pontus; it is a fierce, a jealous, a vindictive love; the necessities of the French language alone, and the usages of the French theatre, could make it appear feeble. His two sons are naturally less effective; but the loveliness of Monime yields to no female character of Racine. There is something not quite satisfactory in the stratagems which Mithridates employs to draw from her a confession of her love for his son. They are not uncongenial to the historic character, but according to our chivalrous standard of heroism, seem derogatory to the poetical.

11. Iphigénic followed in 1674. In this Racine had again to contend with Euripides in one of his most celebrated tragedies. He had even, in the character of Achilles, to contend, not with Homer himself, yet with the Homeric associations familiar to every classical scholar. The love, in fact, of Achilles, and his politeness towards Clytemnestra, are not exempt from a tone of gallantry a little repugnant to our conception of his manners. Yet the Achilles of Homer is neither incapable of love nor of courtesy, so that there is no essential repugnance to his character. That of Iphigenia in Euripides has been consured by Aristotle as inconsistent; her extreme distress at the first prospect of death being followed by an unusual display of courage. Hurd has taken upon him the defence of the Greek tragedian, and observes, after Brumoy, that the Inhigenia of Racine being modelled rather according to the comment of Aristotle than the example of Euripides, is so much the worse. But his apology is too subtle, and requires too long reflection, for the ordinary spectator; and though Shakspeare might have managed the transition of feeling with some of his wonderful knowledge of human nature, it is certainly presented too crudely by Euripides, and much in the style which I have elsewhere observed to be too usual with our old dramatists. The Iphigenia of Racine is not a character, like those of Shakspeare, and of him perhaps alone, which nothing less than intense meditation can develop to the reader, but one which a good actress might compass and a common spectator understand. Racine, like most other tragedians, wrote for the stage; Shakspeare aimed at a point beyond it, and sometimes too much lost sight of what it required.

Hurd's Commentary on Horace, vol. t. p. 115.

12. Several critics have censured the part of Eriphile. Yet Fontenelle, prejudiced as he was against Racine, admits that it is necessary for the catastrophe, though he cavils, I think, against her appearance in the earlier part of the play. laying down a rule, by which our own tragedians would not have chosen to be tried, and which seems far too rigid, that the necessity of the secondary characters should be perceived from their first appearance. The question for Racine was in what manner he should manage the catastrophe. fabulous truth, the actual sacrifice of Iphigenia, was so revolting to the mind, that even Euripides thought himself obliged to depart from it. But this he effected by a contrivance impossible on the French stage, and which would have changed Racme's tragedy to a common melo-drame. It appears to me that he very happily substituted the character of Eriphile, who, as Fontenelle well says, is the hind of the fable; and whose impetuous and somewhat disorderly passions both furnish a contrast to the ideal nobleness of Iphigenia throughout the tragedy, and reconcile us to her own fate at the close.

13. Once more, in Phédre, did the great disciple of Euripides attempt to surpass his master. In both tragedies the character of Phedra herself throws into shade all the others, but with this important difference, that in Euripides her death occurs about the middle of the piece, while she continues in Racine till the conclusion. The French poet has borrowed much from the Greek, more perhaps than in any former drama, but has surely heightened the interest, and produced a more splendid work of genius. I have never read the particular criticism in which Schlegel has endeavoured to elevate the Hippolytus above the Phedre. Many, even among French critics, have objected to the love of Hippolytus for Aricia, by which Racine has deviated from the older mythological tradition, though not without the authority of Virgil. But we are hardly fied to all the circounstance of fable; and the cold young huntsman loses nothing in the eyes of a modern reader by a virtuous attachment. This tragedy is said to be more open to verbal criticism than the Iphigénie; but in poetical beauty I do not know that Racine has ever surpassed it. The description of the death of Hippolytus is perhaps his master-piece. It is true that, according to the practice of our own stage, long descriptions, especially in elaborate language, are out of use; but it is not, at least, for the advocates of Euripides to blame them.

^{*} Reflexions sur la Poetsque. (Envres de Fontenelle, vol. in. p. 149.

14. The Phédre was represented in 1677; and after this its illustrious author seemed to renounce the stage. His increasing attachment to the Jansenists made it almost impossible, with any consistency, to promote an amusement which they anothematised. But he was induced, after many years, in 1689, by Madame de Maintenon, to write Esther for the purpose of representation by the young ladies whose education she protected at St. Cyr. Esther, though very much praised for beauty of language, is admitted to possess little merit as a drama. Much indeed could not be expected in the circumstances. It was acted at St. Cyr; Louis applauded, and it is said that the Prince de Condé wept. The greatest praise of Esther is that it encouraged its author to write Athalie. Once more restored to dramatic conceptions, his genius revived from sleep with no loss of the vigour of yesterday. He was even more in Athalie than in Iphigénie and Britannicus. This great work, published in 1691, with a royal prohibition to represent it on any theatre, stands by general consent at the head of all the tragedies of Racine, for the grandeur, simplicity, and interest of the fable, for dramatic terror, for theatrical effect, for clear and judicious management, for bold and forcible, rather than subtle delineation of character, for sublime sentiment and imagery. It equals, if it does not, as I should incline to think, surpass, all the rest in the perfection of style, and is far more free from every defect, especially from feeble politeness and gallantry, which of course the subject could not admit. It has been said that he gave himself the preference to Phédre; but it is more extraordinary that not only his enemies, of whom there were many, but the public itself was for some years incapable of discovering the merit of Athalie. Boileau declared it to be a master-piece, and one can only be astonished that any could have thought differently from Boileau. It doubtless gained much in general esteem when it came to be represented by good actors; for no tragedy in the French language is more peculiarly fitted for the stage.

15. The chorus which he had previously introduced in Esther was a very bold innovation (for the revival of what is forgotten must always be classed as innovation), and it required all the skill of Racine to prevent its appearing in our eyes an impertinent excrescence. But though we do not, perhaps, wholly reconcile ourselves to some of the songs, which too much suggest, by association, the Italian opera, the chorus of Athalie enhances the interest as well as the splendour of the tragedy. It was indeed more full of action and scenic pomp than any he had written, and probably than any other which up to that time had been represented in France. The part of Athalie predominates, but not so as to eclipse the rest. The high-priest Joad is drawn with a stern zeal admirably dramatic, and without which the idolatrous queen would have trampled down all before her during the conduct of the fable, whatever justice might have ensued at the last. We feel this want of an adequate resistance to triumphant crime in the Rodogune of Corneille. No character appears superfluous or feeble; while the plot has all the simplicity of the Greek stage, it has all the movement and continual excitation of the modern.

The female characters of Racine are of the greatest beauty; they have the ideal grace and harmony of ancient sculpture, and bear somewhat of the same analogy to those of Shakspeare which that art does to painting. Andromache, Monimia, Iphigenia, we may add Junia, have a dignity and faultlessness neither unnatural nor insipid, because they are only the ennobling and purifying of human passions. They are the forms of possible excellence, not from individual models, nor likely perhaps to delight every reader, for the same reason that more eyes are pleased by Titian than by Raffaelle. But it is a very narrow criticism which excludes either school from our admiration, which disparages Racine out of idolatry of Shakspeare. The latter, it is unnecessary for me to say, stands out of reach of all competition. But it is not on this account that we are to give up an author so admirable as Racine.

17. The chief faults of Racine may partly be ascribed to the influence of national taste, though we must confess that Corneille has better avoided them. Though pared with love with the former is always tragic and connected with the heroic passions, never appearing singly, as in several of our own dramatists, yet it is sometimes unsuitable to the character, and still more frequently feeble and courtier-like in the expression. In this he complied too much with the times; but we must believe that he did not entirely feel that he was wrong. Corneille had, even while Racine was in his glory, a strenuous band of supporters. Fontenelle, writing in the next century, declares that time has established a decision in which most seem to concur, that the first place is due to the elder poet, the second to the younger; every one making the interval between them a little greater or less according to his taste.* But Voltaire, La Harpe, and in general, I apprehend, the later French critics, have given the preference to Racine. I presume to join my suffrage to theirs. Racine appears to me the superior tragedian; and I must add that I think him next to Shakspeare among all the moderns. The comparison with Euripides is so natural that it can hardly be avoided. Certainly no tragedy of the Greek poet is so skilful or so perfect as Athalie or Britannicus. The tedious scenes during which the action is stagnant, the impertinences of useless, often perverse morality, the extinction, by bad management, of the sympathy that had been raised in the earlier part of a play, the foolish alternation of repartees in a series of single lines, will never be found in Racine. But, when we look only at the highest excellences of Euripides, there is, perhaps, a depth of pathos and an intensity of dramatic effect which Racine himself has not attained. The difference between the energy and sweetness of the two languages is so important in the comparison, that I shall give even this preference with some hesitation.

18. The style of Racine is exquisite. Perhaps he is second only to Virgil among all poets. But I will Beauty of give the praise of this in the words of a native critic. "His expression is always so happy and so natural, that it seems as if no other could have been found; and every word is placed in such a manner that we cannot fancy any other place to have suited it as well. The structure of his style is such that nothing could be displaced, nothing added, nothing retrenched; it is one unalterable whole. Even his incorrectnesses are often but sacrifices required by good taste, nor would any thing be more difficult than to write over again a line of Racine. No one has enriched the language with a greater number of turns of phrase; no one is bold with more felicity and discretion, or figurative with more grace and propriety; no one bas handled with more command an idiom often rebellious, or with more skill an instrument always difficult; no one has better understood that delicacy of style which must not be mistaken for feebleness, and is, in fact, but that air of ease which conceals from the reader the labour of the work and the artifices of the composition; or better managed the variety of cadences, the resources of rhythm, the association and deduction of ideas. In short, if we consider that his perfection in these respects may be opposed to that of Virgil, and that he spoke a language less flexible, less poetical, and less harmonious, we shall readily believe that Racine is, of all mankind, the one to whom nature has given the greatest talent for versification."

Corneille, was yet by the fertility of his pen, by the success of some of his tragedies, and by a certain reputation which two of them have acquired, the next name, but at a vast interval, to Racine. Voltaire says he would have enjoyed a great reputation but for that of his brother—one of those pointed sayings which seem to convey something, but are really devoid of meaning. Thomas Cornelle is never compared with his brother; and probably his brother has been rather serviceable to his name with posterity than otherwise. He wrote with more purity, according to the French critics, and it must be owned that, in his Ariane, he has given to love a tone more passionate and natural than the manly scenes of the older tragedian ever present. This is esteemed his best work, but it depends wholly on the principal character, whose tenderness and injuries excite our sympathy, and from whose lips many lines of great beauty flow. It may be compared with the Berenice of Racine, represented but a short time before; there is enough of resemblance in the fables to provoke comparison. That of Thomas Corneille is more tragic, less destitute of theatrical movement, and consequently better chosen; but such relative praise is of little value, where none can be given, in this respect, to the object of comparison. We feel that the prose romance is the proper sphere for the display of an affection, neither untrue to nature nor unworthy to move the heart, but wanting the majesty of the tragic muse. An effeminacy uncongenial to tragedy belongs to this play; and the termination, where the heroine faints away instead of dying, is somewhat insipid. The only other tragedy of the younger Corneille that can be mentioned is the Earl of Essex. In this he has taken greater liberties with history than his critics approve; and though love does not so much predominate as in Ariane, it seems to engross, in a style rather too romantic, both the hero and his sovereign.

[•] La Harpe, Eloge de Racine, as quoted by himself in Cours de Latérature, vol. vl.

20. Neither of these tragedies, perhaps, deserves to be put on a level with the Manlius of La Fosse, to May and which La Harpe accords the preference above all of la For the seventeenth century after those of Corneille and Racine. It is just to observe what is not denied, that the author has borrowed the greater part of his story from the Venice Preserved of Otway. The French critics maintain that he has far excelled his original. It is possible that we might hesitate to own this general superiority; but several blemishes have been removed, and the conduct is perhaps more noble, or at least more fitted to the French stage. But when we take from La Fosse what belongs to another - characters strongly marked, sympathies powerfully contrasted, a development of the plot probable and interesting, what will remain that is purely his own? There will remain a vigorous tone of language, a considerable power of description, and a skill in adapting, we may add with justice, in sometimes improving, what he found in a foreign language. We must pass over some other tragedies which have obtained less honour in their native land, those of Duché, Quinault, and Campistron.

VOL. III.

21. Molière is perhaps, of all French writers, the one whom his country has most uniformly admired, and in whom her critics are most unwilling to acknowledge faults; though the observations of Schlegel on the defects of Molière, and especially on his large debts to older comedy, are not altogether without foundation. Molière began with L'Etourdi in 1638, and his pieces followed rapidly till his death in 1678. About one half are in verse; I shall select a few without regard to order of time, and first one written in prose, L'Avare.

22. Plantus first exposed upon the stage the wretchedness of avarice, the punishment of a selfish love of gold, not only in the life of pain it has cost to acquire it, but in the terrors that it brings, in the disordered state of mind, which is haunted, as by some mysterious guilt, by the consciousness of secret wealth. The character of Euclio in the Aulularia is dramatic, and, as far as we know, original; the moral effect requires, perhaps, some touches beyond absolute probability, but it must be confessed that a few passages are overcharged. Molière borrowed L'Avare from this comedy; and I am not at present aware that the subject, though so well adapted for the stage, had been chosen by any intermediate dramatist. He is indebted not merely for the scheme of his play, but for many strokes of humour, to Plantus. But this takes off little from the merit of this excellent comedy. The plot is expanded without incongruous or improbable circumstances; new characters are well combined with that of Harpagon, and his own is at once more diverting and less extravagant than that of Euclio. The penuriousness of the latter, though by no means without example, leaves no room for any other object than the concealed treasure, in which his thoughts are concentred. But Molière had conceived a more complicated action. Harpagon does not absolutely starve the rats; he possesses horses, though he feeds them ill; he has servants, though he grudges them clothes; he even contemplates a marriage supper at his own expense, though he intends to have a bad one. He has evidently been compelled to make some sacrifices to the usages of mankind, and is at once a more common and a more theatrical character than Euclio. In other respects, they are much alike; their avarice has reached that point where it is without pride; the dread of losing their wealth has overpowered the desire of being thought to possess it; and though this is a more natural incident in the manners of Greece than in those of France, yet the concealment of treasure, even in the time of Molière, was sufficiently frequent for dramatic probability. A general tone of selfishness, the usual source and necessary consequence of avarice, conspires with the latter quality to render Harpagon odious; and there wants but a little more poetical justice in the conclusion, which leaves the casket in his possession.

23. Hurd has censured Molière without much justice. "For the picture of the avaricious man, Plautus and Molière have presented us with a fautastic, unpleasing draught of the passion of avarice." It may be answered to this, that Harpagon's character is, as has been said above, not so mere a delineation of the passion as that of Euclio. But as a more general vindication of Molière, it should be kept in mind, that every exhibition of a predominant passion within the compass of the five acts of a play must be coloured beyond the truth of nature, or it will not have time to produce its effect. This is one great advantage that romance possesses over the drama.

24. L'Ecole des Femmes is among the most diverting comedies of Molière. Yet it has in a remarkable degree what seems inartificial to our own taste, and produces contravenes a good general precept of Horace; the action passes almost wholly in recital. But this is so well connected with the development of the plot and characters, and produces such amusing scenes, that no spectator, at least on the French theatre, would be sensible of any languor. Arnolphe is an excellent modification of the type which Molière loved to reproduce; the selfish and morose cynic, whose pretended hatred of the vices of the world springs from an absorbing regard to his own gratification. He has made him as malignant as censorious; he delights in tales of scandal; he is pleased that Horace should be successful in gallantry, because it degrades others. The half-witted and ill-bred child, of whom he becomes the dupe, as well as the two idiot servants, are delineated with equal vivacity. In this comedy we find the spirited versification, full of grace and humour, in which no one has rivalled Molière, and which has never been attempted on the English stage. It was probably its merit which raised a host of petty detractors, on whom the author revenged himself in his admirable piece of satire, La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes. The affected pedantry of the Hôtel Rambouillet seems to be ridiculed in this retaliation; nothing in fact could be more unlike than the style of Molière to their own.

25. He gave another proof of contempt for the false taste of some Parisian circles in the Misanthrope; though the criticism of Alceste on the wretched sonnet forms but a subordinate portion of that famous comedy. It is generally placed next to Tartoffe among the works of Molière. Alceste is again the cynic, but more honourable and less openly selfish, and with more of a real disdain of vice in his thisanthropy. Rousseau, upon this account, and many others after him, have treated the play as a vindication of insincerity against truth, and as making virtue itself ridiculous on the stage. This charge however seems uncaudid; neither the rudeness of Alceste, nor the misanthropy from which it springs, are to be called virtues; and we may observe that he displays no positively good quality beyond sincerity, unless his ungrounded and improbable love for a coquette is to pass for such. It is true that the politeness of Philinthe, with whom the Misanthrope is contrasted, borders a little too closely upon flattery; but no oblique end is in his view; be flatters to give pleasure; and if we do not much esteem his character, we are not solicitous for his punishment. The dialogue of the Misanthrope is uniformly of the highest style; the female, and indeed all the characters, are excellently conceived and sustained: if this comedy fails of any thing at present, it is through the difference of manners, and perhaps, in representation, through the want of animated action on the stage.

26. In Les Femmes Savantes, there is a more evident personality in the characters, and a more maleious exposure of abstrdity, than in the Misanthrope; but the ridicule falling on a less numerous class, is not so well calculated to be appreciated by posterity. It is, however, both in reading and representation, a more amusing comedy; in no one instance has Molicre delinented such variety of manners, or displayed so much of his immitable gaiety and power of fascinating the audience with very little plot, by the mere exhibition of human follies. The satire falls deservedly on pretenders to taste and literature, for whom Molière always testifies a bitterness of scorn in which we perceive some resentment of their criticisms. The shorter piece, entitled Les Préciouses Ridicules, is another shaft directed at the literary ladies of Paris. They had provoked a dangerous enemy; but the good taste of the next age might be ascribed in great measure to his unmerciful exposure of affectation and pedantry.

27. It was not easy, so late as the age of Molière, for the dramatist to find any untrodden field in the follies and vices of mankind. But one had been reserved Tartath. for him in Tartuffe - religious hypocrisy. We should have expected the original draught of such a character on the English stage; nor had our old writers been forgetful of their inveterate enemies, the Puritans, who gave such full scope for their satire. But choosing rather the easy path of ridicule, they fell upon the starch dresses and quaint language of the fanatical party; and where they exhibited these in conjunction with hypocrisy, made the latter more ludicrous than hateful. The Luke of Massinger is deeply and villainously dissembling, but does not wear so conspicuous a garb of religious sanctity as Tartuffe. The comedy of Mohere is not only original in this character, but is a new creation in dramatic poetry. It has been doubted by some critics, whether the depth of guilt that it exhibits, the serious hatred that it inspires, are not beyond the strict province of comedy. But this seems rather a technical cavil. If subjects such as the Tartuffe are not fit for comedy, they are at least fit for dramatic representation, and some new phrase must be invented to describe their class.

28. A different kind of objection is still sometimes made to this play, that it brings religion itself into suspicion. And this would no doubt have been the case, if the contemporaries of Molière in England had dealt with the subject. But the boundaries between the reality and its false appearances are so well guarded in this comedy, that no reasonable ground of exception can be thought to remain. No better advice can be given to those who take umbrage at the Tartuffe than to read it again. For there may be good reason to suspect that they are themselves among those for whose benefit it was intended; the Tartuffes, happily, may be comparatively few; but while the Organs and Pernelles are numerous, they will not want their harvest. Molière did not invent the prototypes of his hypocrite; they were abundant at Paris in his time.

29. The interest of this play continually increases, and the fifth act is almost crowded by a rapidity of events, not so usual on the French stage as our own. Tartuffe himself is a master-piece of skill. Perhaps in the cavils of La Bruvère there may be some justice; but the essayist has forgotten that no character can be rendered entirely effective to an audience without a little exaggeration of its attributes. Nothing can be more happily conceived than the credulity of the honest Orgon, and his more doting mother; it is that which we sometimes witness, incurable except by the evidence of the senses, and fighting every inch of ground against that. In such a subject there was not much opportunity for the comic talent of Molière; yet in some well known passages, he has enlivened it as far as was possible. The Tartuffe will generally be esteemed the greatest effort of this author's genius; the Misanthrope, the Femmes Savantes, and the Ecole des Femmes will follow in various order, according to our tastes. These are by far the best of his comedies in verse. Among those in prose we may give the first place to L'Avare, and the next either to Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, or to George

Bonggeob on one hand the absurd vanity of plebeians in seeking on one hand the absurd vanity of plebeians in seeking the alliance or acquaintance of the nobility, on the other, the pride and meanness of the nobility themselves. They are both abundantly diverting; but the sallies of humour are, I think, more frequent in the first three acts of the former. The last two acts are improbable and less amusing. The shorter pieces of Molière border very much upon farce; he permits himself more vulgarity of character, more grossness in language and incident, but his farces are seldom absurd, and never dull.

S1. The French have claimed for Molière, and few perhaps have disputed the pretension, a superiority over thereter all earlier and later writers of comedy. He certainly of Molters leaves Plautus, the original model of the school to which he belonged, at a vast distance. The grace and gentlemanly elegance of Terence he has not equalled; but in the more appropriate merits of comedy, just and forcible delineation of character, skilful contrivance of circumstances, and humorous dialogue, we must award him the prize. The Italian and Spanish dramatists are quite unworthy to be named in comparison; and if the French theatre has, in later times, as is certainly the case, produced some excellent comedies, we have, I believe, no reason to contradict the suffrage of the nation itself, that they owe almost as much to what they have caught from this great model, as to the natural genius of their authors. But it is not for us to abandon the rights of Shakspeare. In all things most essential to comedy, we cannot acknowledge his inferiority to Molière. He had far more invention of characters, with an equal vivacity and force in their delineation. His humour was at least as abundant and natural, his wit incomparably more brilliant; in fact, Molière hardly exhibits this quality at all. The Merry Wives of Windsor, almost the only pure comedy of Shakspeare, is surely not disadvantageously compared with George Dandin or Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, or even with L'Ecole des Femmes. For the Tartuffe or the Misanthrope it is vain to seek a proper counterpart in Shakspeare; they belong to a different state of manners. But the powers of Mohere are directed with greater skill to their object; none of his energy is wasted; the spectator is not interrupted by the serious scenes of tragi-comedy, nor his attention drawn aside by poetical episodes. Of Shakspeare we may justly say that he had the greater genius, but perhaps of Molière, that he has written the best comedies. We cannot at least put any third

^{• [}A French critic upon the first edition of this work has supposed out to be Minsere, especially after the colorinal the same as expert, and is justly astonished. have been passing on him. — 1842.]

dramatist in competition with him. Fletcher and Jonson, Wycherley and Congreve, Farquhar and Sheridan, with great excellences of their own, fall short of his merit as well as of his fame. Yet in humorous conception, our admirable play, the Provoked Husband, the best parts of which are due to Vanbrugh, seems to be equal to any thing he has left. His spirited and easy versification stands of course untouched by any English rivalry; we may have been wise in rejecting verse from our stage, but we have certainly given the French a right to claim all the honour that belongs to it.

32. Racine once only attempted comedy. His wit was quick and sarcastic, and in epigram he did not spare his enemies. In his Plaideurs there is more of humour and stage-effect than of wit. The ridicule falls happily on the pedantry of lawyers and the folly of suitors; but the technical language is lost in great measure upon the audience. This comedy, if it be not rather a farce, is taken from The Wasps of Aristophanes; and that Rabelais of antiquity supplied an extravagance, very improbably introduced into the third act of Les Plaideurs, the trial of the dog. Far from improving the humour, which had been amusingly kept up during the first two acts, this degenerates into absurdity.

33. Regnard is always placed next to Molière among the comic writers of France in this, and perhaps in any age. The plays, indeed, which entitle him to such a rank, are but few. Of these the best is acknowledged to be Le Joueur. Regnard, taught by his own experience, has here admirably delineated the character of an inveterate gamester; without parade of morality, few comedies are more usefully moral. We have not the struggling virtues of a Charles Surface, which the dramatist may feign that he may reward at the fifth act; Regnard has better painted the settish augrateful being, who, though not incapable of love, pawns his mistress's picture, the instant after she has given it to him, that he may return to the dice-box. Her just abandonment, and his own disgrace, terminate the comedy with a moral dignity which the stage does not always maintain, and which, in the first acts, the spectator does not expect. The other characters seem to me various, spirited, and humorous; the valet of Valère the gamester is one of the best of that numerous class, to whom comedy has owed so much; but the pretended marquis, though diverting, talks too much like a genuine coxcomb of the world. Molière did this better in Les Précieuses, Ridicules, Regnard is in this play full of those gay sallies which cannot be read without laughter; the incidents follow rapidly; there is more movement than in some of the best of Mohère's comedies, and the speeches are not so prolix.

34. Next to Le Joueur among Regnard's comedies it has been usual to place Le Légataire, not by any means Harder inferior to the first in humour and vivacity, but with Thirt less force of character, and more of the common tricks of the stage. The moral, instead of being excellent, is of the worst kind, being the success and dramatic reward of a gross fraud, the forgery of a will by the hero of the piece and his servant. This servant is however a very comical rogue, and we should not perhaps wish to see him sent to the gallies. A similar censure might be passed on the comedy of Regnard which stands third in reputation, Les Menechmes. The subject, as explained by the title, is old - twin-brothers, whose undistinguishable features are the source of endless confusion; but what neither Plautus nor Shakspeare have thought of, one avails himself of the likeness to receive a large sum of money due to the other, and is thought very generous at the close of the play when he restores a moiety. Of the plays founded on this diverting exaggeration, Reguard's is perhaps the best; he has more variety of incident than Plautus; and by leaving out the second pair of twins, the Dromio servants, who render the Comedy of Errors almost too inextricably confused for the spectator or reader, as well as by making one of the brothers aware of the mistake, and a party in the deception, he has given an unity of plot instead of a series of incoherent blunders.

35. The Mère Coquette of Quinault appears a comedy of great merit. Without the fine traits of nature which en and we find in those of Mohère, without the sallies of Boardant. humour which enliven those of Regnard, with a versification perhaps not very forcible, it pleases us by a fable at once novel, as far as I know, and natural, by the interesting characters of the lovers, by the decency and tone of good company, which are never lost in the manners, the incidents, or the language. Boursault, whose tragedies are little esteemed, displayed some originality in Le Mercure Galant. The idea is one which has not unfrequently been imitated on the English as well as French stage, but it is rather adapted to the shorter drama than to a regular comedy of five acts. The Mercure Galant was a famous magazine of light periodical amusement, such as was then new in France, which had a great sale, and is described in a few lines by one of the characters in this piece. Boursault places his hero, by the editor's consent, as a temporary substitute, in the office of this publication, and brings, in a series of detached scenes, a variety of applicants for his notice. A comedy of this kind is like a compound animal; a few chief characters must give unity to the whole, but the effect is produced by the successive personages who pass over the stage, display their humour in a single scene, and disappear. Boursault has been in some instances successful; but such pieces generally owe too much to temporary sources of amusement.

36. Dancourt, as Voltaire has said, holds the same rank relatively to Molière in farce, that Regnard does in Dancourt. the higher comedy. He came a little after the former, and when the prejudice that had been created against comedies in prose by the great success of the other kind had begun to subside. The Chevalier à la Mode is the only play of Dancourt that I know; it is much above farce, and if length be a distinctive criterion, it exceeds most comedies. This would be very slight praise, if we could not add that the reader does not find it one page too long, that the ridicule is poignant and happy, the incidents well contrived, the comic situations amusing, the characters clearly marked. La Harpe, who treats Dancourt with a sort of contempt, does not so much as mention this play. It is a satire on the pretensions of a class then rising, the rich financiers, which long supplied

Le Morcure est une bonne chose. On privouse le font fable bisloure vers prose, Silpes combatt, praces mort, maringe amour, horseltes in prace et it use est de coordante levre à moit gire no fut plus recessaire. Let i sec. 0.8

The Moreure Galant was established in 1672 by one Visé; it was intended to fill the same place as a critical record of polite literature, which the Journal des Scassna did in learning and acience.

materials, through dramatic caricature, to public malignity, and the envy of a less opulent aristocracy.

37. The life of Brueys is rather singular. Born of a noble Huguenot family, he was early devoted to protestant theology, and even presumed to enter the lists against Bossuet. But that champion of the faith was like one of those knights in romance, who first unhorse their rash antagonists, and then make them work as slaves. Brueys was soon converted, and betook himself to write against his former errors. He afterwards became an ecclesiastic. Thus far there is nothing much out of the common course in his history. But grown weary of living alone, and having some natural turn to comedy, he began, rather late, to write for the stage, with the assistance, or perhaps only under the name, of a certain Palaprat. The plays of Brueys had some success; but he was not in a position to delineate recent manners, and in the only comedy with which I am acquainted, Le Muet, he has borrowed the leading part of his story from Terence. The language seems deficient in vivacity, which, when there is no great naturalness or originality of character, cannot be dispensed with.

38. The French opera, after some ineffectual attempts by Mazarin to naturalise an Italian company, was successfully established by Lulli in 1672. It is the Quantum. prerogative of music in the melo-drame to render poetry its dependent ally; but the airs of Lulli have been forgotten and the verses of his coadjutor Quinault remain. He is not only the earliest, but by general consent the unrivalled poet of French music. Boileau indeed treated him with undeserved scorn, but probably through dislike of the tone he was obliged to preserve, which in the eyes of so stern a judge, and one so insensible to love, appeared languid and effeminate. Quinault nevertheless was not incapable of vigorous and impressive poetry; a lyric grandeur distinguishes some of his songs; he seems to possess great felicity of adorning every subject with appropriate imagery and sentiment; his versification has a smoothness and charm of melody which has made some say that the lines were already music before they came to the composer's hands; his fables, whether taken from mythology or modern romance, display invention and skill. Voltaire, La Harpe, Schlegel, and the author of the life of Quinault in the Biographie Universelle, but most of all, the testimony of the public, have compensated for the severity of Boileau. The Armide is Quinault's latest and also his finest opera.

SECT. II. - ON THE ENGLISH DRAMA.

State of the Stage after the Restoration - Tragedies of Dryden, Otway, Southern - Consider of Congress and others,

39. The troubles of twenty years, and, much more, the fanatical antipathy to stage-plays which the predomi-Reviral of the Leginh theater. nant party affected, silenced the muse of the baskin, and broke the continuity of those works of the elder dramatists, which had given a tone to public sentiment as to the drama from the middle of Elizabeth's reign. Davenant had, by a sort of counivance, opened a small house for the representation of plays, though not avowedly so called, near the Charter House in 1656. He obtained a patent after the Restoration. By this time another generation had arisen, and the scale of taste was to be adjusted anew. The fondness for the theatre revived with increased avidity; more splendid decoration, actors probably, especially Betterton, of greater powers, and above all, the attraction of female performers, who had never been admitted on the older stage, conspired with the keen appetite that long restraint produced, and with the general gaiety, or rather dissoluteness, of manpers. Yet the multitude of places for such amusement was not as great as under the first Stuarts. Two houses only were opened under royal patents, granting them an exclusive privilege, one by what was called the King's Company, in Drury Lane, another by the Duke of York's Company, in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Betterton, who was called the English Roscius, till Garrick claimed that title, was sent to Paris by Charles 11., that, taking a view of the French stage, he might better judge of what would contribute to the improvement of our own. It has been said, and probably with truth, that he introduced movable scenes, instead of the fixed tapestry that had been hung across the stage; but this improvement he could not have borrowed from France. The king not only countenanced the theatre by his patronage, but by so much personal notice of the chief actors, and so much interest in all the affairs of the theatre, as elevated their condition.

40. An actor of great talents is the best friend of the great dramatists; his own genius demands theirs charge of for its support and display; and a fine performer would as soon waste the powers of his hand on feeble music, as a man like Betterton or Garrick represent what is insipid or in bad taste. We know that the former, and some of his contemporaries, were celebrated in the great parts of our early stage, in those of Shakspeare and Fletcher. But the change of public taste is sometimes irresistible by those who, as, in Johnson's antithesis, they "live to please, must please to live." Neither tragedy nor comedy was maintained at its proper level; and as the world is apt to demand novelty on the stage, the general tone of dramatic representation in this period, whatever credit it may have done to the performers, reflects little, in comparison with our golden age, upon those who wrote for them.

41. It is observed by Scott, that the French theatre, which was now thought to be in perfection, guided the criticism of Charles's court, and afforded the pattern of those tragedies which continued in fashion for twenty years after the Restoration, and which were called rhyming or heroic plays. Though there is a general justice in this remark, I am not aware that the inflated tone of these plays is imitated from any French tragedy; certainly there was a nobler model in the best works of Corneille. But Scott is more right in deriving the unnatural and pedantic dialogue which prevailed through these performances from the romances of Scudery and Calprenede. These were, about the era of the Restoration, almost as popular among our indolent gentry as in France; and it was to be expected that a style would gam ground in tragedy, which is not so widely removed from what tragedy requires, but that an ordinary audience would fail to perceive the difference. There is but a narrow line between the sublime and the tumid; the man of business or of pleasure who frequents the theatre must have accustomed himself to make such large allowances, to put himself into a state of mind so totally different from his every-day babits, that a little extraordinary deviation from nature, far from shocking him, will rather show like a further advance towards excellence. Hotspur and Almanzor, Richard and Aurungzebe, seem to him cast in the same mould; beings who can never occur in the common walks of life, but whom the tragedian has, by a tacit convention with the audience, acquired a right of feigning like his ghosts and witches.

42. The first tragedies of Dryden were what was called beroic, and written in rhyme; an innovation which, of course, must be ascribed to the influence of the French theatre. They have occasionally much vigour of sentiment and much beautiful poetry, with a versification sweet even to lusciousness. The Conquest of Grenada is, on account of its extravagance, the most celebrated of these plays; but it is inferior to the Indian Emperor, from which it would be easy to select passages of perfect elegance. It is singular that although the rhythm of dramatic verse is commonly permitted to be the most lax of any, Dryden has in this play availed himself of none of his wonted privileges. He regularly closes the sense with the couplet, and falls into a smoothness of cadence which, though exquisitely mellifluous, is perhaps too uniform. In the Conquest of Grenada the versification is rather more broken.

d3. Dryden may probably have been fond of this species of tragedy, on account of his own facility in rhyming, and his habit of condensing his sense. Rhyme, indeed, can only be rejected in our language from the tragic scene, because blank verse affords wider scope for the emotions it ought to excite; but for the tumid rhapsodies which the personages of his heroic plays utter, there can be no excuse. He adhered to this tone, however, till the change in public taste, and especially the ridicule thrown on his own plays by the Rebearsal, drove him to adopt a very different, though not altogether faultless style of tragedy. His principal works of this latter class are All for Love, in 1678, the Spanish Friar, commonly referred to 1682, and Don Schastian, in 1690. Upon these the dramatic fame of Dryden is built; while the rants of Almanzor and Maximin are pever mentioned but in ridicule. The chief excellence of the first tragedy appears to consist in the beauty of the language, that of the second in the interest of the story, and that of the third in the highly finished character of Dorax. Dorax is the best of Dryden's tragic characters, and perhaps the only one in which he has applied his great knowledge of the human mind to actual delineation. It is highly dramatic, because formed of those complex passions which may readily lead either to virtue or to vice, and which the poet can manage so as to surprise the spectator without transgressing consistency. The Zanga of Young, a part of some theatrical effect, has been compounded of this character, and of that of lago. But Don Sebastian is as imperfect as all plays must be Don Sebas. in which a single personage is thrown forward in "". too strong relief for the rest. The language is full of that rant which characterised Dryden's earlier tragedies, and to which a natural predilection seems, after some interval, to have brought him back. Sebastian himself may seem to have been intended as a contrast to Muley Moloch; but if the author had any rule to distinguish the blustering of the hero from that of the tyrant, he has not left the use of it in his The plot of this tragedy is ill conducted, reader's hands. especially in the fifth act. Perhaps the delicacy of the present age may have been too fastidious in excluding altogether from the drama this class of fables; because they may often excite great interest, give scope to impassioned poetry, and are admirably calculated for the araymous, or discovery, which is so much dwelt upon by the critics; nor can the story of (Edipus, which has furnished one of the linest and most artful tragedies ever written, be well thought an improper subject even for representation. But they require, of all others, to be dexterously managed; they may make the main distress of a tragedy, but not an episode in it. Our feelings revolt at seeing, as in Don Sebastian, an incestuous passion brought forward as the make-weight of a plot, to eke out a fifth act, and to dispose of those characters whose fortune the main story has not quite wound up-44. The Spanish Friar has been praised for what Johnson calls the "happy coincidence and coalition of the two plots." Bearing It is difficult to understand what can be meant by a compliment which seems either ironical or ignorant. Nothing can be more remote from the truth. The artifice of combining two distinct stories on the stage is, we may suppose, either to interweave the incidents of one into those of the other. or at least so to connect some characters with each intrigue. as to make the spectator fancy them less distinct than they are. Thus in the Merchant of Venice, the courtship of Bassanio and Portia is happily connected with the main plot of Antonio and Shylock by two circumstances; it is to set Bassanio forward in his suit that the fatal bond is first given; and it is by Portia's address that its forfeiture is explained away. The same play affords an instance of another kind of underplot, that of Lorenzo and Jessica, which is more episodical, and might perhaps be removed without any material loss to the fable; though even this serves to account for, we do not say to palliate, the vindictive exasperation of the Jew. But to which of these do the comic scenes in the Spanish Friar bear most resemblance? Certainly to the latter. They consist entirely of an intrigue which Lorenzo, a young officer, carries on with a rich usurer's wife; but there is not, even by accident, any relation between his adventures and the love and murder which go forward in the palace. The Spanish Friar, so far as it is a comedy, is reckoned the best performance of Dryden in that line. Father Dominic is very amusing, and has been copied very freely by succeeding dramatists, especially in the Duenna. But Dryden has no great abundance of wit in this or any of his comedies. His jests are practical, and he seems to have written more for the eye than the ear. It may be noted as a proof of this, that his stage directions are unusually full. In point of diction, the Spanish Friar in its tragic scenes, and All for Love, are certainly the best plays of Dryden. They are the least infected with his great fault, bombast, and should perhaps be read over and over by those who would learn the true tone of English tragedy. In digmity, in animation, in striking images and figures, there are few or none that excel them; the power indeed of impressing sympathy, or commanding tears, was seldom placed by nature within the reach of Dryden.

45. The Orphan of Otway, and his Venice Preserved, will generally be reckoned the best tragedies of this period. They have both a deep pathos, springing from the intense and unmerited distress of women; both, especially the latter, have a dramatic eloquence, rapid and flowing, with less of turgid extravagance than we find in Otway's contemporaries, and sometimes with very graceful poetry. story of the Orphan is domestic, and borrowed, as I believe, from some French novel, though I do not at present remember where I have read it; it was once popular on the stage, and gave scope for good acting, but is unpleasing to the delicacy of our own age. Venice Preserved is more frequently represented than any tragedy after those of Shakspeare; the plot is highly dramatic in conception and conduct; even what seems, when we read it, a defect, the shifting of our wishes, or perhaps rather of our ill wishes, between two parties, the senate and the conspirators, who are redeemed by no virtue, does not, as is shown by experience, interfere with the spectator's interest. Pierre indeed is one of those villains for whom it is easy to excite the sympathy of the half-principled and the inconsiderate. But the great attraction is in the character of Belvidera; and when that part is represented by such as we remember to have seen, no tragedy is honoured by such a tribute, not of tears alone, but of more agony than many would seek to endure. The versification of Otway, like that of most in this period, runs almost to an excess into the line of eleven syllables, sometimes also into the sdrucciolo form, or twelve syllables with a dactylic close. These give a considerable animation to tragic verse.

46. Southern's Fatal Discovery, latterly represented by the name of Isabella, is almost as familiar to the lovers of our theatre as Venice Preserved itself; and for the same reason, that whenever an actress of great tragic powers arises, the part of Isabella is as fitted to exhibit them as that of Belvidera. The choice and conduct of the story are, however, Southern's chief merits; for there is little vigour in the language, though it is natural and free from the usual faults of his age. A similar character may be given to his other tragedy, Oroonoko; in which Southern deserves the praise of having, first of any English writer, denounced the traffic in slaves, and the cruelties of their West Indian bondage. The moral feeling is high in this tragedy; and it has sometimes been acted with a certain success; but the execution is not that of a superior dramatist. Of Lee nothing need be said, but that he is, in spite of his proverbial extravagance, a man of poetical mind and some dramatic skill. But he has violated historic truth in Theodosius without gaining much by invention. The Mourning Bride of Congreve is written in prolix declamation, with no power over the passions. Johnson is well known to have praised a few lines in this tragedy as among the finest descriptions in the language; while others, by a sort of contrariety, have spoken of them as worth nothing. Truth is in its usual middle path; many better passages may be found, but they are well written and impressive.

47. In the early English comedy, we find a large intermixture of obscenity in the lower characters, nor always confined to them, with no infrequent scenes of licentious incident and language. But these are invariably so brought forward as to manifest the dramatist's scorn of vice, and to excite no other sentiment in a spectator of even an ordinary degree of moral purity. In the plays that appeared after the Restoration, and that from the beginning, a different tone was assumed. Vice was in her full career on the stage, unchecked by reproof, unshamed by contrast, and for the most part unpunished by mortification at the close. Nor are these less coarse in expression, or less impudent in their delineation of low debauchery, than those of the preceding period. It may be observed, on the contrary, that they rarely exhibit the manners of truly polished life, according to any notions we can frame of them, and are, in this respect, much below those of Fletcher, Massinger, and Shirley. It might not be easy perhaps to find a scene in any comedy of Charles II,'s reign where one character has the behaviour of a gentleman, in the sense which we attach to the word. Yet the authors of these were themselves in the world, and sometimes men of family and considerable station. The cause must be found in the state of society itself, debased as well as corrupted, partly by the example of the court, partly by the practice of living in taverns, which became much more inveterate after the Restoration than before. The contrast with the manners of Paris, as far as the stage is their mirror, does not tell to our advantage. These plays, as it may be expected, do not aim at the higher glories of comic writing; they display no knowledge of nature, nor often rise to any other conception of character than is gained by a caricature of some known class, or perhaps of some remarkable individual. Nor do they in general deserve much credit as comedies of intrigue; the plot is seldom invented with much care for its development; and if scenes follow one another in a series of diverting incidents, if the entanglements are such as produce laughter, above all, if the personages keep up a well-sustained battle of repartee, the purpose is sufficiently answered. It is in this that they often excel; some of them have considerable humour in the representation of character, though this may not be very original, and a good deal of wit in their dialogue.

[.] Mourning Bride, act it toese 3. Johnson's Life of Congress.

48. Wycherley is remembered for two comedies, the Plain Dealer, and the Country Wife, the latter represented with some change, in modern times, under the name of the Country Girl. The former has been frequently said to be taken from the Misanthrope of Moliere; but this, like many corrent assertions, seems to have little if any foundation. Manly, the Plain Dealer, is, like Alceste, a speaker of truth; but the idea is at least one which it was easy to conceive without plagiarism, and there is not the slightest resemblance in any circumstance or scene of the two comedies. We cannot say the same of the Country Wife; it was evidently suggested by L'Ecole des Femmes; the character of Arnolphe has been copied; but even here the whole conduct of the piece of Wycherley is his own. It is more artificial than that of Molière, wherein too much passes in description; the part of Agnes is rendered still more poignant; and among the comedies of Charles's reign, I am not sure that it is surpassed

49. Shadwell and Etherege, and the famous Afra Behn, have endeavoured to make the stage as grossly immoral as their taleuts permitted; but the two former, especially Shadwell, are not destitute of humour. At the death of Charles it had reached the lowest point; after the Revolution, it became not much more a school of virtue, but rather a better one of polished manners than before; and certainly drew to its service some men of comic genius, whose names are now not only very familiar to our ears, as the boasts of our theatre, but whose works have not all ceased to enliven its walls.

50. Congreye, by the Old Bachelor, written, as some have said, at twenty-one years of age, but in fact not quite so soon, and represented in 1693, placed himself at once in a rank which he has always retained. Though not, I think, the first, he is undemably among the first names. The Old Bachelor was quickly followed by the Double Dealer, and that by Love for Love, in which he reached the summit of his reputation. The last of his four comedies, the Way of the World, is said to have been coldly received; for which it is hard to assign any substantial cause, unless it be some want of sequence in the plot. The peculiar excellence of Congreve is his wit, incessantly sparkling from the lips of almost every character, but on this account it is accompanied by want of nature and simplicity. Nature indeed and simplicity do not belong, as proper attributes, to that comedy which, itself the creature of an artificial society, has for its proper business to exaggerate the affectation and hollowness of the world. A critical code which should require the comedy of polite life to be natural would make it intolerable. But there are limits of deviation from likeness which even caricature must not transgress; and the type of truth should always regulate the playful aberrations of an inventive pencil. The manners of Congreve's comedies are not, to us at least, like those of reality; I am not sure that we have any cause to suppose that they much better represent the times in which they appeared. His characters, with an exception or two, are heartless and vicious; which, on being attacked by Collier, he justified, probably by an afterthought, on the authority of Aristotle's definition of comedy; that it is μιμησις φαυλοτερού, an imitation of what is the worse in human nature. But it must be acknowledged that, more than any preceding writer among us, he kept up the tone of a gentleman; his men of the world are profligate, but not coarse; he rarely, like Shadwell, or even Dryden, caters for the populace of the theatre by such indecencies as they must understand; be gave, in fact, a tone of refinement to the public taste, which it never lost, and which, in its progression, has almost banished his own comedies from the stage.

[.] Congress's Amendments of Mr. College's take citations.

Congreve has never any great success in the conception or management of his plot; but in this comedy there is least to censure; several of the characters are exceedingly humorous; the incidents are numerous and not complex; the wit is often admirable. Angelica and Miss Prue, Ben and Tattle, have been repeatedly imitated; but they have, I think, a considerable degree of dramatic originality in themselves. Johnson has observed that "Ben the sailor is not reckoned over natural, but he is very diverting." Possibly be may be quite as natural a portrait of a mere sailor, as that to which we have become used in modern comedy.

52. The Way of the World I should perhaps incline to place next to this; the coquetry of Millamant, not Bucker without some touches of delicacy and affection, the occounts. impertinent coxcombry of Petulant and Witwood, the mixture of wit and ridiculous vanity in Lady Wishfort, are amusing to the reader. Congreve has here made more use than, as far as I remember, had been common in England, of the allimportant soubrette, on whom so much depends in French comedy. The manners of France happily enabled her dramatists to improve what they had borrowed with signal success from the ancient stage, the witty and artful servant, faithful to his master while he deceives every one besides, by adding this female attendant, not less versed in every artifice, nor less quick in repartee. Mincing and Foible, in this play of Congreve, are good specimens of the class; but speaking with some hesitation, I do not think they will be found, at least not so naturally drawn, in the comedies of Charles's time. Many would, perhaps not without cause, prefer the Old Bachelor; which abounds with wit, but seems rather deficient in originality of character and circumstance. The Double Dealer is entitled to the same praise of wit, and some of the characters, though rather exaggerated, are amusing; but the plot is so entangled towards the conclusion, that I have found it difficult, even in reading, to comprehend it.

53. Congreve is not superior to Farquhar and Vanbrugh, Facestar, if we might compare the whole of their works. Never has be equalled in vivacity, in originality of contrivance, or in clear and rapid development of intrigue, the Beaux' Stratagem of the one, and much less the admirable delineation of the Wronghead family in the Provoked Husband of the other. But these were of the eighteenth century. Farquhar's Trip to the Jubilee, though once a popular comedy, is not distinguished by more than an easy flow of wit, and perhaps a little novelty in some of the characters; it is indeed written in much superior language to the plays anterior to the Revolution. But the Relapse, and the Provoked Wife of Vanbrugh, have attained a considerable reputation. In the former, the character of Amanda is interesting; especially in the momentary wavering and quick recovery of her virtue. This is the first homage that the theatre had paid, since the Restoration, to female chastity; and notwithstanding the vicious tone of the other characters, in which Vanbrugh has gone as great lengths as any of his contemporaries, we perceive the beginnings of a re-action in public spirit, which gradually reformed and elevated the moral standard of the stage. The Provoked Wife, though it cannot be said to give any proofs of this sort of improvement, has some merit as a comedy; it is witty and animated, as Vanbrugh usually was; the character of Sir John Brute may not have been too great a caricature of real manners, such as survived from the debased reign of Charles; and the endeavour to expose the grossness of the older generation was itself an evidence that a better polish had been given to social life.

rather shown in avoiding charse indecencies than in-much elevation of sentiment. Steele's Concessus Lovers is the first comedy which can be called moral; (there is those parts of the Provided Husband that he wrote, carried this firther, and the stage afterwards grew more and more rathined, till it became langual and sentimental.

This pression of English comedy has countines been attributed to the effects of a famous essay by Collier on the car oral ty of the Lag shi stage. But if public opinion had not been prepared to go along, in a considerable degree, with Collar, his archaels essay have produced little change. In point of fact, the subsequent improve-mont was but slow, and, for some years,

CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF POLITE LITERATURE IN PROSE, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

SECT. I.

Italy — High Referement of French Language — Fontenelle — St. Evenword — Sevené — Bouhours and Rapm — Mucellaneous Writers — English Style — and Criticism — Deydon,

1. It Italy could furnish no long list of conspicuous names in this department of literature to our last period, she is far more delicient in the present. The Prose literature of Prose Proceedings of Italian eloquence in this century, served chiefly to prove its mediocrity, nor has that editor, by his own panegyric on Louis XIV. or any other of his writings, been able to redeem its name. The sermons of Segneri have already been mentioned; the eulogies bestowed on them seem to be founded, in some measure, on the surrounding barrentess. The letters of Magalotti, and still more of Redi, themselves philosophers, and generally writing on philosophy, seem to do more credit than any thing else to this period.

2. Crescimbeni, the founder of the Arcadian-Society, has made an honourable name by his exertions to purify the national taste, as well as by his diligence in preserving the memory of better ages than his own. His History of National Poetry is a laborious and useful work, to which I have sometimes been indebted. His treatise on the beauty of that poetry is only known to me through Salfi. It is written in dialogue, the speakers being Arcadians. Auxious to extirpate the school of the Marinists, without falling back altogether into that of Petrarch, he set up Costanzo as a model of poetry. Most of his precepts, Salfi observes, are very trivial at present; but at the epoch of its appearance, his work was of great service towards the reform of Italian literature.

Salfi, xiv. 25. Tiraboschi, xi 412. † Salfi, xiv. 17. Cormani, viii. 71.
 L. L. †

3. This period, the second part of the seventeenth century, comprehends the most considerable, and in every Area Line with the most important and distinguished portion of what was once called the great age in France, the reign of Louis XIV. In this period the literature of France was adorned by its most brilliant writers; since, notwithstanding the genius and popularity of some who followed, we generally find a still higher place awarded by men of fine taste to Bossuet and Pascal than to Voltaire and Montesquieu. The language was written with a care that might have fettered the powers of ordinary men, but rendered those of such as we have mentioned more resplendent. The laws of taste and grammar, like those of nature, were held immutable; it was the province of human genius to deal with them, as it does with nature, by a skilful employment, not by a preposterous and ineffectual rebellion against their control. Purity and perspiculty, simplicity and ease, were conditions of good writing; it was never thought that an author, especially in prose, might transgress the recognised idom of his mother. tongue, or invent words unknown to it, for the sake of effect or novelty; or, if in some rare occurrence so bold a course might be forgiven, these exceptions were but as miracles in religion, which would cease to strike us, or be no miracles at all, but for the regularity of the laws to which they bear witness even while they infringe them. We have not thought it necessary to defer the praise which some great French writers have deserved on the score of their language for this chapter. Bossuet, Malcbranche, Arnauld, and Pascal, bave already been commemorated; and it is sufficient to point out two causes in perpetual operation during this period which ennobled and preserved in purity the literature of France; one, the salutary influence of the Academy, the other, that emulation between the Jesuits and Jansenists for public esteem, which was better displayed in their politer writings, than in the abstruse and endless controversy of the five propositions. A few remain to be mentioned; and as the subject of this chapter, in order to avoid frequent subdivisions, is miscellaneous, the reader must expect to find that we do not, in every instance, confine ourselves to what he may consider as polite letters.

4. Fontenelle, by the variety of his talents, by their application to the pursuits most congenial to the intel-lectual character of his contemporaries, and by that his character. extraordinary longevity which made those contentporaries not less than three generations of mankind, may be reckoned the best representative of French literature. Born in 1657, and dying within a few days of a complete century, in 1757, he enjoyed the most protracted life of any among the modern learned; and that a life in the full sunshine of Parisian literature, without care and without disease. In nothing was Fontenelle a great writer; his mental and moral disposition resembled each other; equable, without the capacity of performing, and hardly of conceiving, any thing truly elevated, but not less exempt from the fruits of passion, from paradox, unreasonableness, and prejudice. His best productions are, perhaps, the culogies on the deceased members of the Academy of Sciences, which he pronounced during almost forty years, but these nearly all belong to the eighteenth century; they are just and candid, with sufficient, though not very profound, knowledge of the exact sciences, and a style pure and flowing, which his good sense had freed from some early affectation, and his cold temper as well as sound understanding restrained from extravagance. In his first works we have symptoms of an infirmity belonging more frequently to age than to youth; but Fontenelle was never young in passion. He there affects the tone of somewhat pedantic and frigid gallantry which seems to have survived the society of the Hotel Rambouillet who had countenanced it, and which borders too nearly on the language which Molière and his disciples had well exposed in their coxcombs on the stage.

5. The Dialogues of the Dead, published, I think, in 1685, are condemned by some critics for their false taste and perpetual strain at something unexpected and paradoxical.

The leading idea is, of course, borrowed from Lucian; but Fontenelle has aimed at greater poignancy by conlegacy of trast; the ghosts in his dialogues are exactly those who had least in common with each other in life, and the general object is to bring, by some happy analogy which had not occurred to the reader, or by some ingenious defence of what he had been accustomed to despise, the prominences and depressions of historic characters to a level.
This is what is always well received in the kind of society for which Fontenelle wrote; but if much is mere sophistry in his dialogues, if the general tone is little above that of the world, there is also, what we often find in the world, some acuteness and novelty, and some things put in a light which it may be worth while not to neglect.

6. Fenelon, not many years afterwards, copied the scheme, though not the style, of Fontenelle in his own Dialogues of the Dead, written for the use of his pupil the Duke of Burgundy. Some of these dialogues are not truly of the dead; the characters speak as if on earth, and with earthly designs. They have certainly more solid sense and a more elevated morality than those of Fontenelle, to which La Harpe has preferred them. The noble zeal of Fenelon not to spare the vices of kings, in writing for the heir of one so imperious and so open to the censure of reflecting minds, shines throughout these dialogues; but designed as they were for a boy, they naturally appear in some places rather superficial.

7. Fontenelle succeeded better in his famous dialogues on the Plurality of Worlds, Les Mondes; in which, if the Plurality of Worlds, Les Mondes; in which, if the Conception is not wholly original, he has at least world developed it with so much spirit and vivacity, that it would show as bed taste to censure his work, as to reckon it a model for imitation. It is one of those happy ideas which have been privileged monopolies of the first inventor; and it will be found accordingly that all attempts to copy this whimsical union of gallantry with science have been insipid almost to a ridiculous degree. Fontenelle throws so much gaiety and wit into his compliments to the lady whom be initiates into his theory, that we do not confound them with the nonsense of coxcombs; and she is herself so spirited, unaffected, and clever, that no philosopher could be ashamed of gallantry towards so deserving an object. The fascinating paradox, as then it seemed, though our children are now taught to lisp it, that the moon, the planets, the fixed stars, are full of inhabitants, is presented with no more show of science than was indispensable, but with a varying liveliness that, if we may judge by the consequences, has served to convince as well as amuse. The plurality of worlds had been auggested by Wilkins, and probably by some Cartesians in France; but it was first rendered a popular tenet by this agreeable little book of Fontenelle, which had a great circulation in Europe. The ingenuity with which he obviates the difficulties that he is compelled to acknowledge, is worthy of praise; and a good deal of the popular truths of physical astronomy is found in these dialogues.

8. The History of Oracles, which Fontenelle published in 1687, is worthy of observation as a sign of the Hollow change that was working in literature. In the pro- of Oracles vinces of erudition and of polite letters, long so independent, perhaps even so hostile, some tendency towards a coalition began to appear. The men of the world, especially after they had acquired a free temper of thinking in religion, and become accustomed to talk about philosophy, desired to know something of the questions which the learned disputed; but they demanded this knowledge by a short and easy road, with no great sacrifice of their leisure or attention. Fontenelle, in the History of Oracles, as in the dialogues on the Plurality of Worlds, prepared a ropast for their taste. A learned Dutch physician, Van Dale, in a dull work, had taken up the subject of the ancient oracles, and explained them by human imposture instead of that of the devil, which had been the more orthodox hypothesis. A certain degree of paradox, or want of orthodoxy, already gave a zest to a book in France; and Fontenelle's lively manner, with more learning than good society at Paris possessed, and about as much as it could endure, united to a clear and acute line of argument, created a popularity for his History of Oracles, which we cannot reckon altogether unmerited.

I have not compared, or indeed suspect that some of the reasoning, not read, Van Dule's work, but I suther the learning, of Fontenelle is original.

9. The works of St. Evremond were collected after his death in 1705; but many had been printed before, and he evidently belongs to the latter half of the seventeenth century. The fame of St. Evremond as a brilliant star, during a long life, in the polished aristocracy of France and England, gave for a time a considerable lustre to his writings, the greater part of which are such effusions as the daily intercourse of good company called forth. In verse or in prose, he is the gallant friend, rather than lover, of ladies who, secure probably of love in some other quarter, were proud of the friendship of a wit. He never, to do him justice, mistakes his character, which as his age was not a little advanced, might have incurred ridicule. Hortense Mancini, Duchess of Mazarin, is his heroine; but we take little interest in compliments to a woman neither respected in her life, nor remembered since. Nothing can be more trifling than the general character of the writings of St. Evremond; but sometimes he rises to literary criticism, or even civil history; and on such topics he is clear, unaffected, cold, without imagination or sensibility; a type of the frigid being, whom an aristocratic and highly polished society is apt to produce. The chief merit of St. Evremond is in his style and manner. He has less wit than Voiture, who contributed to form him, or than Voltaire, whom he contributed to form: but he shows neither the effort of the former, nor the restlessness of the latter. Voltaire, however, when he is most quiet, as in the earliest and best of his historical works, seems to bear a considerable resemblance to St. Evremond. and there can be no doubt that he was familiar with the latter's writings.

10. A woman has the glory of being full as conspicuous in the graces of style as any writer of this famous age. It is evident that this was Madame de Sevigné. Her letters indeed were not published till the eighteenth century, but they were written in the mid-day of Louis's reign. Their ease and freedom from affectation are more striking by contrast with the two epistolary styles which had been most admired in France, that of Balzac, which is laboriously tunid, and that of Voiture, which becomes insipid by dint of affectation. Every one perceives that in the letters of a mother to her daughter the public, in a strict sense, is not thought of; and yet the habit of speaking and writing what men of wit and taste would desire to hear and read, gives a certain mannerism, I will not say air of effort, even to the letters of Madame de Sevigné. The abandonment of the heart to its casual impulses is not so genuine as in some that have since been published. It is at least clear that it is possible to become affected in copying her unaffected style; and some of Walpole's letters bear witness to this. Her wit and talent of painting by single touches are very eminent; scarcely any collection of letters, which contain so little that can interest a distant age, are read with such pleasure; if they have any general fault, it is a little monotony and excess of affection towards ber daughter, which is reported to have wearied its object, and, in contrast with this, a little want of sensibility towards all beyond her immediate friends, and a readiness to find something ludicrous in the daugers and sufferings of

11. The French Academy had been so judicious both in the choice of its members, and in the general tenor of its The French proceedings, that it stood very high in public esteem, and a voluntary deference was commonly shown to its authority. The favour of Louis XIV., when he grew to manhood, was accorded as amply as that of Richelieu. The Academy was received by the king, when they approached him publicly, with the same ceremonies as the superior courts of justice. This body had, almost from its commencement, undertaken a national dictionary, which should carry the language to its utmost perfection, and trace a road to the highest eloquence

Madame de Sovigné's taste has been

. The proofs of this are numerous arrangued for slighting Racine; and she has been charged with the unfortunate prediction. If passers comme le cafe. But it is denied that these words can be found, though few like to give up so directing a tomcalculation of fiturity In her tune, Corneides party was so well supported, and he deserved so much grantude and reverence, that we cannot inneh worder at ber being earned a little too far against his rival. Who has ever seen a we man just towards the rivals of her friends, though many are just towards their owa ?

enough in her letters. In one of them also mentions, that a last of her acquaintance, having been botten by a mad dog, had gone to be dipped in the seaand amuses herself by taking off the provincial accent, with which she will express herself on the first plunge. She makes a just of La Vonin's execution, and though that person was as little entitled to sympathy as any one, yet, when a woman is burned abve, it is not thurs for another women to turn it into that depended on purity and choice of words; more than this could not be given by man. The work proceeded very slowly; and dictionaries were published in the mean time, one by Richelet in 1680, another by Furetiere. The former seems to be little more than a glossary of technical or otherwise doubtful words "; but the latter, though pretending to contain only terms of art and science, was found, by its definitions and by the authorities it quoted, to interfere so much with the project of the academicans, who had armed themselves with an exclusive privilege, that they not only expelled Furetière from their body, on the allegation that he had availed himself of materials intrusted to him by the Academy for its own dictionary, but instituted a long process at law to hinder its publication. This was in 1685, and the dictionary of Furetière only appeared after his death, at Amsterdam in 1690,† Whatever may have been the delinquency, moral, or legal, of this compiler, his dictionary is praised by Goujet as a rich treasure, in which almost every thing is found that we can desire for a sound knowledge of the language. It has been frequently reprinted, and continued long in esteem. But the dictionary of the Academy, which was published in 1694, claimed an authority to which that of a private man could not pretend. Yet the first edition seems to have rather disappointed the public expectation. Many objected to the want of quotations and to the observance of an orthography that had become obsolete. The Academy undertook a revision of its work in 1700; and finally profiting by the public opinion on which it endeavoured to act, rendered this dictionary the most received standard of the French language.

12. The Grammaire Générale et Raisonnée of Lancelot, in which Arnauld took a considerable share, is rather a treatise on the philosophy of all language than one peculiar to the French. "The best critics," says Baillet, "acknowledge that there is nothing written by either the ancient or the modern grammarians with so much justness and solidity." § Viguenl-Marville bestows upon it an almost Goujet copies Baillet's words.

Goujet, Baillet, n. 762.
 Polisson, Hat de l'Académie (contirnateen par Obvet), p. 17. G. 1914. Bibliotheque Française. 1 252. et post. Biogr. Univers., art. Furctiere.

[†] Pelisson, p. 69 Gonjei, p. 261. Jugemens des Scavans, in 606.

equal eulogy. Lancelot was copied in a great degree by Lami, in his Rhetoric or Art of Speaking, with little of value that is original.† Vaugelas retained his place as the founder of sound grammatical criticism, though his judgments have not been uniformly confirmed by the next generation. His remarks were edited with notes by Thomas Corneille, who had the reputation of an excellent gramarian. The observations of Ménage on the French language, in 1675 and 1676, are said to have the fault of reposing too much on obsolete authorities, even those of the sixteenth century, which had long been proscribed by a politer age. \ Notwithstanding the zeal of the Academy, no critical laws could arrest the revolutions of speech. Changes came in with the lapse of time, and were sanctioned by the imperious rule of custom. In a book on grammar, published as early as 1688, Balzac and Voiture, even Patru and the Port-Royal writers, are called semi-moderns ; so many new phrases had since made their way into composition, so many of theirs had acquired a certain air of antiquity.

13. The genius of the French language, as it was estimated in this age by those who aspired to the cha- Boubson. racter of good critics, may be learned from one of Editional the dialogues in a work of Bouhours, Les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène. Bonhours was a Jesuit who affected a polite and lively tone, according to the fashion of his time, so as to warrant some degree of ridicule; but a man of taste and judgment, whom, though La Harpe speaks of him with disdain, his contemporaries quoted with respect. The first and the most interesting at present, of these conversations, which are feigned to take place between two gentlemen of literary taste, turns on the French language. This he pre-he was mistaken. Tour de risage and tour d'espeit were new the words fonds, misures, unities, compte, and many more, were used in new sensor. Thus also put trop de rotre aris. It seems on roflection, that some of the expressions he aminadverts upon most have been affected while they were new, being in opposation to the correct measuring of words; and it is always cursons, in other lanto alwerve ^{*} Mélanges de Luttérature, i. 124.

[†] Googet, 1. 56 G bert, p. 351. † Googet, 146. Biogr. Univ.

^{§ 1}d. 15%.

Bibliotheque Universelle, xv. 351. Perrault makes a similar remark on Patru.

[¶] Bouhours points out several innovations which had lately come into use. He dislikes avoir des magemens, or avoir de la considération, and thinks these phrases would not last; in which guages as well - sumes to be the best of all modern; deriding the Spanish for its pomp, the Italian for its finical effeminacy. The French has the secret of uniting brevity with clearness and purity with politeness. The Greek and Latin are obscure where they are concise. The Spanish is always diffuse. The Spanish is a turbid torrent often overspreading the country with great noise; the Italian a gentle rivulet, occasionally given to inundate its meadows; the French, a noble river, enriching the adjacent lands, but with an equal majestic course of waters that never quits its level. † Spanish again he compares to an insolent beauty, that holds her head high, and takes pleasure in splendid dress; Italian to a painted coquette, always attired to please; French to a modest and agreeable lady, who, if you may call her a prude, has nothing uncivil or repulsive in her prudery. Latin is the common mother; but while Italian has the sort of likeness to Latin which an ape bears to a man, in French we have the dignity, politeness, purity, and good sense of the Augustan age. The French have rejected almost all the diminutives once in use, and do not, like the Italians. admit the right of framing others. This language does not tolerate rhyming sounds in prose, nor even any kind of assonance, as ameriume and fortune, near together. It rejects very bold metaphors, as the zenith of virtue, the apogée of glory; and it is remarkable that its poetry is almost as hostile to metaphor as its prose. I "We have very few words merely poetical, and the language of our poets is not very different from that of the world. Whatever be the cause, it is certain that a figurative style is neither good among us in verse nor in prose." This is evidently much exaggerated, and in contradiction to the known examples, at least, of dramatic poetry. All affectation and labour, he proceeds to say, are equally repugnant to a good French style. " If we would speak the language well, we should not try to speak it too well. It detests excess of ornament; it would almost desire that words should be as it were naked; their dress must be no more than necessity and decency require. Its the comparatively recent activity of many though more established by present p. 93.

^{*} P 72 (edit. 1671) t 1º 77.

simplicity is averse to compound words; those adjectives which are formed by such a juncture of two, have long been exiled both from prose and verse." "Our own pronunciation," he affirms, " is the most natural and pleasing of any. The Chinese and other Asiatics sing; the Germans rattle (rallent); the Spaniards spout; the Italians sigh; the English whistle; the French alone can properly be said to speak; which arises in fact from our not accenting any syllable before the penultimate. The French language is best adapted to express the tenderest sentiments of the heart; for which reason our songs are so impassioned and pathetic, while those of Italy and Spain are full of nonsense. Other languages may address the imagination, but ours alone speaks to the heart, which never understands what is said in them," . This is literally amusing; and with equal patriotism, Bouhours in another place has proposed the question, whether a German can, by the nature of things, possess any wit.

14. Bouhours, not deficient, as we may perceive, in self-confidence and proneness to censure, presumed to turn into ridicule the writers of Port-Royal, at that hydradical time of such distinguished reputation as threatened to eclipse the credit which the Jesuits had always preserved in polite letters. He alludes to their long periods and the exaggerated phrases of invective which they poured forth in controversy.† But the Jansenist party was well able to defend itself. Barbier d'Aucour retaliated on the vain Jesuit by his Sentimens de Cleanthe sur les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugene. It seems to be the general opinion of French critics that he has well exposed the weak parts of his adversary, his affected air of the world, the occasional frivolity and feebleness of his observations; yet there seems something morose in the centhat party abandoned it for one more course, which it is by no merca less difficult to write well, p. 134. Builet assess to refer their love of long periods to the farrons advocate Le Meatre, who had couployed them in the pleadings, not only as giving more dignity, but also because the public taste at that time faroured them. Jugetness des Sçavins, p. 254.

P. 68.

[†] P. 150. Vignoul-Marville observes that the Port-Royal writers formed that difficult in p. 107), and that M d'Andiby, bristier of Antony Arnauld, affected at one time a grand and copious manner like the Spaniards, as being more settled and imposing, capee dily in devotrons favoure writings; but afterwords finding the French were impatient of this style, sures of the supposed Cleanthe, which renders this book less agreeable than that on which it animadverts.

15. Another work of criticism by Boulours, La Manière de Bien Penser, which is also in dialogue, contains La Mamèra de B eu Pesacr much that shows acuteness and delicacy of discrimination; though his taste was deficient in warmth and sensibility, which renders him somewhat too strict and fastidious in his judgments. He is an unsparing enemy of obscurity, exaggeration, and nonsense, and laughs at the hyperbolical language of Balzac, while he has rather overpraised Voiture. The affected inflated thoughts, of which the Italian and Spanish writers afford him many examples, Bonhours justly condemns, and by the correctness of his judgment may deserve, on the whole, a respectable place in the second order of critics.

16. The Réflexions sur l'Eloquence et sur la Poësie of Rapin, another Jesuit, whose Latin poem on Gardens has already been praised, are judicious, though perhaps rather too diffuse; his criticism is what would appear severe in our times; but it was that of a man formed by the ancients, and who lived also in the best and most critical age of France. The reflections on poetry are avowedly founded on Aristotle, but with much that is new, and with examples from modern poets to confirm and illustrate it. The practice at this time in France was to depreciate the Italians; and Tasso is often the subject of Rapin's censure; for want, among other things, of that grave and majestic

. Voiture, he says, always takes a tone of raillery when he entrgerates. Le fans derient ven 4 la faveur de l'ironie, p 29 But we can hardly think that Balzae was not gravely ironical in some of the strange hyperboles which Bouhours quotes from him.

In the fourth dialogue, Bouhours has many just observations on the necessity of elearness. An obscurity arising from allusion to things now unknown, such as we find in the accreata, is rather a tool ittune than a fault, but the is no excuse for one which may be avoided, and ar sea from the writer's indistinctness of conintel able, der Pararthe cafter herring a fooloh rhapsody extracted from a funeral sermon on Louis XIII.). Non répondit l'infere, ce n'est pas tout-a fait de galunatus, ce n'est que du phebus. Vous mettes donc, du Phohnibe, de la difference entre le galimatica et le phébus? Out, reparest Ludore, le gal mattes renferme une obscurite profende, et na de soi incine nul sens raisonnable. Le phébus n'est pas a obseur, et a un brillant qui aignifie, on semble agnifier qualque chose, le solcil y entre d'ordinaire, et c'est peut-cere ce qui a donné licu en notre langue au nom de phebus. Ce n'est pur que quelque foix le phébus ne devienne obscur, jusqu'a netre pas ence, two or language Cela n'est pas tendu, mais alors le galimatas s'en joint; come sont que brillans et que tenebres de 1005 cotes, p. 342.

character which epic poetry demands. Yet Rapin is not so rigorous, but that he can blame the coldness of modern precepts in regard to French poetry. After condemning the pompous tone of Brebeuf in his translation of the Pharsalia, he remarks that " we have gone since to an opposite extreme by too scrupulous a care for the purity of the language; for we have begun to take from poetry its force and dignity by too much reserve and a false modesty, which we have established as characteristics of our language, so as to deprive it of that judicious boldness which true poetry requires; we have cut off the metaphors and all those figures of speech which give force and spirit to words, and reduced all the artifices of words to a pure regular style which exposes itself to no risk by bold expression. The taste of the age, the influence of women who are naturally timid, that of the court which had hardly any thing in common with the ancients, on account of its usual antipathy for learning, accredited this manner of writing," . In this Rapin seems to glance at the polite but cold criticism of his brother Jesuit, Bouhours. 17. Rapin, in another work of criticism, the Parallels of his own judgment Demosthenes and Cicero, Homer and Virgil, Thucydides and Livy, Plato and Aristotle. Thus eloquence, poetry, history, and philosophy pass under review. The taste of Rapin is for the Latins; Cicero he prefers to Demosthenes, Livy on the whole to Thucydides, though this he leaves more to the reader; but is confident that none except mere grammarians have ranked Homer above Virgil.† The loquacity of the older poet, the frequency of his moral reflections, which Hapin thinks misplaced in an epic poem, his similes, the sameness of his transitions, are treated very freely; yet he gives him the preference over Virgil for grandeur and nobleness of narration, for his epithets, and the splendour of his language. But he is of opinion that Æneas is a much finer character than Achilles. These two epic poets he holds, however, to be the greatest in the world; as for all the rest, ancient and modern, he enumerates them one after another, and can find little but faults in them all.* Nor does he esteem dramatic and lyric poets, at least modern, much better.

Great Men of Antiquity, has weighed in the scales of

† P. 158.

18. The Treatise on Epic Poetry by Bossu was once of some reputation. An English poet has thought fit to say that we should have stared, like Indians, at Homer, if Bossu had not taught us to understand him.† The book is, however, long since forgotten; and we fancy that we understand Homer not the worse. It is in six books, which treat of the fable, the action, the narration, the manners, the machinery, the sentiments and expressions of an epic poem. Homer is the favourite poet of Bossu, and Virgil next to him; this preference of the superior model does him some honour in a generation which was becoming insensible to its excellence. Bossu is judicious and correct in taste, but without much depth, and he seems to want the acuteness of Bouhours.

19. Fontenelle is a critic of whom it may be said, that he did more injury to fine taste and sensibility in works of imagination and sentiment, than any man withwe longe out his good sense and natural acuteness could have done. He is systematically cold; if he seems to tolerate any flight of the poet, it is rather by caprice than by a genuine discernment of beauty; but he clings, with the unvielding claw of a cold-blooded animal, to the faults of great writers, which he exposes with reason and sarcasm. His Reflections on Poetry relate mostly to dramatic composition, and to that of the French stage. Theocritus is his victim in the Dissertation on Pastoral Poetry; but Fontenelle gave the Sicilian his revenge; he wrote pastorals himself; and we have altogether forgotten, or, when we again look at, can very partially approve, the idylls of the Boulevards, while those Doric dactyls of Theocritus linger still, like what Schiller has called soft music of yesterday, from our schoolboy reminiscences on our aged ears.

Professional worse name than that of pedant could be imposed on worse name than that of pedant could be imposed on those who sought for glory; the admiration of all that was national in arts, in arms, in manners, as well as in speech, carried away like a torrent those prescriptive titles to reverence which only lingered in colleges. The superiority of the Latin language to French had long been contested; even Henry Stephens has a dissertation in favour of the latter; and in this period, though a few resolute scholars did not retire from the field, it was generally held either that French was every way the better means of expressing our thoughts, or at least so much more convenient as to put nearly an end to the use of the other. Latin had been the privileged language of stone; but Louis XIV., in consequence of an essay by Charpentier, in 1676, replaced the inscriptions on his triumphal arches by others in French. This of course does not much affect the general question between the two languages.

P. 175

[†] Had Bosin never wert the world had still like lindings, served to a might piece of wit. Militarized Liang on Precept.

21. But it was not in language alone that the ancients were to endure the aggression of a disobedient poswhether they had not been surpassed; one perhaps pated, which began before the younger generations could make good their claim. But time, the nominal ally of the old possessors, gave his more powerful aid to their opponents; every age saw the proportions change, and new men rise up to strengthen the ranks of the assailants. In philosophy, in science, in natural knowledge, the ancients had none but a few mere pedants, or half-read lovers of paradox, to maintain their superiority; but in the beauties of language, in eloquence and poetry, the suffrage of criticism had long been theirs. It seemed time to dispute even this, Perrault, a man of some learning, some variety of charles acquirement, and a good deal of ingenuity and quickness, published, in 1687, his famous "Parallel of the Ancients and Moderns in all that regards Arts and Sciences," This is a series of dialogues, the parties being, first, a president, deeply learned and prejudiced in all respects for antiquity; secondly, an abbé, not ignorant, but having reflected more than read, cool and impartial, always made to appear in the right, or, in other words, the author's representative; thirdly, a man of the world, seizing the gay side of every subject, and apparently brought in to prevent the book from becoming dull. They begin with architecture and painting, and soon make it clear that Athens was a mere heap of pig-sties in comparison with Versailles; the ancient painters fare equally ill. They next advance to eloquence and poetry, and here, where the strife of war is sharpest, the defeat of antiquity is chanted with triumph. Homer, Virgil, Horace are successively brought forward for severe and often unjust censure: but of course it is not to be imagined that Perrault is always in the wrong; he had to fight against a pedantic admiration which surrenders all judgment; and having found the bow bent too much in one way, he forced it himself too violently into another direction. It is the fault of such books to be one-sided; they are not unfrequently right in consuring blemishes, but very uncaudid in suppressing beau-Homer has been worst used by Perrault, who had not the least power of feeling his excellence; but the advocate of the newer age in his dialogue admits that the Æneid is superior to any modern epic. In his comparison of eloquence Perrault has given some specimens of both sides in contrast; comparing, by means however of his own versions, the funeral orations of Pericles and Plato with those of Bourdaloue, Bossuet, and Fléchier, the description by Pliny of his country seat with one by Balzac, an epistle of Cicero with another of Balzac. These comparisons were fitted to produce a great effect among those who could neither read the original text, nor place themselves in the midst of ancient feelings and habits. It is easy to perceive that a vast majority of the French in that age would agree with Perrault; the book was written for the times.

22. Fontenelle, in a very short digression on the ancients and moderns, subjoined to his Discourse on Pastoral Poetry, followed the steps of Perrault. "The whole question as to pre-eminence between the ancients and moderns," he begins, "reduces itself into another, whether the trees that used to grow in our woods were larger than those which grow now. If they were, Homer, Plato, Demosthenes, cannot be equalled in these ages; but if our trees are as large as trees were of old, then there is no reason why we may not equal Homer, Plato, and Demosthenes." The nophistry of this is glaring enough; but it was logic for Paris. In the rest of this short essay, there are the usual characteristics of Fontenelle, cool good sense, and an incapacity, by natural privation, of feeling the highest excellence in works of taste.

23. Boileau, in observations annexed to his translation of Longinus, as well as in a few sallies of his poetry, defended the great poets, especially Homer and defence of Pindar, with dignity and moderation; freely abandoning the cause of antiquity where he felt it to be untenable. Perrault replied with courage, a quality meriting some praise where the adversary was so powerful in sarcasm and so little accustomed to spare it; but the controversy ceased in tolerable friendship.

24. The knowledge of new accessions to literature which its lovers demanded, had hitherto been communicated only through the annual catalogues published lourne des at Frankfort or other places. But these lists of SCATARIA title-pages were unsatisfactory to the distant scholar, who sought to become acquainted with the real progress of learning, and to know what he might find it worth while to purchase. Denis de Sallo, a member of the parliament of Paris, and not wholly undistinguished in literature, though his other works are not much remembered, by carrying into effect a happy project of his own, gave birth, as it were, to a mighty spirit which has grown up in strength and enterprise, till it has become the ruling power of the literary world. Monday, the 5th of January, 1665, is the date of the first number of the first review, the Journal des Scavans, published by Sallo under the name of the Sieur de Hedouville, which some have said to be that of his servant. . It was printed weekly, in a duodecimo or sexto-decimo form, tate belonging to Sallo; and he is called in some public description, without reference to the journal, Dominus de Sallo d Historiche in Particular curia scenaror Camucai, a 13. Notwithstanding this, there is evidence that hads us to the valet, so that "ampl us deliberandum censeo; Res magna est."

e Camuent, in his Histoire Critique des Journaux, in two volumes, 1754, which, notwithstanding its general title, is rhiefly confined to the hencey of the Journal des Scarans, and wholly to such as appeared in France, has not been able to clear up this interesting point, for their are not wanting those who assert, that Hedouville was the name of an es-each number containing from twelve to sixteen pages. The first book ever reviewed (let us observe the difference of subject between that and the last, whatever the last may be) was an edition of the works of Victor Vitensis and Vigilius Tapsensis, African bishops of the fifth century, by Father Chiflet, a Jesuit. The second is Spelman's Glossary. According to the prospectus prefixed to the Journal des Scavans, it was not designed for a mere review, but a literary miscellany; composed, in the first place, of an exact catalogue of the chief books which should be printed in Europe; not content with the mere titles, as the majority of bibliographers had hitherto been, but giving an account of their contents, and their value to the public; it was also to contain a necrology of distinguished authors, an account of experiments in physics and chemistry, and of new discoveries in arts and sciences, with the principal decisions of civil and ecclesiastical tribunals, the decrees of the Sorbonne and other French or foreign universities; in short, whatever might be interesting to men of letters. We find therefore some piece of news, more or less of a literary or scientific nature, subjoined to each number. Thus, in the first number we have a double-headed child born near Salisbury; in the second, a question of legitimacy decided in the parliament of Paris; in the third, an experiment on a new ship or boat constructed by Sir William Petty; in the fourth, an account of a discussion in the college of Jesuits on the nature of comets. The scientific articles, which bear a large proportion to the rest, are illustrated by engravings. It was complained that the Journal des Scavans did not pay much regard to polite or amusing literature; and this led to the publication of the Mercure Galant, by Vise, which gave reviews of poetry and of the drama.

25. Though the notices in the Journal des Scavans are very short, and when they give any character, for the most part of a laudatory tone, Sallo did not fail to raise up enemies by the mere assumption of power which a reviewer is prone to affect. Menage, on a work of whose he had made some criticism, and by no means, as it appears, without justice, replied in wrath; Patin and others rose up as injured authors against the self-erected censor; but he made more formidable enemies by some rather blunt declarations of a Gallican feeling, as became a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, against the court of Rome; and the privilege of publication was soon withdrawn from Sallo. It is said that he had the spirit to refuse the offer of continuing the journal under a previous censorship; and it passed into other hands, those of Gallois, who continued it with great success,† It is remarkable that the first review, within a few months of its origin, was silenced for assuming too imperious an authority over literature, and for speaking evil of dignities. "In cunis jam Jove dignus erat." The Journal des Sçavans, incomparably the most ancient of living reviews, is still conspicuous for its learning, its candour, and its freedom from those stains of personal and party malice which deform more popular works.

Victoris Vitensis et Vigilii Tapien-etc. Provincie Bosecom Eginerparian diodecime That on Spelman's Glossity. Opera, edenia R. P. Challetso, Soc. Jesu. which follows, is but in half a page. Presby in $10. Divione. The critique, if

26. The path thus opened to all that could tempt a man who made writing his profession, -profit, celebrity, a perpetual appearance in the public eye, the facility of pouring forth every scattered thought of his own, the power of revenge upon every enemy - could not fail to tempt more conspicuous men than Sallo or his successor Gallois. Two of very high reputation, at least of reputation that hence became very high, entered it, Bayle and Le Clerc. The former, in 1684, commenced a new review, Nouvelles de la République des Lettres. He saw, and was well able to improve, the opportunities which periodical criticism furnished to a mind emmently qualified for it; extensively, and in some points, deeply learned; full of wit, acuteness, and a happy talent of writing in a lively tone without the insipidity of affected politeness. The scholar and philosopher of Rotterdam had a rival, in some respects, and ultimately an adver-

^{*} Canasat, p. 28. Sallo had also at-

[†] E toge de Gallone par l'anteneille, in and some others are tenaed the latter's works, vol. v. p. 100. Isso- un its emissianters, aronng graphic Universelle, arts. Salio and Gal- G-imbersille and Chapelain.

tox Gallon is said to have been a coadjust of Sallo from the Ego issort, and ome others are recently to an east on the emission of the areas of the emission o

sary, in a neighbouring city. Le Clerc, settled at Amsterdam as professor of belles lettres and of Hebrew in the Arminian seminary, undertook in 1686, at the age of twenty-nine, the first of those three celebrated series of reviews, to which he owes so much of his fame. This was the Bibliothèque Universelle, in all the early volumes of which La Croze, a much inferior person, was his coadjutor, published monthly in a very small form. Le Clerc had afterwards a disagreement with La Croze, and the latter part of the Bibliothèque Universelle (that after the tenth volume) is chiefly his own. It ceased to be published in 1693, and the Bibliotheque Choisie, which is perhaps even a more known work of Le Clerc, did not commence till 1705. But the fulness, the variety, the judicious analysis and selection, as well as the value of the original remarks, which we find in the Bibliotheque Universelle, render it of signal utility to those who would embrace the literature of that short, but not unimportant period which it illustrates.

27. Meantime a less brilliant, but by no means less erudite. Tropole review, the Leipsic Acts, had commenced in Germany. The first volume of this series was published in 1682. But being written in Latin, with more regard to the past than to the growing state of opinions, and consequently almost excluding the most attractive, and indeed the most important subjects, with a Lutheran spirit of unchangeable orthodoxy in religion, and with an absence of any thing like philosophy or even connected system in erudition, it is one of the most unreadable books, relatively to its utility in learning, which has ever fallen into my hands. Italy had entered earlier on this critical carcer; the Giornale de' Litterati was begun at Rome is 1608; the Giornale Veneto de' Litterati, at Venice in 1671. They continued for some time; but with less conspicuous reputation than those above mentioned. The Mercure Savant, published at Amsterdam in 168 k, was an indifferent production, which induced Bayle to set up his own Nouvelles de la République des Lettres in opposition to it. Two reviews were commenced in the German language within the seventeenth century, and three in English. The first of these latter was the Weekly Memorials for the Ingenious, London 1682. This, I believe, lasted but a short time. It was followed by one, entitled The Works of the Learned, in 1691; and by another, called History of the Works of the Learned, in 1699.

28. Bayle had first become known in 1682, by the Pensées Diverses sur la Comète de 1680; a work payle's which I am not sure that he ever decidedly surpassed. Its purpose is one hardly worthy, we count. should imagine, to employ him; since those who could read and reason were not likely to be afraid of comets, and those who could do neither would be little the better for his book. But with this ostensible aim Bayle had others in view; it gave scope to his keen observation of mankind, if we may use the word observation for that which he chiefly derived from modern books, and to the calm philosophy which he professed. There is less of the love of paradox, less of a cavalling pyrrhonism, and though much diffuseness, less of pedantry and irrelevant instances in the Pensees Diverses than in his greater work. It exposed him, however, to controversy; Jurien, a French minister in Holland, the champion of Calvinistic orthodoxy, waged a war that was only terminated with their lives; and Bayle's defence of the Thoughts on the Comet is full as long as the original performance, but far less entertaining.

29. He now projected an immortal undertaking, the Historical and Critical Dictionary. Moreri, a laborious Harding scribe, had published, in 1078, a kind of encyclopedic tonary. dictionary, biographical, historical, and geographical; Bayle professed to fill up the numerous deficiencies, and to rectify the compilation from the foreign reviews: It . History of the Works of the Learnedpublished monthly from 1699 to 1711, is much more respectable; though in this also a very large proportion is given to forcign works, and probably on the credit of continental journals. The books restowed are the net us and commenty of a learned class. The accounts given of them are chiefly area ytical the reviewer seldom interposeing to a judgment of any bus is percept that is towards what was in the British Museum. The Universal then called the liberal side, but for the most part the rule ad pited is to speak favourably of every one, - 1942.

[•] Jugler, Hist, Litteraria, eap. 9, Bibliothaque Universelle, xiv. 41 — [The first number of Weekly Memorials for the Incomons is dited Jan. 16. 1681-2, and the first book reviewed is, Christiani Liberi Bickindakoa, Umcchi, 1651. The editor proposes to transcribe from the Journal des Syavata whatever is most valuable, and by fir the greater part of the articles relate to foreign books. This review seems to have lasted but a year, at least there is only one volume Historical Bib otherque, which begin in January, 1000, and expired in Margh, is scarcely worth notice, it is professedly a

errors of this compiler. It is hard to place his dictionary, which appeared in 1694, under any distinct head in a literary classification which does not make a separate chapter for lexicography. It is almost equally difficult to give a general character of this many-coloured web, which great erudition and still greater acuteness and strength of mind wove for the last years of the seventeenth century. The learning of Bayle was copious, especially in what was most peculiarly required, the controversies, the anecdotes, the miscellaneous facts and sentences, scattered over the vast surface of literature for two preceding centuries. In that of antiquity he was less profoundly versed, yet so quick in application of his classical stores, that he passes for a better scholar than he was. His original design may have been only to fill up the deficiencies of Moreri; but a mind so fertile and excursive could not be restrained in such limits. We may find, however, in this an apology for the numerous omissions of Bayle, which would, in a writer absolutely original, seem both capricious and unaccountable. We never can anticipate with confidence that we shall find any name in his dictionary. The notes are most frequently unconnected with the life to which they are appended; so that, under a name uninteresting to us, or inapposite to our purpose, we may be led into the richest vein of the author's fine reasoning or hvely wit. Bayle is admirable in exposing the fallacies of dogmatism, the perplexities of philosophy, the weaknesses of those who affect to guide the opinions of mankind. But, wanting the necessary condition of good reasoning, an earnest desire to reason well, a moral rectitude from which the love of truth must spring, he often avails himself of petty cavils, and becomes dogmatical in his very doubts. A more sincere spirit of inquiry could not have suffered a man of his penetrating genius to acquiesce, even contingently, in so superficial a scheme as the Manichean. The sophistry of Bayle, however, bears no proportion to his just and acute observations. Less excuse can be admitted for his indecency, which almost assumes the character of monomania, so invariably does it recur, even where there is least pretext for it.

30. The Jugemens des Sçavans by Baillet, published in 1685 and 1686, the Polyhistor of Morhof in 1689, are certainly works of criticism as well as of bibliography. But neither of these writers, especially the latter, are of the much authority in matters of taste; their erudition that was very extensive, their abilities respectable, since they were able to produce such useful and comprehensive works; but they do not greatly serve to enlighten or correct our judgments, nor is the original matter in any considerable proportion to that which they have derived from others. I have taken notice of both these in my preface,

31. France was very fruitful of that miscellaneous literature which, desultory and amusing, has the advantage of remaining better in the memory than more systematic books, and in fact is generally found to supply the man of extensive knowledge with the materials of his conversation, as well as to fill the vacancies of his deeper studies. The memoirs, the letters, the travels, the dialogues and essays, which might be ranged in so large a class as that we now pass in review, are too numerous to be mentioned, and it must be understood that most of them are less in request even among the studious than they were in the last century. One group has acquired the distinctive name of Ana; the reported conversation, the table-talk of the learned. Several of these belong to the last part of the sixteenth century, or the first of the next; the Scaligerana, the Perromana, the Pitheana, the Naudaeana, the Casauboniana; the last of which are not conversational, but fragments collected from the common-place books, and loose papers of Isaac Casaubon. Two collections of the present period are very well known; the Menagiana, and the Melanges de Latérature par Vigueul-Marville; which differs indeed from the rest in not being reported by others, but published by the author himself; yet comes so near in spirit and manner, that we may place it in the same class. The Menagiana has the common fault of these Ana, that it rather disappoints expectation, and does not give us as much new learning as the name of its author seems to promise; but it is amusing, full of light anecdote of a literary kind, and interesting to all who love the recollections of that generation. Vigneul-Marville is an imaginary person; the author of the Melanges de Littérature is D'Argonne, a Benedictine of Rouen. This book has been much esteemed; the mask gives courage to the author, who writes, not unlike a Benedictine, but with a general tone of independent thinking, united to good judgment and a tolerably extensive knowledge of the state of literature. He had entered into the religious profession rather late in life. The Chevranna and Segraisiana, especially the latter, are of little value. The Parrhasiana of Le Clerc are less amusing, and less miscellaneous than some of the Ana; but in all his writings there is a love of truth and a zeal against those who obstruct inquiry, which to congenial spirits is as pleasing as it is sure to render him obnoxious to opposite tempers.

32. The characteristics of English writers in the first division of the century were not maintained in the second, though the change, as was natural, did not come on by very rapid steps. The pedantry of unauthorised Latinisms, the affectation of singular and not generally intelligible words from other sources, the love of quaint phrases, strange analogies, and ambitious efforts at antithesis, gave way by degrees; a greater case of writing was what the public demanded, and what the writers after the Restoration sought to attain; they were more strictly idiomatic and English than their predecessors. But this case sometimes became negligence and feebleness, and often turned to coarseness and vulgarity. The language of Sevigné and Hamilton is eminently colloquial; scarce a turn occurs in their writings which they would not have used in familiar society; but theirs was the colloquy of the gods, ours of men: their idiom, though still simple and French, had been refined in the saloons of Paris, by that instinctive rejection of all that is low which the fine tact of accomplished women dictates; while in our own contemporary writers, with little exception, there is what defaces the dialogue of our comedy, a tone not so much of provincialism, or even of what is called the language of the common people, as of one much worse, the dregs of volgar ribaldry, which a gentleman must clear from his conversation before he can assert that name. Nor was this confined to those who led irregular lives; the geperal manners being unpolished, we find in the writings of the clergy, wherever they are polemic or satirical, the same tendency to what is called slang; a word which, as itself belongs to the vocabulary it denotes, I use with some unwillingness. The pattern of bad writing in this respect was Sir Roger L'Estrange; his Æsop's Fables will present every thing that is hostile to good taste; yet by a certain wit and readiness in raillery L'Estrange was a popular writer, and may even now be read, perhaps, with some amusement. The translation of Don Quixote, published in 1682, may also be specified as incredibly vulgar, and without the least perception of the tone which the original author has preserved.

SS. We can produce nevertheless several names of those who laid the foundations at least, and indeed furnished examples of good style; some of them nished examples, of good style; some of them among the greatest, for other merits, in our literature. Hobbes is perhaps the first of whom we can strictly say that he is a good English writer; for the excellent passages of Hooker, Sidney, Raleigh, Bacon, Taylor, Chillingworth, and others of the Elizabethan or the first Stuart period are not sufficient to establish their claim; a good writer being one whose composition is nearly uniform, and who never sinks to such inferiority or negligence as we must confess in most of these. To make such a writer, the absence of gross faults is full as necessary as actual beauties; we are not judging as of poets, by the highest flight of their genius, and forgiving all the rest, but as of a sum of positive and negative quantities, where the latter counterbalance and efface an equal portion of the former. Hobbes is clear, precise, spirited, and, above all, free, in general, from the faults of his predecessors; his language is sensibly less obsolete; he is never vulgar, rarely, if ever, quaint or pedantic.

34. Cowley's prose, very unlike his verse, as Johnson has observed, is perspicuous and unaffected. His few essays may even be reckoned among the earliest models of good writing. In that, especially, on the death of Cromwell, till, losing his composure, he falls a little into the vulgar style towards the close, we find an absence of pedantry, an ease and graceful choice of idiom, an unstudied harmony of periods, which had been perceived in very few writers of the two preceding reigns. "His thoughts," says Johnson, "are natural, and his style has a smooth and placid equabi-lity which has never yet obtained its due commendation. Nothing is far-sought or hard-laboured; but all is easy without feebleness, and familiar without grossness."

35. Evelyn wrote in 1651 a little piece, purporting to be an account of England by a Frenchman. It is very severe on our manners, especially in London; his abhorrence of the late revolutions in church and state conspiring with his natural politeness which he had lately improved by foreign travel. It is worth reading as illustrative of social history; but I chiefly mention it here on account of the polish and gentlemanly elegance of the style, which very few had hitherto regarded in such light compositions. An answer by some indignant patriot has been reprinted together with this pamphlet of Evelyn, and is a good specimen of the bestial ribaldry which our ancestors seem to have taken for wit." The later writings of Evelyn are such as his character and habits would lead us to expect, but I am not aware that they often rise above that respectable level, nor are their subjects such as to require an elevated style.

36. Every poem and play of Dryden, as they successively appeared, was ushered into the world by those prefaces and dedications which have made him celebrated as a critic of poetry and a master of the English language. The Essay on Dramatic Poesy, and its subsequent Defence, the Origin and Progress of Satire, the Parallel of Poetry and Painting, the Life of Plutarch, and other things of minor importance, all prefixed to some more extensive work, complete the catalogue of his prose. The style of Dryden was very superior to any that England had seen, Not conversant with our old writers, so little, in fact, as to find the common phrases of the Elizabethan age unintelligible t, he followed the taste of Charles's reign, in emulating the politest and most popular writers in the French language. He seems to have formed himself on Montaigne, Balzac, and Voiture; but so ready was his invention, so vigorous his judgment, so complete his mastery over his native tongue,

[.] Both these will be found in the late part? p. 1% et al ln. Dryden thought edition of Evriyn's Misserlianness Werks. expressions wrong and incorrect in Shake 4 Malone has given several grants of speace and Jonson, which were the entities. Dryden's Prose Works, vol. 1 rect language of their age.

that, in point of style, he must be reckoned above all the three. He had the ease of Montaigne without his negligence and embarrassed structure of periods; he had the dignity of Balzac with more varied cadences, and without his hyperbolical tumour; the unexpected turns of Voiture without his affectation and air of effort. In the dedications, especially, we find paragraphs of extraordinary gracefulness, such as possibly have never been surpassed in our language. The prefaces are evidently written in a more negligent style; he seems, like Montaigne, to converse with the reader from his arm-chair, and passes onward with little connexion from one subject to another.* In addressing a patron, a different line is observable; he comes with the respectful air which the occasion seems to demand; but, though I do not think that Dryden ever, in language, forgets his own position, we must confess that the flattery is sometimes palpably untrue, and always offensively indelicate. The dedication of the Mock Astrologer to the Duke of Newcastle is a master-piece of fine writing; and the subject better deserved these lavish commendations than most who received them. That of the State of Innocence to the Duchess of York, is also very well written; but the adulation is excessive. It appears to me that, after the Revolution, Dryden took less pains with his style; the colloquial vulgarisms, and these are not wanting even in his earlier prefaces, become more frequent; his periods are often of more slovenly construction; he forgets even in his dedications that he is standing before a lord. Thus, remarking on the account Andromache gives to Hector of her own history, he observes, in a style rather unworthy of him, "The devil was in Hector if he knew not all this matter as well as she who told it him, for she had been his bed-fellow for many years together; and if he knew it then, it must be confessed that Homer in this long digression has rather given us his own character than that of the fair lady whom he paints." †

37. His Essay on Dramatic Poesy, published in 1668,

[†] Vol. iii. p. 286. This is in the dedication of his third Miscellany to Lord Batchife.

was reprinted sixteen years afterwards, and it is curious to observe the changes which Dryden made in the ex-The trust of Dression. Malone has carefully noted all these; they show both the care the author took with his own style, and the change which was gradually working in the English language. The Anglicism of terminating the sentence with a preposition is rejected. † Thus "I cannot think so contemptibly of the age I live in," is exchanged "for the age in which I live." "A deeper expression of belief than all the actor can persuade us to," is altered, "can insinuate into us." And, though the old form continued in use long after the time of Dryden, it has of late years been reckoned inelegant, and proscribed in all cases, perhaps with an unnecessary fastidiousness, to which I have not uniformly deferred; since our language is of a Teutonic structure, and the rules of Latin or French grammar are not always to bind us.

38. This Essay on Dramatic Poesy is written in dialogue; Dryden himself, under the name of Neauder, being probably one of the speakers. It turns on the use of rhyme in tragedy, on the observation of the unities, and on some other theatrical questions. Dryden, at this time, was favourable to rhymed tragedies, which his practice supported. Sir Robert Howard having written some observations on that essay, and taken a different view as to rhyme, Dryden published a defence of his essay in a masterly style of cutting scorn, but one hardly justified by the tone of the criticism, which had been very civil towards him; and as he was apparently in the wrong, the air of superiority seems the more misplaced.

39. Dryden, as a critic, is not to be numbered with those who have sounded the depths of the human mind, hardly

Vol. i pp 136—142.

^{4 &}quot; The preposition in the end of the syntence, a common fault with him ; Ben Jonson), and which I have but lately observed in my own writings," p. 237. The form is, in my opinion, sometimes emphatic and spirited, though its frequent use appears slovenly. I remember my with unless we choose rather late friend, Mr. Richard Sharp, whose engumbering pronoun which, good taste is well known, used to quote an interrogatory of Hooker: "Shall there be a God to swear by, and none to pray to?" as an instance of the force which this arrangement, so eminently id omatic, sometimes gives. In the passive voice, I think it better than in the active; nor can it always be dispensed with, unless we choose rather the feeble with those who analyse the language and sentiments of poets, and teach others to judge by showing why they Harribeal have judged themselves. He scatters remarks chanceer sometimes too indefinite, sometimes too arbitrary; yet his predominating good sense colours the whole; we find in them no perplexing subtilty, no cloudy nonsense, no paradoxes and heresics in taste to revolt us. Those he has made on translation in the preface to that of Ovid's Epistles are valuable. "No man," he says, "is capable of translating poetry, who besides a genius to that art, is not a master both of his author's language and of his own. Nor must we understand the language only of the poet, but his particular turn of thoughts and expression, which are the characters that distinguish and as it were individuate him from all other writers." • We cannot pay Dryden the compliment of saying that he gave the example as well as precept, especially in his Virgil. He did not scruple to copy Segrais in his discourse on Epic Poetry. "Him I follow, and what I horrow from him am ready to acknowledge to him; for impartially speaking, the French are as much better critics than the English as they are worse poets."†

40. The greater part of his critical writings relates to the drama; a subject with which he was very conversant; but he had some considerable prejudices; he seems never to have felt the transcendent excellence of Shakspeare; and sometimes perhaps his own opinions, if not feigned, are biassed by that sort of self-defence to which he thought himself driven in the prefaces to his several plays. He had many enemies on the watch; the Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal, a satire of great wit, had exposed to ridicule the heroic tragedies; and many were afterwards ready to forget the merits of the poet in the delinquencies of the politician. "What Virgil wrote," he says, "in the vigour of his age, in plenty and in

Vol. iii p. 19.

⁴ P. 460.

This coincedy was published in 1672; the parodies are amusing; and though parody is the most unfair weapon that ridicale can use, they are in most in stances warranted by the original. Bayes, whether he resembles Dryden or not, is a very comic personage, the character is mid by Juliuson to have been sketched for Davis and, but I much doubt this report. Davenut had been dead some years before the Rehearsal was published, and could have been in no way obnorous to its satire.

case, I have undertaken to translate in my declining years; struggling with wants, oppressed by sickness, curbed in my genius, hable to be misconstrued in all I write; and my judges, if they are not very equitable, already prejudiced against me by the lying character which has been given them of my morals." *

41. Dryden will hardly be charged with abandoning too Rymet on hastily our national credit, when he said the French were better critics than the English. We had scarcely any thing worthy of notice to allege beyond his own writings. The Theatrum Poctarum by Philips, nephew of Milton, is superficial in every respect. Thomas Rymer, best known to mankind as the editor of the Federa, but a strenuous advocate for the Aristotelian principles in the drama, published in 1678 " The Tragedies of the last Age considered and examined by the Practice of the Ancients, and by the common Sense of all Ages." This contains a censure of some plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakspeare and Jonson. " I have chiefly considered the fable or plot which all conclude to be the soul of a tragedy, which with the ancients is always found to be a reasonable soul, but with us for the most part a brutish, and often worse than brutish." † I have read only his criticisms on the Maid's Tragedy, King and no King, and Rollo; and as the conduct and characters of all three are far enough from being invulnerable, it is not surprising that Rymer has often well exposed them.

42. Next to Dryden, the second place among the polite writers of the period from the Restoration to the end of the century has commonly been given to Sir William Temple. His Miscellanies, to which principally this praise belongs, are not recommended by more crudition than a retired statesman might acquire with no great expense of time, nor by much originality of reflection. But if Temple has not profound knowledge, he turns all he possesses well to account; if his thoughts are not very striking, they are commonly just. He has less eloquence than Bolingbroke, but is also free from his restlessness and ostentation. Much also which now appears superficial in Temple's historical surveys, was far less familiar in his age; he has the merit of a comprehensive and a candid mind. His style, to which we should particularly refer, will be found in comparison with his contemporaries highly polished, and sustained with more equability than they preserve, remote from any thing either pedantic or humble. The periods are studiously rhythmical; yet they want the variety and peculiar charm that we admire in those of Dryden.

43. Locke is certainly a good writer, relatively to the greater part of his contemporaries; his plain and spirof manly sentences often give us pleasure by the wording alone. But he has some defects; in his Essay on the Human Understanding he is often too figurative for the subject. In all his writings, and especially in the Treatise on Education, he is occasionally negligent, and though not vulgar, at least according to the idiom of his age, slovenly in the structure of his sentences as well as the choice of his words; he is not, in mere style, very forcible, and certainly not very elegant.

44. The Essays of Sir George Mackenzie are empty and diffuse; the style is full of pedantic words to a degree of barbarism; and though they were chiefly written after the Revolution, he seems to have wholly formed himself on the older writers, such as Sir Thomas Browne or even Feltham. He affects the obsolete and unpleasing termination of the third person of the verb in eth, which was going out of use even in the pulpit, besides other rust of archaism. Nothing can be more unlike the manner of Dryden, Locke, or Temple. In his matter be seems a mere declaimer, as if the world would any longer endure the trivial morality which the sixteenth century had borrowed from Seneca, or the dull ethics of sermons. It is probable that, as Mackenzie was a man who had seen and read much, he must have some better passages than I have found in glancing shortly at his works. His countryman, Andrew Fletcher, is a better master of English

[[]It must be confessed that instances it is scareely yet disused, at least in very of this termination, though not frequent, grave writings. But the unpleasing sound may be found in the first years of George of these a sufficient objection.—1842]

III., or even later. In the auxiliary hoth, style; he writes with purity, clearness, and spirit; but the substance is so much before his eyes, that he is little solicitous about language. And a similar character may be given to many of the political tracts in the reign of William. They are well expressed for their purpose; their English is perspicuous, unaffected, often forcible, and upon the whole much superior to that of similar writings in the reign of Charles; but they do not challenge a place of which their authors never dreamed; they are not to be counted in the polite literature of England.

45. I may have overlooked, or even never known, some books of sufficient value to deserve mention; and I regret that the list of miscellaneous literature should be so short. But it must be confessed that our golden age did not begin before the eighteenth century, and then with him who has never since been rivalled in grace, humour, and invention.

Walton's Complete Angler, published in 1653, seems by the title a strange choice out of all the books of half a century; yet its simplicity, its sweetness, its natural grace, and happy intermixture of graver strains with the precepts of angling, have rendered this book deservedly popular, and a model which one of the most famous among our late philosophers, and a successful disciple of Isaac Walton in his favourite art, has condescended to imitate.

46. A book, not indeed remarkable for its style, but one which I could hardly mention in any less miscellaneous chapter than the present, though, since it was published in 1638, it ought to have been mentioned before, is Wilkins's "Discovery of a New World, or a Discourse tending to prove that it is probable there may be another habitable World in the Moon, with a Discourse concerning the Possibility of a Passage thither." This is one of the births of that inquiring spirit, that disdain of ancient prejudice, which the seventeenth century produced. Bacon was undoubtedly the father of it in England; but Kepler, and above all Galileo, by the new truths they demonstrated, made men fearless in investigation and conjecture. The geographical discoveries indeed of Columbus and Magellan had prepared the way for conjectures, hardly more astonishing in the eyes of the vulgar than those had been. Wilkins accordingly begins by bringing a host of sage writers who had denied the existence of antipodes. He expressly maintains the Copernican theory, but admits that it was generally reputed a novel paradox. The arguments on the other side he meets at some length, and knew how to answer by the principles of compound motion, the plausible objection that stones falling from a tower were not left behind by the motion of the earth. The spots in the moon he took for sea, and the brighter parts for land. A lunar atmosphere he was forced to hold, and gives reasons for thinking it probable. As to inhabitants he does not dwell long on the subject. Campanella, and long before him Cardinal Cusanus, had believed the sun and moon to be inhabited , and Wilkins ends by saying: "Being content for my own part to have spoken so much of it as may conduce to show the opinion of others concerning the inhabitants of the moon, I dare not myself affirm any thing of these Selenites, because I know not any ground whereon to build any probable opinion. But I think that future ages will discover more, and our posterity perhaps may invent some means for our better acquaintance with those inhabitants," To this be comes as his final proposition, that it may be possible for some of our posterity to find out a conveyance to this other world; and if there be inhabitants there, to have communication with them. But this chapter is the worst in the book, and shows that Wilkins, notwithstanding his ingennity, had but crude notions on the principles of physics. He followed this up by what I have not seen, a "Discourse concerning a new Planet; tending to prove that it is possible our Earth is one of the Planets." This appears to be a regular vindication of the Copernican theory, and was published in 1640.

47. The cause of antiquity, so rudely assailed abroad by Perrault and Fontenelle, found support in Sir Wilham Temple, who has defended it in one of his democracy essays with more zeal than prudence or knowledge edit. 1502).

terra magis matermore at the naw of the various subjects on which he contends for the rights of the past. It was in fact such a credulous and superficial view as might have been taken by a pedant of the sixteenth century. For it is in science, taking the word largely, full as much as in works of genius, that he denies the ancients to have been surpassed. Temple's Essay, however, was translated into French, and he was supposed by many to have made a brilliant vindication of injured antiquity. But it was watten's soon refuted in the most solid book that was written in any country upon this famous dispute. William Wotton published in 1694 his Reflections on ancient and modern Learning. He draws very well in this the hae between Temple and Perrault, avoiding the tasteless judgment of the latter in poetry and eloquence, but pointing out the superiority of the moderns in the whole range of physical science.

SECT. II. - ON FICTION.

French Romances - La Fayette and others - Pilgrim's Progress -Turkish Spy.

48. Spath had about the middle of this century a writer of various literature, who is only known in Europe by his fictions, Quevedo. His visions and his life of the great Tacaño were early translated, and became very popular.† They may be reckoned superior to any thing in comic romance, except Don Quixote, that the seventeenth century produced; and yet this commendation is not a high one. In the picaresque style, the life of Tacaño is tolerably amusing; but Quevedo, like others, has long since been to one so young, a special record of his extraordinary proficiency was made in the registers of the university. Monk's Life of Bentley, p. 7.

† The translation of this, "made English by a preson of honour," takes great blactics with the original, and cridearous to excel it in wit by means of frequent interpolation.

Wotton had been a boy of astonishing percently, at an area old be could readly translate Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, at seven he added some knowledge of Arabic and Syrine. He entered Catherine Hall, Cambridge, in his tenth year, at thirteen, when he took the degree of built har of arts, he was acquainted with twelve languages. There being no precedent of granting a degree surpassed. The Sueños, or Visions, are better; they show spirit and sharpness with some originality of invention. But Las Zahurdas de Pluton, which, like the other Visions, bears a general resemblance to the Pilgrim's Progress, being an allegorical dream, is less powerfully and graphically written; the satire is also rather too obvious. "Lucian," says Bouterweek, "furnished him with the original idea of satirical visions; but Quevedo's were the first of their kind in modern literature. Owing to frequent imitations, their faults are no longer disguised by the charm of novelty, and even their merits have ceased to interest."

49. No species of composition seems less adapted to the genius of the French nation in the reign of Louis XIV, than the heroic romances so much adhered mired in its first years. It must be confessed that this was but the continuance, and in some respect, possibly, an improvement of a long-established style of fiction. But it was not fitted to endure reason or ridicule, and the societies of Paris knew the use of both weapons. Mohere sometimes tried his wit upon the romances; and Boileau, rather later in the day, when the victory had been won, attacked Mademoiselle Scudery with his sarcastic irony in a dialogue on the heroes of her invention.

of chivalry were replaced by less wonderful adventures; the love became less hyperbolical in expression, though not less intensely engrossing the personages; the general tone of manners was lowered down better to that of nature, or at least of an ideality which the imagination did not reject; a style already tried in the minor fictions of Spain. The earliest novels that demand attention in this line are those of the Countess de la Fayette, celebrated, while Mademoiselle de la Vergne, under the name of Laverna in the Latin poetry of Menage.† Zayde, the first of these, is entirely in the almost, perhaps, too trite to be quoted, is personal enough -

^{*} Hist of Spanish Literature, p. 471.

[†] The name Laverna, though well-sounding, was in one respect unlucky, heing that given by antiquity to the juddess of thieves. An epigram on Menage, Lesser a there is by make set that dieth Coshina (Lum coshe ideby) Cost has all a toh Malicius des Cosus (day) her needs a bettim. All metum is all conductories for a bettim.

Spanish style; the adventures are improbable, but various and rather interesting to those who carry no scepticism into fiction; the language is polished and agrecable, though not very animated; and it is easy to perceive that while that kind of novel was popular, Zavde would obtain a high place. It has however the usual faults; the story is broken by intervening narratives, which occupy too large a space; the sorrows of the principal characters excite, at least as I should judge, little sympathy; and their sentiments and emotions are sometimes too much refined in the alembic of the Hotel Rambouillet. In a later novel, the Princess of Cleves. Madame La Fayette threw off the affectation of that circle to which she had once belonged, and though perhaps Zayde is, or was in its own age, the more celebrated novel, it seems to me that in this she has excelled herself. The story, being nothing else than the insuperable and insidious, but not guilty, attachment of a married lady to a lover, required a delicacy and correctness of taste which the authoress has well displayed in it. The probability of the incidents, the natural course they take, the absence of all complication and perplexity, give such an inartificial air to this novel, that we can scarcely help believing it to shadow forth some real event. A modern novelist would probably have made more of the story; the style is always calm, sometimes almost languid; a tone of decorous politeness, like that of the French stage, is never relaxed; but it is precisely by this means that the writer has kept up a moral dignity, of which it would have been so easy to lose sight. The Princess of Cleves is perhaps the first work of mere invention (for though the characters are historical, there is no known foundation for the story) which brought forward the manners of the aristocracy; it may be said, the contentporary manners; for Madame La Fayette must have copied her own times. As this has become a popular style of fiction, it is just to commemorate the novel which introduced it.

seventeenth century which they praise; those of Madame Villedien, or Des Jardins, may deserve to be excepted; but I have not seen them. Scarron, a man deformed and diseased, but endowed with vast gaiety, which generally exuberated in bulloon jests, has the credit of having struck out into a new path by his Roman Comique. The Spaniards however had so much like this that we cannot perceive any great originality in Scarron. The Roman Comique is still well known, and if we come to it in vacant moments, will serve its end in amusing us; the story and characters have no great interest, but they are natural; yet, without the least disparagement to the vivacity of Scarron, it is still true that he has been left at an immense distance in observation of mankind, in humorous character, and in ludicrous effect by the novelists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It is said that Scarron's romance is written in a pure style; and some have even pretended that he has not been without effect in refining the language. The Roman Bourgeois of Furetière appears to be a novel of middle life; it had some reputation, but I cannot speak of it with any knowledge.

52. Cyrano de Bergerac bad some share in directing the public taste towards those extravagances of fancy Cyrano de which were afterwards highly popular. He has Bergerica been imitated, as some have observed, by Swift and Voltaire, and I should add, to a certain degree, by Hamilton; but all the three have gone far beyond him. He is not himself a very original writer. His Voyage to the Moon and History of the Empire of the Sun are manifestly suggested by the True History of Lucian; and he had modern fictions, especially the Voyage to the Moon by Godwin, mentioned in our last volume, which he had evidently read, to imp the wings of an invention not perhaps eminently fertile. Yet Bergerac has the merit of being never wearisome; his fictions are well conceived, and show little effort, which seems also the character of his language in this short piece; though his letters had been written in the worst style of affectation, so as to make us suspect that he was turning the manner of some contemporaries into ridicule. The novels of Segrais, such at least as I have seen, are mere pieces of light satire, designed to amuse by transient allusions the lady by whom he was patronised, Mademoiselle de Montpensier. If they deserve any regard at all, it is as links in the history of fiction between the mock-heroic romance, of which Voiture had given an instance, and the style of fantastic invention, which was perfected by Hamilton.

bave invented a kind of fiction which became extremely popular, and has had, even after it ceased to find direct imutators, a perceptible influence over the lighter literature of Europe. The idea was original, and happily executed. Perhaps he sometimes took the tales of children, such as the tradition of many generations had delivered them; but much of his fairy machinery seems to have been his own, and I should give him credit for several of the stories, though it is hard to form a guess. He gave to them all a real interest, as far as could be, with a naturalness of expression, an arch naiveté, a morality neither too obvious nor too refined, and a slight poignancy of satire on the world, which render the Tales of Mother Goose almost a counterpart in prose to the Fables of La Fontaine.

54. These amusing fictions caught the fancy of an indolent but not stupid nobility. The court of Versailles and all Paris resounded with fairy tales; it became the popular style for more than half a century. But few of these fall within our limits. Perrault's immediate followers. Madame Murat and the Countess D'Aunoy, especially the latter, have some merit; but they come very short of the happy simplicity and brevity we find in Mother Goose's Tales. It is possible that Count Antony Hamilton may have written those tales which have made him famous before the end of the century, though they were published later. But these, with many admirable strokes of wit and invention, have too forced a tone in both these qualities; the labour is too evident, and, thrown away on such trifling, excites something like contempt; they are written for an exclusive coterie, not for the world; and the world in all such cases will sooner or later take its revenge. Yet Hamilton's tales are incomparably superior to what followed; inventions alternately dull and extravagant, a style negligent or manuered, an immorality passing onward from the licentiousness of the Regency to the debased philosophy of the ensuing age, became the general characteristics of these fictions, which finally expired in the neglect and scorn of the world.

55. The Télémaque of Fenelon, after being suppressed in France, appeared in Holland claudestinely without Todaysoe the author's consent in 1699. It is needless to say of Form that it soon obtained the admiration of Europe, and perhaps there is no book in the French language that has been more read. Fenelon seems to have conceived that, metre not being essential, as he assumed, to poetry, he had, by imitating the Odyssey in Télémaque, produced an epic of as legitimate a character as his model. But the boundaries between epic poetry, especially such epics as the Odyssey, and romance were only perceptible by the employment of verse in the former; no elevation of character, no ideality of conception, no charm of imagery or emotion had been denied to romance. The language of poetry had for two centuries been seized for its use. Telemaque must therefore take its place among romances; but still it is true that no romance had breathed so classical a spirit, none had abounded so much with the richness of poetical language, much in fact of Homer, Virgil, and Sophocles having been woven in with no other change than verbal translation, nor had any preserved such dignity in its circumstances, such beauty, harmony, and nobleness in its diction. It would be as idle to say that Fenelon was indebted to D'Urfe and Calprenede, as to deny that some degree of resemblance may be found in their poetical prose. The one belonged to the morals of chivalry, generous but exaggerated; the other, to those of wisdom and religion. The one has been forgotten because its tone is false; the other is ever admired, and is only less regarded because it is true in excess, because it contains too much of what we know. Télémaque, like some other of Fenelon's writings, is to be considered in reference to its object; an object of all the noblest, being to form the character of one to whom many must look up for their welfare, but still very different from the inculcation of profound truth. The beauties of Telémaque are very numerous, the descriptions, and indeed the whole tone of the book, have a charm of grace, something like the pictures of Guido; but there is also a certain languor which steals over us in reading, and though there is no real want of variety in the narration, it remind us so continually of its source, the Homeric legent rather monotonous. The abandonment of verse has produced too much diffuseness; it will be observed, if we look attentively, that where Homer is circumstantial, Fenelon is more so; in this he sometimes approaches the minuteness of the romancers. But these defects are more than compensated by the moral, and even esthetic excellence of this romance.

56. If this most fertile province of all literature, as we have now discovered it to be, had yielded so little even in France, a nation that might appear eminently fitted to explore it, down to the close of the seventeenth century, we may be less surprised at the deficiency of our own country. Yet the scarcity of original fiction in England was so great as to be inexplicable by any reasoning. The public taste was not incapable of being pleased; for all the novels and romances of the Continent were readily translated. The manners of all classes were as open to humorous description, the imagination was as vigorous, the heart as susceptible as in other countries. But not only we find nothing good; it can hardly be said that we find any thing at all that has ever attracted notice in English romance. Parthenissa of Lord Orrery, in the heroic style, and the short novels of Afra Behn, are nearly as many, perhaps, as could be detected in old libraries. We must leave the beaten track before we can place a single work in this class.

John Bunyan may pass for the father of our novelists. Progress. His success in a line of composition like the spiritual romance or allegory, which seems to have been frigid and unreadable in the few instances where it had been attempted, is doubtless enhanced by his want of all learning and his low station in life. He was therefore rarely, if ever, an imitator; he was never enchained by rules. Bunyan possessed in a remarkable degree the power of representation; his inventive faculty was considerable, but the other is his distinguishing excellence. He saw, and makes us see, what he describes; he is circumstantial without prolixity, and in the variety and frequent change of his incidents, never loses sight of the unity of his allegorical fable. His invention was enriched, and rather his choice determined, by one rule he had laid down to himself, the adaptation of all the incidental language of Scripture to his own use. There is scarce a circumstance or metaphor in the Old Testament which does not find a place, bodily and literally, in the story of the Pilgrim's Progress; and this peculiar artifice has made his own imagination appear more creative than it really is. In the conduct of the romance no rigorous attention to the propriety of the allegory seems to have been uniformly preserved. Vanity Fair, or the cave of the two giants, might, for any thing we see, have been placed elsewhere; but it is by this neglect of exact parallelism that he better keeps up the reality of the pilgrimage, and takes off the coldness of mere allegory. It is also to be remembered that we read this book at an age when the spiritual meaning is either little perceived or little regarded. In his language, nevertheless, Bunyan sometimes mingles the signification too much with the fable; we might be perplexed between the imaginary and the real Christian; but the liveliness of parration soon brings us back, or did at least when we were young, to the fields of fancy. Yet the Pilgrim's Progress, like some other books, has of late been a little overrated; its excellence is great, but it is not of the highest rank, and we should be careful not to break down the landmarks of fame, by placing the John Bunyans and the Daniel De Foes among the Dii Majores of our worship.

58. I am inclined to claim for England not the invention. but, for the most part, the composition of another book, Turkish which, being grounded on fiction, may be classed soy. here, The Turkish Spy. A secret emissary of the Porte is supposed to remain at Paris in disguise for above forty years, from 1635 to 1682. His correspondence with a number of persons, various in situation, and with whom therefore his letters assume various characters, is protracted through eight volumes. Much, indeed most, relates to the history of those times and to the anecdotes connected with it; but in these we do not find a large proportion of novelty. The more remarkable letters are those which run into metaphysical and theological speculation. These are written with an earnest seriousness, yet with an extraordinary freedom, such as the feigned garb of a Mohammedan could hardly have exempted from censure in catholic countries. Mahmud, the mysterious writer, stands on a sort of eminence above all human prejudice; he was privileged to judge as a stranger of the religion and philosophy of Europe; but his bold spirit ranges over the field of Oriental speculation. The Turkish Spy is no ordinary production, but contains as many proofs of a thoughtful, if not very profound mind, as any we can find. It suggested the Persian Letters to Montesquien and the Jewish to Argens; the former deviating from his model with the originality of talent, the latter following it with a more servile closeness. Probability, that is, a resemblance to the personated character of an Oriental, was not to be attained, nor was it desirable, in any of these fictions; but Mahmud has something not European, something of a solitary insulated wanderer, gazing on a world that knows him not, which throws, to my feelings, a striking charm over the Turkish Spy; while the Usbek of Montesquieu has become more than half Parisian; his ideas are neither those of his birthplace, nor such as have sprung up unbidden from his soul, but those of a polite, witty, and acute society; and the correspondence with his harem in Persia, which Montesquieu has thought attractive to the reader, is not much more interesting than it is probable, and ends in the style of a common romance. As to the Jewish Letters of Argens, it is far inferior to the Turkish Spy, and, in fact, rather an insipid book.

59. It may be asked why I dispute the claim made by all the foreign biographers in favour of John Paul Macana, a native of Genoa, who is asserted to have published the first volume of the Turkish Spy at Paris in 1684, and the rest in subsequent years. But I am caché à Paris. Il prétend les avoir traduites de l'Arabe en Italien et il raconta fort en long commant il les a trouvées. On sompconno avec beaucomp d'apparence, que e est un tour d'esprit Itaben, et tane hetron ingenieure semblithe a celle dont Virgile s'est servi pour louer Auguste, sec. Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Mars, ir et , in Chorres diverses de Bayle, vol 1, p. 20. The Espion Ture in not to be traced in the index to the Journal des Sasains, nor it it noticed in the Bibliotheque Universelle.

The first portion was published at Paris, and also at Amsterdam. Bayle gives the following account — Cet ouvrige a été contrefult à Amsterdam du consentement du libraire de Paris, qui l'a le premier imprimé. Il sera compose de planeurs petits volumes qui contiendront les evinemens les plus considerables de la circiamité en general, et de la France en particulier, depuis l'amée 1637 jusqu'en 1682. Un Italien nauf de Génes, Marane, donne ces relations pour des lettres cerites aux ministres de la Porte par un espion l'ure qui se tenost not disputing that Marana is the author of the thirty letters. published in 1684, and of twenty more in 1686, which have been literally translated into English, and form about half the first volume in English of our Turkish Spy. Nor do I doubt in the least that the remainder of that volume had a French original, though it happens that I have not seen it. But the later volumes of the Espion Ture, in the edition of 1696, with the date of Cologue, which, according to Barbier, is put for Rouent, are avowedly translated from the English. And to the second volume of our Turkish Spy, published in 1691, is prefixed an account, not very credible, of the man-

* Salfi, xiv. 61. Biograph. Univers. † Dictionnaire des Auonymes, vol i. p. 406. Harbier's notice of L'Espion dans les cours des princiss Christians escribes four volumes out of six, which appear to contain as much as our eight volumes, to Marana, and conjectures that the last two are by another hand, but does not intimate the least surpre on of an English original. And as his authority is considerable, I must fortify my own opinion by what evidence I can find.

The preface to the second volume (English) of the Turkish Spy begans thus "Three years are now claused since the first volume of letters written by a Spy at Parer was published in English. And it was expected that a second should have come out long before this, The favourable reception which that found amongst all sorts of readers would have encouraged a speedy translation of the rest, had there been extant any French edition of more than the first part. But after the strictest inquiry none could be heard of, and, as for the Italian, our bookselvers have not that correspondence in those parts as they have in the more heighbouring combines of France and Horand So that it was a work de-sparred of to recover any more of this Arabian's memoria. We little decaused that the Florentines laid been so busy in printing and so successful in schang the continued translation of these Arabian eparties, tell it was the fortune of an English gentleman to travel in those parts last som ner, and discover the happy news. I will not forestal his letter, which is annexed to this preface. A pretended letter with the signature of

Daniel Saltmarsh follows, in which the imaginary author tells a strange tale of the manner on which a certain learned physician of Ferrara, Julio de Mediet. descended from the Medicean family, put these volumes, in the Ita an language, into his hands. This letter is dated Amsterdam, Sept. 9, 1690, and as the preface refers it to the last summer, I bence conclude that the first edition of the second volume of the Turkish Spy was in 1691, for I have not seen that, nor any other edition earlier than the fifth, printed in 170%

Marma is said by Salfi and others to have left France in 1689, having fallen into a depression of spirits. Now the first thirty letters, about one thirty-second part of the entire work, were published in 1684, and about an equal length in toxe. I admit that he had time to double them portions, and thus to publish one eighth of the whole, but nort likely that between 1686 and 1689 he could have given the rest to the world? If we are not struck by this, is it likely that the English translator should have fabricated the story above mentioned, when the public might know that there was actually a French original which he had rendered? The invention seems without motive. Again, how came the French edition of Italia to be an avowed translation from the English, when, according to the hypothesis of M. Harbier, the volumes of Marana and all been published in France? Surely, till these uppear, we have remon to suspect their existence, and the onne produced less now on the advocates of Marana a clasm, ner in which the volumes subsequent to the first had been procured by a traveller in the original Italian; no French edition, it is declared, being known to the booksellers. That no Italian edition ever existed, is, I apprehend, now generally admitted; and it is to be shown by those who contend for the claims of Marana to seven out of the eight volumes, that they were published in France before 1691 and the subsequent years, when they appeared in English. The Cologne or Rouen edition of 1696 follows the English so closely, that it has not given the original letters of the first volume, published with the name of Marana, but rendered them back from the translation.

60. In these early letters, I am ready to admit, the scheme of the Turkish Spy may be entirely traced. Marana appears not only to have planned the historical part of the letters, but to have struck out the more original and striking idea of a Mohammedan wavering with religious scruples, which the English continuator has followed up with more philosophy and erudition. The internal evidence for their English origin, in all the latter volumes, is to my apprehension exceedingly strong; but I know the difficulty of arguing from this to convince a reader. The proof we demand is the production of these volumes in French, that is, the specification of some public or private library where they may be seen, in any edition anterior to 1691, and nothing short of this can be satisfactory evidence.

• I shall now produce some direct copy of the Turkish Spy (edit. 1732) in evidence for the English authorship of the British Museum.

seven out of eight parts of the Turkish

Another MS note in the same vo-

Spy.

In the life of Mrs. Manley, published under the title of 'The Adventures of Rivella,' printed in 1714, in pages 14 and 15. it is aid. That her father. Sir Roger Manley, was the genuther of the first volume of the name author of the first volume of the Torkish Spy. Dr Midgley, an inge-nious physician, related to the family by timeringe, had the charge of looking over his papers, among which he found that manuscript, which he easily reserved to his proper use; and both by his own penand the assistance of some others contimuch the work until the eighth volume, the British Museura.

Another MS note in the same volume gives the following extract from Dunton's Lafe and Errors - " Mr. Bradshaw is the best accomplished backney writer I have met with; his genius was quite above the common size, and his style was incomparably fine . . . So soon as I saw the first volume of the Turkish Spy, the very style and manner of writing convinced me that Bradshaw was the author. . . . Brudshaw's wife owned that Dr. Medgley had engaged him in a work which would take him some years to finish, for which the Doctor was to pay him 40s, per theet... so that 'tis very probable (for I cannot awar I saw him write it) that Mr. Wilwithout ever having the justice to name awear I saw him write it) that Mr. Wil-the author of the first." MS, note in the liam Bradshaw was the author of the 61. It would not, perhaps, be unfair to bring within the pale of the seventeenth century an effusion of genius, sufficient to redeem our name in its annals of fiction. The Tale of a Tub, though not published till 1704, was chiefly written, as the author declares, eight years before; and the Battle of the Books subjoined to it has every appearance of recent animosity against the opponents of Temple and Boyle, in the question of Phalaris. The Tale of a Tub is, in my apprehension, the master-piece of Swift; certainly Rabelais has nothing superior, even in invention, nor any thing so condensed, so pointed, so full of real meaning, of biting satire, of felicitous analogy. The Battle of the Books is such an improvement of the similar combat in the Lutrin, that we can hardly own it is an imitation.

Turkish Spy; were it not for this discovery. Dr. Midgley had gone off with the honour of that performance." It thus appears that in England it was looked upon as an original work; though the authority of Dinton is not very good for the facts he tells, and that of Mrs. Manley much worse. But I do not quote them as evidence of such facts, but of common report. Mrs. Manley, who claims for her father the first volume, certainly written by Marana, must be set aside, as to Dr. Midgley and Mr. Bradshaw. I knownothing to confirm or refute what is here and

The hypothesis of these notes, that all the Turkish Spy, after the first of our eight solumes, is of English or, gan, has been controverted in the Gentleman's Magazine by persons of learning and scuteness. I would surrender my own opin.oo, if I could see sufficient grounds for doing so; but as yet Marana's pretensions are not substantiated by the evidence which I demanded, the proof of any edition in French anterior to that of our Turkish Spy, the second volume of which (there is no dispute about Marana's authorship of the first) appeared in 1691, with a preface denying the exishave had recourse to the arbitrary supposition that Marana communicated his manuscript to some English translator, who published it as his own, should be aware that a mere possibility, without a shadow of evidence, even if it served to explain the facts, cannot be received in historical criticism as truth. - 1842.]

CHAPTER VIII.

HISTORY OF PHYSICAL AND OTHER LITERATURE, FROM 1650 TO 1700.

SECT. I. - ON EXPERIMENTAL PHILOSOPHY.

Institutions for Science at Florence - London - Paris - Chemistry - Boyle and others,

- 1. WE have now arrived, according to the method pursued in corresponding periods, at the history of mathema-Messons for tical and physical science in the latter part of the seventeenth century. But I must here entreat my readers to excuse the omission of that which ought to occupy a prominent situation in any work that pretends to trace the general progress of human knowledge. The length to which I have found myself already compelled to extend these volumes, might be an adequate apology; but I have one more insuperable in the slightness of my own acquaintance with subjects so momentous and difficult, and upon which I could not write without presumptuousness and much peril of betraying ignorance. The names, therefore, of Wallis and Huygens, Newton and Leibnitz, must be passed with distant reverence.
- 2. This was the age, when the experimental philosophy, Academy det to which Bacon had held the torch, and which had already made considerable progress, especially in Italy, was finally established on the ruins of arbitrary figurents and partial inductions. This philosophy was signally indebted to three associations, the eldest of which did not endure long; but the others have remained to this day, the perennial fountains of science; the Academy del Cimento at Florence, the Royal Society of London, the Academy of Sciences at Paris. The first of these was established in 1657, with the patronage of the Grand Duke Ferdinand II., but under the peculiar care of his brother Leopold. Both were, in a manner at that time remarkable, attached to natural philosophy; and Leopold, less engaged in public affairs, had long carried on a correspondence with the learned of Europe. It is said that the advice of Viviani, one of the greatest geometers that Europe has produced, led to this institution. The name which this Academy assumed gave promise of their fundamental rule, the investigation of truth by experiment alone. The number of Academicians was unlimited, and all that was required as an article of faith was the abjuration of all faith, a resolution to inquire into truth without regard to any previous sect of philosophy. This Academy lasted unfortunately but ten years in vigour; it is a great misfortune for any literary institution to depend on one man, and especially on a prince, who, shedding a factitious, as well as sometimes a genuine lustre round it, is not easily replaced without a diminution of the world's regard. Leopold, in 1667, became a cardinal, and was thus withdrawn from Florence; others of the Academy del Cimento died or went away, and it rapidly sunk into insignificance. But a volume containing reports of the yearly experiments it made, among others the celebrated one proving, as was then supposed, the incompressibility of water, is generally esteemed.

3. The germ of our Royal Society may be traced to the year 1645, when Wallis, Wilkins, Glisson, and cothers less known, agreed to meet weekly at a private bouse in London, in order to converse on subjects connected with natural, and especially experimental philosophy. Some of these soon afterwards settled in Oxford; and thus arose two little societies in connexion with each other, those at Oxford being recruited by Ward, Petty, Willis, and Bathurst. They met at Petty's lodgings till be removed to Ireland in 1652; afterwards at those of Wilkins in Wadham College till be became Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1659; about which time most of the Oxford philosophers came to London, and held their meetings in Gresham College. They became more numerous after the Restoration, which gave better hope of a tranquillity indispensable for science; and, on the 28th of November, 1660, agreed to form a regular society which should meet weekly for the promotion of natural philosophy; their registers are kept from this time. The king, rather fond himself of these subjects, from the beginning afforded them his patronage; their first charter is dated 15th July, 1662, incorporating them by the style of the Royal Society, and appointing Lord Brouncker the first president, assisted by a council of twenty, the conspicuous names among which are Boyle, Kenelm Digby, Wilkins, Wren, Evelyn, and Oldenburg, t The last of these was secretary, and editor of the Philosophical Transactions, the first number of which appeared March 1. 1665. containing sixteen pages in quarto. These were continued monthly, or less frequently, according to the materials he possessed. Oldenburg ceased to be the editor in 1667, and was succeeded by Grew, as he was by Hooke. These early transactions are chiefly notes of conversations and remarks made at the meetings, as well as of experiments either then made or reported to the Society. ‡

Galluzzi, Storia del Gran Dunato, vol. vii. p. 240. Tiraboschi, zi. 204, Cornani, vii. 20.

4. The Academy of Sciences at Paris was established in 1666, under the auspices of Colbert. The king assigned to them a room in the royal library for their meetings. Those first selected were all mathematicians; but other departments of science, especially chemistry and anatomy, afterwards furnished associates of considerable name. It seems, nevertheless, that this Academy did not cultivate experimental philosophy with such unremitting zeal as the Royal Society, and that abstract mathematics have always borne a larger proportion to the rest of their inquiries. They published in this century ten volumes, known as Anciens Mémoires de l'Académie. But near its close, in 1697, they received a regular institution from the king, organising them in a manner analogous to the two other great literary fount Id. vol. ii. p. 18. Thomson's Hist. of Royal Society, p. 7.

Birch's Hist, of Royal Society, vol. 1 p. 1.

dations, the French Academy, and that of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres.

5. In several branches of physics, the experimental philosopher is both guided and corrected by the eternal and of laws of geometry. In others he wants this aid, and, Chemitry. in the words of his master, "knows and understands no more concerning the order of nature, than, as her servant and interpreter, he has been taught by observation and tentative processes." All that concerns the peculiar actions of bodies on each other was of this description; though, in our own times, even this has been in some degree brought under the omnipotent control of the modern analysis. Chemistry, or the science of the molecular constituents of bodies, manifested in such peculiar and reciprocal operations, had never been rescued from empirical hands till this period. The transmutation of metals, the universal medicine, and other inquiries utterly unphilosophical in themselves, because they assumed the existence of that which they sought to discover, had occupied the chemists so much that none of them had made any further progress than occasionally by some happy combination or analysis, to contribute an useful preparation to pharmacy, or to detect an unknown substance. Glauber and Van Helmont were the most active and ingenious of these elder chemists; but the former has only been remembered by having long given his name to sulphate of soda, while the latter wasted his time on experiments from which he knew not how to draw right inferences, and his powers on hypotheses which a sounder spirit of the inductive philosophy would have taught him to reject.†

6. Chemistry, as a science of principles, hypothetical, no doubt, and in a great measure unfounded, but cohering in a plausible system, and better than the reveries of the Paracelsists and Behmenists, was founded by Becker in Germany, by Boyle and his contemporaries of the Royal Society in England. Becker, a native of Spire, who, after wandering from one city of Germany to another, died in London, in 1685, by his Physica Subterranea, published in Fontenelle, vol. v. p 23. Montus † Thomson's Hist. of Chemistry, els. Hist. des Mathématiques, vol. ii. i 183.

 p. 557.

1669, laid the foundation of a theory, which having in the next century been perfected by Stahl, became the creed of philosophy till nearly the end of the last century. "Becker's theory," says an English writer, "stripped of every thing but the naked statement, may be expressed in the following sentence: besides water and air, there are three other substances, called earths, which enter into the composition of bodies; namely, the fusible or vitrifiable earth, the inflammable or sulphureous, and the mercurial. By the intimate combination of earths with water is formed an universal acid, from which proceed all other acid bodies; stones are produced by the combination of certain earths, metals by the combination of all the three earths in proportions which vary according to the metal."

7. No one Englishman of the seventeenth century, after Lord Bacon, raised to himself so high a reputation in experimental philosophy as Robert Boyle; it has even been remarked, that he was born in the year of Bacon's death, as the person destined by nature to succeed him. An eulogy which would be extravagant, if it implied any parallel between the genius of the two; but hardly so, if we look on Boyle as the most faithful, the most patient, the most successful disciple who carried forward the experimental philosophy of Bacon. His works occupy six large volumes in quarto. They may be divided into theological or metaphysical and physical or experimental. Of the former, we may mention as the most philosophical, his Disquisition into the Final Causes of Natural Things, his Free Inquiry into the received Notion of Nature, his Discourse of Things above Reason, his Considerations about the Reconcileableness of Reason and Religion, his Excellency of Theology, and his Considerations on the Style of the Scriptures; but the latter, his chemical and experimental writings, form more than two thirds of his prolix works.

8. The metaphysical treatises, to use that word in a large sense, of Boyle, or rather those concerning Natural Theology, are very perspicuous, very free from system, and such as bespeak an independent lover of truth. His Disquisition on Final Causes was a well-timed vindication of that palmary argument against the paradox of the Cartesians, who had denied the validity of an inference from the manifest adaptation of means to ends in the universe to an intelligent Providence. Boyle takes a more philosophical view of the principle of final causes than had been found in many theologians, who weakened the argument itself by the presumptuous hypothesis, that man was the sole object of Providence in the creation. His greater knowledge of physiology led him to perceive that there are both animal, and what he calls cosmical ends, in which man has no concern.

^{*} Thomson's Hist, of Royal Society, p. 468.

9. The following passage is so favourable a specimen of the philosophical spirit of Boyle, and so good an illustration of the theory of idols in the Novum from one of them. Organum, that, although it might better, perhaps, have deserved a place in a former chapter, I will not refrain from inserting it : - "I know not," he says, in his Free Inquiry into the received Notion of Nature, "whether it be a prerogative in the human mind, that as it is itself a true and positive being, so is it apt to conceive all other things as true and positive beings also; but whether or no this propensity to frame such kind of ideas supposes an excellency, I fear it occasions mistakes, and makes us think and speak after the manner of true and positive beings, of such things as are but chimerical, and some of them negations or privations themselves; as death, ignorance, blindness, and the like. It concerns us therefore to stand very carefully upon our guard, that we be not insensibly misled by such an inuate and unheeded temptation to error, as we bring into the world with us." +

10. Boyle improved the air-pump and the thermometer, though the latter was first made an accurate instrument of investigation by Newton. He also discowered the law of the air's elasticity, namely, that its try bulk is inversely as the pressure upon it. For some of the principles of hydrostatics we are indebted to him, though he did not possess much mathematical knowledge. The Philosophical Transactions contain several valuable papers by him on this science. By his "Sceptical Chemist," published in 1661, he did much to overturn the theories of Van Helmont's school, that commonly called of the iatro-chemists, which was in its highest reputation; raising doubts as to the existence not only of the four elements of the peripatetics, but of those which these chemists had substituted. Boyle holds the elements of bodies to be atoms of different shapes and sizes, the union of which gives origin to what are vulgarly called elements.† It is unnecessary to remark that this is the prevailing theory of the present age.

[·] Boyle's Works, vol. v. p. 394.

11. I shall borrow the general character of Boyle and of his contemporaries in English chemistry from a modern author of credit. "Perhaps Mr. Boyle may be considered as the first person neither connected with pharmacy nor mining, who devoted a considerable degree of attention to chemical pursuits. Mr. Boyle, though in common with the literary men of his age he may be accused of credulity, was both very laborious and intelligent; and his chemical pursuits which were various and extensive, and intended solely to develop the truth without any regard to previously conceived opinions, contributed essentially to set chemistry free from the trammels of absurdity and superstition, in which it had been hitherto enveloped, and to recommend it to philosophers as a science deserving to be studied on account of the important information which it was qualified to convey. His refutation of the alchemistical opinions respecting the constituents of bodies, his observations on cold, on the air, on phosphorus, and on ether, deserve particularly to be mentioned as doing him much honour. We have no regular account of any one substance or of any class of bodies in Mr. Boyle, similar to those which at present are considered as belonging exclusively to the science of chemistry. Neither did he attempt to systematise the phenomena, nor to subject them to any hypothetical explanation.

12. "But his contemporary Dr. Hooke, who had a paror Hooke ticular predilection for hypothesis, sketched in his and others. Micrographia a very beautiful theoretical explanation of combustion, and promised to develop his doctrine more fully in a subsequent book; a promise which he never fulfilled; though in his Lampas, published about twenty years afterwards, he has given a very beautiful explanation of the way in which a candle burns. Mayow, in his Essays, published at Oxford about ten years after the Micrographia, embraced the hypothesis of Dr. Hooke without acknowledgment; but clogged it with so many absurd additions of his own as greatly to obscure its lustre and diminish its beauty. Mayow's first and principal Essay contains some happy experiments on respiration and air, and some fortunate conjectures respecting the combustion of the metals; but the most valuable part of the whole is the chapter on affinities; in which he appears to have gone much farther than any other chemist of his day, and to have anticipated some of the best established doctrines of his successors. Sir Isaac Newton, to whom all the sciences lie under such great obligations, made two most important contributions to chemistry, which constitute as it were the foundation-stones of its two great divisions. The first was pointing out a method of graduating thermometers, so as to be comparable with each other in whatever part of the world observations with them are made. The second was by pointing out the nature of chemical affinity, and showing that it consisted in an attraction by which the constituents of bodies were drawn towards each other and united; thus destroying the previous hypothesis of the hooks, and points, and rings, and wedges, by means of which the different constituents of bodies were conceived to be kept together." .

[•] Thomson's Hist, of Royal Society, † Thomson's Hist, of Chemistry, pp. 400, 411.

13. Lemery, a druggist at Paris, by his Cours de Chymie in 1675, is said to have changed the face of the science; the change nevertheless seems to have gone no deeper. "Lemery," says Fontenelle, "was the first who dispersed the real or pretended obscurities of chemistry, who brought it to clearer and more simple notions, who abolished the gross barbarisms of its language, who promised nothing but what he knew the art could perform; and to this he owed the success of his book. It shows not only a sound understanding, but some greatness of soul, to strip one's own science of a false pomp." • But we do not find that Lemery had any novel views in chemistry, or that he claims with any irresistible pretension the title of a philosopher. In fact, his chemistry seems to have been little more than pharmacy.

Thomson's Hist. of Royal Society, p. 466.

SECT. II. - ON NATURAL HISTORY.

Zoology - Ray - Botanical Classifications - Grew - Geological Theories.

14. THE accumulation of particular knowledge in Natural History must always be progressive, where any regard is paid to the subject; every traveller in remote countries, every mariner may contribute some observation, correct some error, or bring home some new species. Thus zoology had made a regular advance from the days of Conrad Gesner; yet with so tardy a step, that, reflecting on the extensive intercourse of Europe with the Eastern and Western world, we may be surprised to find, how little Jopston, in the middle of the seventeenth century, had added, even in the most obvious class, that of quadrupeds, to the knowledge collected one hundred years before. But hitherto zoology, confined to mere description, and that often careless or indefinite, unenlightened by anatomy, unregulated by method, had not merited the name of a science. That name it owes to John Ray.

15. Ray first appeared in Natural History as the editor of the Ornithology of his highly accomplished friend Francis Willoughby, with whom he had travelled over the Continent. This was published in 1676; and the History of Fishes followed in 1686. The descriptions are ascribed to Willoughby, the arrangement to Ray, who might have considered the two works as in great part his own, though he has not interfered with the glory of his deceased friend. Cuvier observes, that the History of Fishes is the more perfect work of the two, that many species are described which will not be found in earlier ichthyologists, and that those of the Mediterranean especially are given with great precision.*

[.] Eloge de Lemery, in Œuvres de Fontenelle, v. 361. Biog. Universelle.

16. Among the original works of Ray we may select the Synopsis Methodica Animalium Quadrupedum et Ha Sy. Serpentini Generis, published in 1693. This book open of pustry. makes an epoch in zoology, not for the additions of pros. new species it contains, since there are few wholly such, but as the first classification of animals that can be reckoned both general and grounded in nature. He divides them into those with blood and without blood. The former are such as breathe through lungs, and such as breathe through gills. Of the former of these some have a heart with two ventricles, some have one only. And among the former class of these some are viviparous, some oviparous. We thus come to the proper distinction of Mammalia. But in compliance with vulgar prejudice, Ray did not include the cetacea in the same class with quadrupeds, though well aware that they properly belonged to it, and left them as an order of fishes. † Quadrupeds he was the first to divide into ungulate and unguiculate, hoofed and clawed, having himself invented the Latin words. 1 The former are solidipeda, bisulca, or quadrisulca; the latter are bifida or multifida; and these latter with undivided, or with partially divided toes; which latter again may have broad claws, as monkeys, or narrow claws; and these with narrow claws be arranges according their teeth, as either carnicora, or leporina, now generaly called rodentia. Besides all these quadrupeds which he calls analoga, he has a general division called anomala, for those without teeth, or with such peculiar arrangements of teeth, as we find in the insectivorous genera, the hedgehog and mole.§

17. Ray was the first zoologist who made use of comparative anatomy; he inserts at length every account Merits of the of dissections that he could find; several had been work.

^{*} Biographie Universelle, art. Ray

⁴ Nos ne a commun hominum opinione nums recolamus, et ut affectost novitatis notam evitemus, cetaceum aquatilium genus, quamvis cum quadrupe-dibus viviparis in orombus fero procterquam in pais et pedabus et elemento in quo degunt consezure sadeantur, pascibus annumerabimus, p. 35.

P 50. $ P. 56

made at Paris. He does not appear to be very anxious about describing every species; thus in the simian family be omits several well known." I cannot exactly determine what quadrupeds he has inserted that do not appear in the earlier zoologists; according to Linnseus, in the twelfth edition of the Systema Nature, if I have counted rightly, they amount to thirty-two; but I have found him very careless in specifying the synonyms of his predecessors, and many for which he only quotes Ray, are in Gesner or Jonston. Ray has however much the advantage over these in the brevity and closeness of his specific characters. "The particular distinction of his labours," says Cuvier, "consists in an arrangement more clear, more determinate than those of any of his predecessors, and applied with more consistency and precision, His distribution of the classes of quadrupeds and birds have been followed by the English naturalists almost to our own days; and we find manifest traces of that he has adopted as to the latter class in Linneaus, in Brisson, in Buffon, and in all other ornithologists." †

18. The bloodless animals, and even those of cold blood, with the exception of fishes, had occupied but little attention of any good zoologists till after the middle of the century. They were now studied with considerable success. Redi, established as a physician at Florence, had yet time for that various literature which has immortalised his name. He opposed, and in a great degree disproved by experiment, the prevailing doctrine of the equivocal generation of insects, or that from corruption; though where he was unable to show the means of reproduction, he had recourse to a paradoxical hypothesis of his own. Redi also enlarged our knowledge of intestinal animals, and made some good experiments on the poison of vipers. 1 Malpighi, who combated, like Redi, the theory of the reproduction of organised bodies from mere corruption, has given one of the most torum tum cauda carentium species valde He only describes those species he has found in Classus or Maregrave, and what he calls Paranenses, such, I presume, as [.] Hoc genus animalium tum canda- he had found in the Memoirs of the Académie des Sciences. But he does mimerous aint, non-tamen molts aprid not mention the Semin Indus, or the S. authores fide dignos descriptive occurrent. Hamadryas, and several others of the most known species.

[†] Biogr Univ. Tiraboschi, ni. 252.

complete treatises on the silkworm that we possess. Swammerdam, a Dutch naturalist, abandoned his pursuits in human anatomy to follow up that of insects, and days by his skill and patience in dissection made numerous discoveries in their structure. His General History of Insects, 1669, contains a distribution into four classes, founded on their bodily forms and the metamorphoses they undergo. A posthumous work, Biblia Naturae, not published till 1788. contains, says the Biographie Universelle, "a multitude of facts wholly unknown before Swammerdam; it is impossible to carry farther the anatomy of these little animals, or to be thore exact in the description of their organs."

19. Lister, an English physician, may be reckoned one of those who have done most to found the science of conchology by his Historia sive Synopsis Conchyliorum, in 1685; a work very copious and full of accurate delineations; and also by his three treatises on English animals, two of which relate to fluviatile and marine shells, The third, which is on spiders, is not less esteemed in entomology. Lister was also perhaps the first to distinguish the specific characters, such at least as are now reckoned specific, though probably not in his time, of the Asiatic and African elephant. "His works in natural history and comparative anatomy are justly esteemed, because he has shown himself an exact and sagacious observer, and has pointed out with correctness the natural relations of the animals that he describes." t

20. The beautiful science which bears the improper name of comparative anatomy had but casually occupied Comparative the attention of the medical profession. It was to autiony. them, rather than to mere zoologists, that it owed, and indeed strictly must always owe, its discoveries, which had hitherto been very few. It was now more cultivated; and the relations of structure to the capacities of animal life bet It is most probable that this term was originally designed to express a commean one between different species of the protesting against its propriety. latter. In the first sense it is never now used, and the second is but a part, though an important one, of the science, Zootomy has been suggested as a better name, but it is not quite snalogical to parison between the human structure and anatomy, and on the whole it seems as that of brutes, though it might also . if we must remain with the old word, came more striking, as their varieties were more fully understood; the grand theories of final causes found their most convincing arguments. In this period, I believe, comparative anatomy made an important progress, which in the earlier part of the eighteenth century was by no means equally rapid. France took the lead in these researches. "The number of papers on comparative anatomy," says Dr. Thomson, "is greater in the memoirs of the French Academy than in our national publication. This was owing to the pains taken during the reign of Louis XIV. to furnish the Academy with proper animals, and the number of auatomists who received a salary, and of course devoted themselves to anatomical subjects." There are however about twenty papers in the Philosophical Transactions before 1700 on this subject."

^{*} Biogr. Univ. Tiraboschi, zi. 252. † Biogr. Univ. Chalmers.

21. Botany, notwithstanding the gleams of philosophical light which occasionally illustrate the writings of Carsalpin and Columna, had seldom gone farther than to name, to describe, and to delineate plants with a greater or less accuracy and copiousness. Yet it long had the advantage over zoology, and now, when the latter made a considerable step in advance, it still continued to keep ahead. This is a period of great importance in botanical science. Jungius of Hamburgh, whose posthumous Isagoge Phytoscopica was published in 1679, is said to have been the first in the seventeenth century who led the way to a better classification than that of Lobel; and Sprengel thinks that the English botanists were not unacquainted with his writings; Ray indeed owns his obligations to them.

22. But the founder of classification, in the eyes of the world, was Robert Morison, of Aberdeen, professor of botany at Oxford; who, by his Hortus Blesensis, in 1669; by his Plantarum Umbelliferarum Distributio Nova, in 1672; and chiefly by his great work, Historia Plantarum Universalis, in 1678, laid the basis of a systematic classification, which he partly founded, not on trivial distinctions of appearance, as the older botanists, but, as Caecalpin had first done, on the fructifying organs. He has been frequently charged with plagrarism from that great Italian, who seems to have suffered, as others have done, by failing to carry forward his own luminous conceptions into such details of proof as the world justly demands; another instance of which has been seen in his very striking passages on the circulation of Sprengel, however, who praises Morison highly, does not impute to him this injustice towards Casalpin, whose writings might possibly he unknown in Britain. And it might be observed also, that Morison did not, as has sometimes been alleged, establish the fruit as the sole basis of his arrangement. Out of fifteen classes, into which he distributes all herbaceous plants, but seven are characterised by this distinction. † "The examination of Morison's works," says a late biographer, " will enable us to judge of the service he rendered in the reformation of botany. The great botanists, from Gesner to the Bauhins, had published works, more or less useful by their discoveries, their observations, their descriptions, or their figures. Gesner had made a great step in considering the fruit as the principal distinction of genera. Fabius Columna adopted this view; Casalpin applied it to a classification which should be regarded as better than any that preceded the epoch of which we speak. Morison had made a particular study of fruits, having collected 1500 different species of them, though he did not neglect the importance of the natural affinities of other parts. He dwells on this leading idea, insists on the necessity of establishing generic characters, and has founded his chief works on this basis. He has therefore done real service to the science; nor should the vanity which has made him conceal his obligations to Caesalpin induce us to refuse him justice." 1 Morison speaks of his own theory with excessive vanity, and depreciates all earlier botanists as full of confusion. English writers have been unfavourable to Morison, out of partiality to Ray, with whom he was on had terms; but Tournefort declares that if he had not enlightened botany, it would still have been in darkness.

Thomson's Hist. of Royal Society, f Sprengel, Hist. Rei Herbarins, p. 114.

23. Ray, in his Methodus Plantarum Nova, 1682, and in his Historia Plantarum Universalis, in three volumes, the first published in 1686, the second in 1688, and the third, which is supplemental, in 1704, trod in the steps of Morison, but with more acknowledgment of what was due to others, and with some improvements of his own. He described 6900 plants, many of which are now considered as varieties. In the botanical works of Ray we find the natural families of plants better defined, the difference of complete and incomplete flowers more precise, and the grand division of monocotyledons and dicotyledons fully established. He gave much precision to the characteristics of many classes, and introduced several technical terms, very useful for the perspicuity of botanical language; finally, he established many general principles of arrangement which have since been adopted. † Ray's method of classification was principally by the fruit, though he admits its imperfections. " In fact, his method," says Pulteney, " though he assumes the fruit as the foundation, is an elaborate attempt, for that time, to fix natural classes," ‡

[·] Sprengel, p. 34.

Pultimer, Hot rical Progress of Botany in E. gland, vol. 1. p. 907.
 Biogr. Universallo.

24. Rivinus, in his Introductio in Rem Herbariam, Leipsic, 1690, a very short performance, struck into a new path, which has modified to a great degree the systems of later botanists. Cæsalpin and Morison had looked mainly to the fruit as the basis of classification; Rivinus added the flower, and laid down as a fundamental rule that all plants which resemble each other both in the flower and in the fruit ought to bear the same generic name. § In some pages of this Introduction we certainly find the basis of the Critica Botanica of Linnieus. | Rivinus thinks the arrangement of Clesalpin the best, and that Morison has only spoiled what he took; of Ray he speaks in terms of eulogy, but blames some part of his method. His own is primarily founded on the flower, and thus he forms eighteen classes, which, by considering the differences of the fruits, he subdivides into ninety-one genera. The specific distinctions he founded on the general habit and appearance of the plant. His method is more thoroughly artificial, as opposed to natural; that is, more established on a single principle, which often brings heterogeneous plants and families together, than that of any of his predecessors; for even Ray had kept the distinction of trees from shrubs and herbs, conceiving it to be founded in their natural fructification. Rivinus set aside wholly this leading division. Yet he had not been able to reduce all plants to his method, and admitted several anomalous divisions.

[&]quot; Pultency. The account of Ray's life and hotanical writings in this work occupies nearly 100 pages, † Biogr. Universelle.

¹ P. 259. 9 Bloge, Universelle.

25. The merit of establishing an uniform and consistent system was reserved for Tournefort. His Elémens Tournefort, de la Botanique appeared in 1694; the Latin translation, Institutiones Rei Herbariae, in 1700. Tournefort, like Rivinus, took the flower or corolla, as the basis of his system; and the varieties in the structure, rather than number, of the petals furnish him with his classes. The genera for like other botanists before Linuaus he has no intermediate division - are established by the flower and fruit conjointly, or now and then by less essential differences, for he held it better to constitute new genera than, as others had done, to have anomalous species. The accessory parts of a plant are allowed to supply specific distinctions. But Tournefort divides vegetables, according to old prejudice—which it is surprising that, after the precedent of Rivinus to the contrary, he should have regarded - into herbs and trees; and thus he has twenty-two classes. Simple flowers, monopetalous or polypetalous, form eleven of these; composite flowers, three; the apetalous, one; the cryptogamous, or those without flower or fruit, make another class; shrubs or suffrutices are placed in the seventeenth; and trees, in five more, are similarly distributed, according to their floral characters. † Sprengel extols much of the system of Tournefort, though he disapproves of the selection of a part so often wanting as the corolla for the sole basis; nor can its various forms be comprised in Tournefort's classes. His orders are well marked, according to the same author; but he multiplied both his genera and species too much, and paid too little attention to the stamina. His method was less repugnant to natural affinities and more convenient in practice than any which had come since Lobel. Most of Tournefort's generic distinctions were preserved by Linneus, and some which had been abrogated without sufficient reason have since been restored. Ray opposed the system of Tournefort, but some have thought that in his later works he came nearer to it, so as to be called magis corollista quam fructista,† This, however, is not acknowledged by Pulteney, who has paid great attention to Ray's writings.

Biogr. Unit. Sprengel, p. 46.

Biogr. Unit. Thomson's Hist of Royal Society, p. 34. Sprengel, p. 64.

26. The classification and description of plants constitute what generally is called botany. But these began now to be studied in connexion with the anatomy and physiology of the vegetable world; terms not merely analogical, because as strictly applicable as to animals, but which had never been employed before the middle of the seventeenth century. This interesting science is almost wholly due to two men, Grew and Malpiglii. Grew first directed his thoughts towards the anatomy of plants in 1664, in consequence of reading several books of animal anatomy, which suggested to him that plants, being the works of the same Author, would probably show similar contrivances. Some had introduced observations of this nature, as Highmore, Sharrock, and Hooke, but only collaterally; so that the systematic treatment of the subject, following the plant from the seed, was left quite open for himself. In 1070, he presented the first book of his work to the Royal Society, who next year ordered it to be printed. It was laid before the society in print, December, 1671; and on the same day a manuscript by Malpighi on the same subject was read. They went on from this time with equal steps; Malpighi, however, having caused Grew's book to be translated for his own use. Grew speaks very honourably of Malpighi, and without claiming more than the statement of facts permits him.

27. The first book of his Anatomy of Plants, which is the title given to three separate works, when published Illi tascollectively in 1682, contains the whole of his physiological theory, which is developed at length in those that follow. The nature of vegetation and its processes

Bagr Caironelle.

Sprengel cith Grew's book opps alonehate o et immertale.

Pultency. Chalmers. Biogr. Univ.

subject.

seem to have been unknown when he began; save that common observation and the more accurate experience of gardeners and others must have collected the obvious truths of vegetable anatomy. He does not quote Clesalpin, and may have been unacquainted with his writings. No man perhaps who created a science has carried it farther than Grew; he is so close and diligent in his observations, making use of the microscope, that comparatively few discoveries of great importance have been made in the mere anatomy of plants since his time "; though some of his opinions are latterly disputed by Mirbel and others of a new botanical school,

28. The great discovery ascribed to Grew is of the sexual system in plants. He speaks thus of what he calls the discrete the speaks thus of what he calls the discrete terms; the attire, though rather, I think, in obscure terms: " -" The primary and chief use of the attire is such as bath respect to the plant itself, and so appears to be very great and necessary. Because even those plants which have no flower or foliature, are yet some way or other attired, either with the seminiform or the floral attire. So that it seems to perform its service to the seeds as the foliature to the fruit. In discourse hereof with our learned Savilian professor Sir Thomas Millington, he told me he conceived that the attire doth serve, as the male, for the generation of the seed. I immediately replied that I was of the same opinion, and gave him some reasons for it, and answered some objections which might oppose them. But withal, in regard every plant is approshing, or male and female, that I was also of opinion that it serveth for the separation of some parts as well as the affusion of others."† He proceeds to explain his notion of vegetable impregnation. It is singular that he

29. Ray admitted Grew's opinion cautiously at first: Nos ut verisimilem tautum admittimus. But in his Sylloge Strpium, 1691, he fully accedes to it. The real Constitution establishment of the sexual theory, however, is due should suppose all plants to be bermaphrodite, and this shows he could not have recollected what had long been known as to the palm, or the passages in Casalpin relative to the Hough La verselle.

 Book is, cb. 1. He had hinted at lattic," in book is ch. 5.

to Camerarius, professor of botany at Tubingen, whose letter on that subject, published 1694, in the work of another, did much to spread the theory over Europe. experiments, indeed, were necessary to confirm what Grew had rather hazarded as a conjecture than brought to a test; and he showed that flowers deprived of their stamina do not produce seeds capable of continuing the species. * Woodward, in the Philosophical Transactions, illustrated the nutrition of plants, by putting sprigs of vegetables in phials filled with water, and after some time determining the weight they had gained and the quantity they had imbibed. † These experiments had been made by Van Helmont, who had inferred from them that water is convertible into solid matter. 1

30. It is just to observe that some had preceded Grew in Protesson vegetable physiology. Aromatari, in a letter of only four pages, published at Venice in 1625, on the generation of plants from seeds, which was reprinted in the Philosophical Transactions, showed the analogy between grains and eggs, each containing a minute organised embryo, which employs the substances enclosing it for its own development. Aromatari has also understood the use of the cotyledons. & Brown, in his Inquiry into Vulgar Errors, has remarks on the budding of plants, and on the quinary number which they affect in their flower. Kenelm Digby, according to Sprengel, first explained the necessity in vegetation for oxygen, or vital air, which had lately been discovered by Bathurst, | Hooke carried the discoveries hitherto made in vegetable anatomy much farther in his Micrographia. Sharrock and Lister contributed some knowledge, but they were rather later than Grew. None of these deserve such a place as Malpighi, who, says Sprengel, was not inferior to Grew in acuteness, though, probably, through some illusions of prejudice, he has not so well under-

[·] Sprengel, Biogr. Univ. Pultency, p. 358.

[†] Thomson's Hist, of Royal Society,

[!] Thomson's Hist, of Chemistry

⁵ Sprengel, Bloge Univ Sprengel, ni. 176. [It will be understood that the name oxygen, though Springel uses it, is modern, and also that this gas is properly said to have been discovered in 1776 by Priestley, who exhibited it in a separate state. -1842.]

stood and explained many things. But the structure and growth of seeds he has explained better, and Grew seems to have followed him. His book is also better arranged and more concise.* The Dutch did much to enlarge botanical science. The Hortus Indicus Malabaricus of Rheede, who had been a governor in India, was published at his own expense in twelve volumes, the first appearing in 1686; it contains an immense number of new plants. † The Herbarium Amboineuse of Rumphius was collected in the seventeenth century, though not published till 1741. $\frac{1}{2}$ Several botanical gardens were formed in different countries; among others that of Chelsea was opened in 1686,§

31. It was impossible that men of inquiring tempers should not have been led to reflect on those remarkable phenomena of the earth's visible structure, which being in course of time accurately registered and arranged, have become the basis of that noble science, the boast of our age, geology. The first thing which must strike the eyes of the merest clown, and set the philosopher thinking, is the irregularity of the surface of our globe; the more this is observed, the more signs of violent disruption. and of a prior state of comparative uniformity, appear. Some, indeed, of whom Ray seems to have been one it, were so much impressed by the theory of final causes that, perceiving the fitness of the present carth for its inhabitants, they thought it might have been created in such a state of physical ruin. But the contrary inference is almost irresistible. A still more forcible argument for great revolutions in the history of the earth is drawn from a second phenomenon of very general occurrence, the marine and other fossil relies of organised beings, which are dug up in strata far remote from the places where these bodies could now exist. It was common to account for them by the Mosaic deluge. But the depth at which they are found was incompatible with this hypothesis. Others fancied them to be not really organised, but sports of nature, as they were called, the casual resemblances of shells and fishes in stone. The Italians took the lead in speculating on these problems; but they could only arrive now and then at a bappier conjecture than usual, and do not seem to have planned any scheme of explaining the general structure of the earth. The Mundus Subterraneus of Athanasius Kircher, famous for the variety and originality of his erudition, contains probably the geology of his age, or at least his own. It was published in 1602. Ten out of twelve books relate to the surface or the interior of the earth, and to various terrene productions; the remaining two to alchemy and other arts connected with mineralogy. Kircher seems to have collected a great deal of geographical and geological knowledge. In England, the spirit of observation was so strong after the establishment of the Royal Society, that the Philosophical Transactions, in this period, contain a considerable number of geognostic papers, and the genius of theory was aroused, though not at lirst in his happiest mood. 32. Thomas Burnet, master of the Charterhouse, a man fearless and somewhat rash, with more imagination than philosophy, but ingenious and eloquent, pubhshed in 1694 his Theoria Telluris Sacra, which he afterwards translated into English. The primary question for the early geologists had always been how to reconcile the phenomena with which they were acquainted to the Mosaic parratives of the creation and deluge. Every one was satisfied that his own theory was the best; but in every case it has hitherto proved, whatever may take place in future, that the proposed scheme has neither kept to the letter of Scripture nor to the legitimate deductions of philosophy. Burnet gives the reins to his imagination more than any other writer on that which, if not argued upon by inductive reasoning, must be the dream of one man, little better in reality, though it may be more amusing, than the dream of another. He seems to be eminently ignorant of geological facts, and has hardly ever recourse to them as evidence. And accordingly, though his book drew some attention as an ingenious romance, it does not appear that he made a single disciple. Wiston opposed Burnet's theory, but with one not less un-Other gen. founded, nor with less ignorance of all that required to be known. Hooke, Lister, Ray, and Woodward came to the subject with more philosophical minds, and with a better insight into the real phenomena. Hooke seems to have displayed his usual sagacity in conjecture; he saw that the common theory of explaining marine fossils by the Mosaic deluge would not suffice, and perceived that, at some time or other, a part of the earth's crust must have been elevated and another part depressed by some subterraneous power. Lister was aware of the continuity of certain strata over large districts, and proposed the construction of geological maps. Woodward had a still more extensive knowledge of stratified rocks; he was in a manner the founder of scientific mineralogy in England, but his geological theory was not less chimerical than those of his contemporaries. It was first published in the Philosophical Transactions for 1695.†

^{*} Sprengel, p 15.

† B ogr Ums. The date of the first volume is given erroneously in the B. U. gical Discourses on the Creation, Deluge. and final Conflagration, 1692.

+ Thomson's Hist, of Royal Society

Lvell's Principles of Geology, vol. i, p. 27.

38. The Protogea of Leibnitz appears, in felicity of conjecture and minute attention to facts, far above any protection of these. But this short tract was only published in 1749, and on reading it, I have found an intimation that it was not written within the seventeenth century. Yet I caunot refrain from mentioning that his hypothesis supposes the gradual cooling of the earth from igneous fusion; the formation of a vast body of water to cover the surface, a part of his theory but ill established, and apparently the weakest of the whole; the subsidence of the lower parts of the earth, which he takes to have been once on the level of the highest mountains, by the breaking in of vaulted caverns within its bosom 1; the deposition of sedimentary strata from inundations, their induration, and the subsequent covering of these by other strata through fresh inundations; with many other notions which have been gradually matured and rectified in the process of the science, \ No one can read the Protogea incredibili riolentia tam alte ascendisse.

[·] Lacil, p. 31.

[†] Thomson, p. 207. † Seet. 21. He admits also a partial elevation by intumescence, but says, ut vistavinie Alpes ex solida Jam terra eruptione surer ser at, unnus comenta-neum puto. Semus taman et in illis deprehendi reliquias mans, Cum ergo alteratrum factum oportest, cred bileas cum reconcrescerent ex solutione aqua-

[§] Facies teneri adbue orbis sepius nosma est, de nec quiescintibus causis atque me l'bratis cons stentior emergeret status return. Unde jain doplex origo intelligitur firmorum corporum; imm com ignis fusione refrigescerent, altera multo arbitror dellux see aquas spontineo rum. Neque geter patendem est lepeles num, quam ingentem terrarum partem ex rols sue fumose. Id enum nettou-uwenhock in 1690, by means of their microscopes, rated the circulation of the blood in the smaller vessels, dered visible the anastomoses of the arteries and veins. nch the theory depended. From this time it seems been out of doubt. Pecquet's discovery of the thoet, or rather of its uses, as a reservoir of the chyle nich the blood is elaborated, for the canal itself had own to Eustachius, stands next to that of Harvey, and have thrown less light on physiology without it, his, was perseveringly opposed.

Vilhs, a physician at Oxford, is called by Portal, who mankind inferior to anatomists, one of the want geniuses that ever lived; his bold systems n him a distinguished place among physiologers.1 omy of the Brain, in which, however, as in his cs, he was much assisted by an intimate friend, and of the first character, Lower, is, according to the r, a master-piece of imagination and labour. He discoveries in the structure of the brain, and has gryes from it far better than his predecessors, who al very obscure ideas of their course. Sprengel llis is the first who has assigned a peculiar mento each of the different parts of the brain; forseems, that this hypothesis, the basis of modern ad been generally received, as I understand his on the sixteenth century. § Vicussens of Monto the discoveries in the anatomy of the nerves phin Universalis, 1684; tracing those arising marrow which Willis had not done, and fole ramifications of those that are spread over > was the first who employed gow and thus revealed the secrets, the world, which Leguwendo osing still better instrumen To Malpight anaton the structure of the lan without perceiving that of all the early geologists, or indeed of all down to a time not very remote, Leibnitz came nearest to the theories which are most received in the English school at this day. It is evident that if the literal interpretation of Genesis, by a period of six natural days, had not restrained him, he would have gone much farther in his views of the progressive revolutions of the earth. Leibnitz had made very minute inquiries, for his age, into fossil species, and was aware of the main facts which form the basis of modern geology. †

> > 1 Portal, sol (1 2 - 1) 22 U 1 Portal, m. 122

SECT. III. - ON ANATOMY AND MEDICINE.

34. Portal begins the history of this period, which occupies more than 800 pages of his voluminous work, by announcing it as the epoch most favourable to anatomy; in less than fifty years the science put on a new countenance; nature is interrogated, every part of the body is examined with an observing spirit; the mutual intercourse of nations diffuses the light on every side; a number of great men appear, whose genius and industry excite our admiration. 1 But for this very reason I must, in these concluding pages, glide over a subject rather foreign to my own studies and to those of the generality of my readers with a very brief enumeration of names.

35. The Harveian theory gained ground, though obstinate prejudice gave way but slowly. It was confirmed by the experiment of transfusing blood, tried on dogs, at the instance of Sir Christopher Wren, in 1657, and repeated by Lower in 1661. § Malpighi in 1661.

mum de prima tantum massa ex terrabasi accipio; Nec dabito, possea materiam liquidam in superficae telluris procurrentem, quiete mox redolta, ex ramentis subactis ingentem materiae simdepositisse, quorum alia sarias terra specues formacunt, alia in saxa indurucce, e qualius itexta diversa acha super imposita diversas praecipitationism vicea atque intersalla testastur. Sect. 4.

This he can't the incomaints of the world, and the lasts of a new serence, which might be denominated "naturalis geographic." But woody with, beet companies restricted and in present face forum, tamen rectus omnos definition posters, ohi cornos as to proceedist, at per regiones presented soli genera et strata discribert. Sect. 5.

* See seet, 21, et rich.

† Seet 31 et usque ad finem libei | Hint, de l'Anatomie, vol in p. 1.

5 Speciagel, Hist. de la Médecine, vol. iv. p. 120.

and Leeuwenhoek in 1690, by means of their microscopes, demonstrated the circulation of the blood in the smaller vessels, and rendered visible the anastomoses of the arteries and veins. upon which the theory depended.* From this time it seems to have been out of doubt. Pecquet's discovery of the thoracic duct, or rather of its uses, as a reservoir of the chyle from which the blood is elaborated, for the canal itself had been known to Eustachius, stands next to that of Harvey, which would have thrown less light on physiology without it.

and like his, was perseveringly opposed.

36. Willis, a physician at Oxford, is called by Portal, who thinks all mankind inferior to anatomists, one of the wide. greatest geniuses that ever lived; his bold systems vicasems have given him a distinguished place among physiologers. His Anatomy of the Brain, in which, however, as in his other works, he was much assisted by an intimate friend, and anatomist of the first character, Lower, is, according to the same writer, a master-piece of imagination and labour. made many discoveries in the structure of the brain, and has traced the nerves from it far better than his predecessors, who had in general very obscure ideas of their course. Sprengel says that Willis is the first who has assigned a peculiar meutal function to each of the different parts of the brain; forgetting, as it seems, that this hypothesis, the basis of modern phrenology, had been generally received, as I understand his own account, in the sixteenth century. Vieussens of Montpelier carried on the discoveries in the anatomy of the nerves in his Neurographia Universalis, 1684; tracing those arising from the spinal marrow which Willis had not done, and following the minute ramifications of those that are spread over the skin.

37. Malpighi was the first who employed good microscopes in anatomy, and thus revealed the secrets, we may say, of an invisible world, which Leeuwenhoek afterwards, probably using still better instruments, explored with surprising success. To Malpighi anatomists other me. owe their knowledge of the structure of the lungs.

[·] Id. pp. 126-142.

[†] Portal. Sprengel. † P. 88. Biogr Univ.

⁵ Sprengel, vol. iv. p. 250. Compare vol. ni. p. 204.

p Portal, vol. iv. p. 5. Sprengel,

p. 25n. Biogr. Univ.

Portal, in. 120. Sprengel, p. 578.

Graaf has overthrown many errors, and suggested many truths in the economy of generation. Malpighi prosecuted this inquiry with his microscope, and first traced the progress of the egg during incubation. But the theory of evolution, as it is called, proposed by Harvey, and supported by Malpighi, received a shock by Leeuwenhock's or Hartsocker's discovery of spermatic animalcules, which apparently opened a new view of reproduction. The hypothesis they suggested became very prevalent for the rest of the seventeenth century, though it is said to have been shaken early in the next.t Borelli applied mathematical principles to muscular movements in his treatise De Mota Animalium. Though he is a better mathematician than anatomist, he produces many interesting facts, the mechanical laws are rightly applied, and his method is clear and consequent, Duverney in his Treatise on Hearing, in 1683, his only work, obtained a considerable reputation; it throw light on many parts of a delicate organ, which by their minuteness had long battled the anatomist. In Mayow's Treatise on Respiration, published in London, 1008, we find the necessity of what is now called oxygen to that function laid down; but this portion of the atmosphere had been discovered by Bathurst and Henshaw in 1654, and Hooke had shown by experiment that animals die when the air is deprived of it. Ruysch, a Dutch physician. perfected the art of injecting anatomical preparations, hardly known before, and thus conferred an inestimable benefit on the science. He possessed a celebrated cabinet of natural history.

38. The chemical theory of medicine which had descended from Paracelsus through Van Helmont, was propagated chiefly by Sylvius, a physician of Holland, who is reckoned the founder of what was called the chemiatric school. His works were printed at Amsterdam in 1679. but he had promulgated his theory from the middle of the century. His leading principle was that a perpetual fermentation goes on in the human body, from the deranged action of which diseases proceed; most of them from excess of aculity, though a few are of alkaline origin. "He de-

Postal, combine Biogration

^{*} Partal, in 219 Sprengel, p 201 / Portal p 164 Sprengel, p . xx | S renge | 10 | 150 | 151 | 1d | p 2 9 | Bugge Ume

graded the physician," says Sprengel, "to the level of a distiller or a brewer." This writer is very severe on the chemiatric school, one of their offences in his eyes being their recommendation of tea; "the capidity of Dutch merchants conspiring with their medical theories." It must be owned that when we find them prescribing also a copious use of tobacco, it looks as if the trade of the doctor went hand in hand with those of his patients. Willis, in England, was a partisan of the chemiatrics t, and they had a great influence in Germany; though in France the attachment of most physicians to the Hippocratic and Galenic methods, which brought upon them so many imputations of pedantry, was little abated. A second school of medicine, which superseded this, is called the intro-mathematical. This seems to have arisen in Italy. Borelli's application of mechanical principles to the muscles has been mentioned above. These physicians sought to explain every thing by statical and bydraulic laws; they were therefore led to study anatomy, since it was only by an accurate knowledge of all the parts that they could apply their mathematics. John Bernouilli even taught them to employ the differential calculus in explaining the bodily functions, I But this school seems to have had the same leading defect as the chemiatric; it forgot the peculiarity of the laws of organisation and life which often render those of mert matter inapplicable. Pitcairn and Boerhaave were leaders of the iatro-mathematicians; and Mead was reckoned the last of its distinguished patrons, & Meantime, a third school of medicine grew up, denominated the empirical; a name to be used in a good sense, as denoting their regard to observation and experience, or the Baconian principles of philosophy. Sydenham was the first of these in England; but they gradually prevailed to the exclusion of all systematic theory. The discovery of several medicines, especially the Peruvian bark, which was first used in Spain about 1640, and in England about 1654, contributed to the success of the enpirical physicians, since the efficacy of some of these could not be explained on the hypotheses hitherto prevalent.d

Vol. v. p. 59. Biogr, Univ
 Sprengel, p. 73.
 Sprengel, p. 164.

^{$ 10} p. 182. See Biograpsie Uni

verselle, art. Boezhawe, for a general enties in of the late smathematicus a if Sprengel, p. 41%

SECT. IV. - ON ORIENTAL LITERATURE.

39. THE famous Polyglott of Brian Walton was published in Propose of 1637; but few copies appear to have been sold before the restoration of Charles II, in 1660, since those are very scarce which contain in the preface the praise of Cromwell for having facilitated and patronised the undertaking; praise replaced in the change of times by a loyal ealogy on the king. This Polyglott is in nine languages; though no one book of the Bible is printed in so many. Walton's Prolegomena are in sixteen chapters or dissertations. His learning perhaps was greater than his critical acutoness or good sense; such at least is the opinion of Simon and Le The former, in a long examination of Walton's Prolegomena, treats him with all the superiority of a man who possessed both. Walton was assailed by some bigots at home for acknowledging various readings in the Scriptures, and for denying the authority of the vowel punctuation. His Polyglott is not reckoned so magnificent as the Parisian edition of Le Long; but it is fuller and more convenient." Edmund Castell, the coadjutor of Walton in this work, published his Lexicon Heptaglotton in 1669, upon which he had consumed eighteen years and the whole of his substance. This is frequently sold together with the Polyglott.

Hottinger of Zurich, by a number of works on the Eastern languages, and especially by the Bibliotheca Orientalis, in 1658, established a reputation which these books no longer retain since the whole field of Oriental literature has been more fully explored. Spencer, in a treatise of great erudition, De Legibus Hebracorum, 1685, gave some offence by the suggestion that several of the Mosaic institutions were borrowed from the Egyptian, though the general scope of the Jewish law was in opposition to the idolatrous practices of the neighbouring nations. The vast learning of Bochart expanded itself over Oriental antiquity, especially that of which the Hebrew nation and language is the central point; but his etymological conjectures have long since been set aside, and he has not in other respects escaped the fate of the older Orientalists.

Sunon, Hot, Critique du Vieux Britisa Biogr, Univ Brunct, Man-Testament, p. 541. Chalmera, Biogr., du Libraire.

41. The great services of Pococke to Arabic literature, which had commenced in the earlier part of the century, were extended to the present. His edition and translation of the Annals of Eutychius in 1638, that of the History of Abulfaragius in 1668, with many other works of a similar nature, bear witness to his industry; no Englishman probably has ever contributed so much to that province of learning. A fine edition of the Koran, and still esteemed the best, was due to Marracci, professor of Arabic in the Sapienza or university of Rome, and published at the expense of Cardinal Barbadigo, in 1698.† But France had an Orientalist of the most extensive learning in D'Herbelot, principles whose Bibliothèque Orientale must be considered as making an epoch in this literature. It was published in 1697, after his death, by Galland, who had also some share in arranging the materials. This work, it has been said, is for the seventeenth century what the History of the Huns by De Guignes is for the eighteenth; with this difference, that D'Herbelot opened the road, and has often been copied by his successor. ‡

42. Hyde, in his Religionis Persarum Historia, published in 1700, was the first who illustrated in a systematic manner the religion of Zoroaster, which he always represents in a favourable manner. The variety and novelty of its contents gave this book a credit which in some degree it preserves; but Hyde was ignorant of the ancient language of Persia, and is said to have been often misled by Mohammedan authorities, § The vast increase of Oriental information in modern times, as has been intimated above, renders it difficult for any work of the seventeenth century to keep its ground. In their own times, the writings of Kircher on China, and still more those of Ludolf on Abyssinia, which were founded on his own knowledge of the country, claimed a respectable place in Oriental learning. It is remarkable

[·] Chalmera Bioge, Univ.

¹ Tiraboschi, xi. 398.

[|] Biographie Universalle.

PART IV.

that very little was yet known of the Indian languages, though grammars existed of the Taniul, and perhaps some others, before the close of the seventeenth century.

SECT. V .- ON GEOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

48. THE progress of geographical science long continued to Maga of the be slow. If we compare the map of the world in 1651, by Nicolas Sanson, esteemed on all sides the best geographer of his age, with one by his son in 1692, the differences will not appear, perhaps, so considerable as we might have expected. Yet some improvement may be detected by the eye. Thus the Caspian sea has assumed its longer diameter from north to south, contrary to the old map. But the sea of Aral is still wanting. The coasts of New Holland, except to the east, are tolerably laid down, and Corea is a peninsula, instead of an island. Cambalu, the imaginary capital of Tartary, has disappeared t; but a vast lake is placed in the centre of that region; the Altai range is carried far too much to the north, and the name of Siberia seems unknown. Africa and America have nearly the same outline as before; in the former, the empire of Monomotopa stretches to join that of Abyssinia in about the 12th degree of south latitude; and the Nile still issues, as in all the old maps, from a lake Zayre, in nearly the same parallel. The coasts of Europe, and especially of Scandinavia, are a little more accurate than before. The Sanson family, of whom several were publishers of maps, did not take pains enough to improve what their father had executed, though they might have had material helps from the astronomical observations which were now continually made in different parts of the

14. Such was the state of geography when, in 1699, De Lisle, the real founder of the science, at the age of twenty-four, published his map of the world. He had been guided by the observations, and worked under the directions of Cassini, whose tables of the emersion of Jupiter's satellites, calculated for the meridian of Bologna, in 1668, and, with much improvement, for that of Paris, in 1693, had prepared the way for the perfection of geography. The latitudes of different regions had been tolerably ascertained by observation; but no good method of determining the longitude had been known before this application of Galileo's great discovery. It is evident that the appearance of one of those satellites at Paris being determined by the tables to a precise instant, the means were given, with the help of sufficient clocks, to find the longitudinal distance of other places by observing the difference of time; and thus a great number of observations having gradually been made, a basis was laid for an accurate delineation of the surface of the globe. The previous state of geography and the imperfect knowledge which the mere experience of navigators could furnish, may be judged by the fact that the Mediterranean sea was set down with an excess of 300 leagues in length, being more than one third of the whole. De Lisle reduced it within its bounds, and cut off at the same time 500 leagues from the longitude of Eastern Asia. This was the commencement of the geographical labours of De Lisle, which reformed, in the first part of the eighteenth century, not only the general outline of the world, but the minuter relations of various countries. His maps amount to more than one hundred sheets.

^{*} Eichhorn, Geseb der Cultur, v. 26.9. quentity placed this capital of Cathay † The Cambalu of Marco Polosis pro- north of the wall of Clean. hably Pekin, but the geographers fre-

45. The books of travels, in the last fifty years of the seventeenth century, were far more numerous and years more valuable than in any earlier period, but we and travels have no space for more than a few names. Genelli Carreri, a Neapolitan, is the first who claims to have written an account of his own travels round the world, describing Asia and America with much detail. His Giro del Mondo was published in 1699. Carreri has been strongly suspected of fabrication, and even of having never seen the countries which he describes; but his character, I know not with what justice, has been latterly vindicated.† The French justly boast the excellent travels of Chardin, Bernier, Thevenot, and

^{*} Elogo de De Lale, in (Entres de Casaini, in vol. v. p 328. Biogr Univ. Fontenelle, vel vi. p. 233. Eloge de † Tiraboschi, xi. 26. Salfi, xi. 442. VOL. III. Q Q

Tavernier in the East; the account of the Indian archipelago and of China by Nieuhoff, employed in a Dutch embassy to the latter empire, is said to have been interpolated by the editors, though he was an accurate and faithful observer. Several other relations of voyages were published in Holland, some of which can only be had in the native language. In English there were not many of high reputation: Dampier's Voyage round the World, the first edition of which was in 1697, is better known than any which I can call to mind.

The general characteristics of historians of this period are neither a luminous philosophy, nor a rigorous examination of evidence. But, as before, we mention only a few names in this extensive province of literature.

The History of the Conquest of Mexico by Antonio De Solia is "the last good work," says Sismondi, perhaps too severely as to others, "that Spain has produced; the last where purity of taste, simplicity, and truth are preserved; the imagination, of which the author had given so many proofs, does not appear."† Bouterwek is not less favourable; but Robertson, who holds De Solis rather cheap as an historian, does not fail to censure even his style.

47. The French have some authors of history who, by their elegance and perspicuity, might deserve notice; such as St. Real, Father D'Orleans, and even Varillas, proverbially discredited as he is for want of veracity. The Memoirs of Cardinal De Retz rise above these; their animated style, their excellent portraitures of character, their acute and brilliant remarks, distinguish their pages, as much as the similar qualities did their author. "They are written," says Voltaire, "with an air of greatness, an impetuosity and an inequality which are the image of his life; his expression, sometimes incorrect, often negligent, but almost always original, recalls continually to his readers what has been so frequently said of Casar's Commentaries, that he wrote with the same spirit that he carried on his wars." The Memoirs of Grammont, by Antony Hamilton, scarcely challenge a place as historical, but we are now looking more at the style than the intrinsic importance of books. Every one is aware of the peculiar felicity and fascinating galety which they display.

^{*} Biogr. Univ. † Latterstore do Midi, iv. 101.

t Bogs. Univ. whence I take the quotation.

48. The Discourse of Bossuct on Universal History is perhaps the greatest effort of his wonderful genius. Bound on Every preceding abridgment of so immense a subject had been superficial and dry. He first irradiated the entire annals of antiquity down to the age of Charlemagne with flashes of light that reveal an unity and coherence which had been lost in their magnitude and obscurity. It is not perhaps an unfair objection that, in a history calling itself that of all markind, the Jewish people have obtained a disproportionate regard; and it might be almost as reasonable, on religious grounds, to give Palestine an ampler space in the map of the world, as, on a like pretext, to make the scale of the Jewish history so much larger than that of the rest of the human race. The plan of Bossuet has at least divided his book into two rather heterogeneous portions. But his conceptions of Greek, and still more of Roman history, are generally magnificent; profound in philosophy, with an outline firm and sufficiently exact, never condescending to trivial remarks or petty details; above all, written in that close and nervous style which no one certainly in the French language has ever surpassed. It is evident that Montesquieu in all his writings, but especially in the Grandeur et Decadence des Romains, had the Discourse of Bossuet before his eyes; he is more acute, sometimes, and ingenious, and has reflected longer on particular topics of inquiry, but he wants the simple majesty, the comprehensive engle-like glance of the illustrious prelate.

49. Though we fell short in England of the historical reputation which the first part of the century might entitle us to claim, this period may be reckoned that historical in which a critical attention to truth, sometimes rather too minute, but always praiseworthy, began to be characteristic of our researches into fact. The only book that I shall mention is Burnet's History of the Reformation, written in a better style than those who know Burnet by his later and more negligent work are apt to conceive, and which has the signal merit of having been the first in English, as far as I remember, which is fortified by a large appendix of documents. This, though frequent in Latin, had not been so usual in the modern languages.

It became gradually very frequent and almost indispensable in historical writings, where the materials had any peculiar originality.

50. The change in the spirit of literature and of the public mind in general, which had with gradual and never receding steps been coming forward in the seventeenth century, but especially in the latter part of it, has been so frequently pointed out to the readers of this and the last volume, that I shall only quote an observation of Bayle. "I believe," he says, "that the sixteenth century produced a greater number of learned men than the seventeenth; and yet the former of these ages was far from being as enlightened as the latter. During the reign of criticism and philology, we saw in all Europe many prodigies of erudition. Since the study of the new philosophy and that of living languages has introduced a different taste, we have ceased to behold this vast and deep learning. But in return there is diffused through the republic of letters a more subtle understanding and a more exquisite discernment; men are now less learned but more able." The volumes which are now submitted to the public contain sufficient evidence of this intellectual progress both in philosophy and in polite literature.

51. I here terminate a work, which, it is hardly necessary to say, has furnished the occupation of not very few years, and which, for several reasons, it is not my intention to prosecute any farther. The length of these volumes is already greater than I had anticipated; yet I do not perceive much that could have been retrenched without loss to a part, at least, of the literary world. For the approbation which the first of them has received I am grateful; for the few corrections that have been communicated to me I am not less so; the errors and deficiencies of which I am not specially aware may be numerous; yet I cannot affect to doubt that I have contributed something to the general literature of my country, something to the honourable estimation of my own name, and to the inheritance of those, if it is for me still to cherish that hope, to whom I have to bequeath it.

^{*} Dictionnaire de Bayle, art. Aconce. vote D.

INDEX.

Annapar, M., his treatise on Christianity, iii. 287. Abelard, Peter, era and disciples of, Abelard and Eloise, i. 32, 90.

Abernethy, Mr., on Plastic Nature, iii.

Abraham, the intended sacrifice of Isaac by, ii. 506.

Absolom and Achitophel of Dryden, iii. 473. Second part, 474.

Abulfaragius, translation of, by Pococke, iii. 591.

Abyssinia, Ludolf on, iii. 591.

Academy, the French, established by Richelien, iii. 187. History of, 138. Its objects and constitution, 139. Sentiments of, respecting the 'Cid' of Corneille, 140. n. Its labours, 526. French Academy of Sciences, 521. 566. Academies of the learned in Italy, i. 195. 220. 464. ii. 202. 261. iii. 129. 233. 564. The Society of Arcadians, ii. 85, iii. 453. The Royal Society of London, ii. 431. iii. 565, 566, 585. Literary Societies of Germany, iii. 22.

Accuraius, school of law, i. 60. 62. ii. 72. Acidalius, the philologist, i. 480.

Aconcio, or Acontius, 'de Stratagematibus Sataner,' i. 550. ii. 943.

Acosta, history of the Indies by, ii. 252. iii, 207.

Adam and Eve of Milton, iii. 465. et

Adam, relative rights of his offspring, ii. 522.

Adam, Melchior, i. 493. n. Adami, Tobias, Prodromus Philosophia Instauratio of, il. 377.

Addison, Joseph, remarks of, iii. 374. 470, 480,

Adelard of Bath, his Euclid's Elements, i. 109.

Adimari, Alessandro, translator of Pindar, iii. 11.

Adone of Marini, iii. 5. Character of the poem, 6. Its popularity, 7. Adrian VI., pontificate of, i. 5. 314.

Adrian's lines to Florus, i. 29. n.

Adriani, continuator of Guicciardini's History, ii. 256.

Adversaria, class of, i. 476, 479, 483. Of Gasper Barthius, ii. 281. Of Gataker, iii. 250.

Ægypt, history and chronology of, iii.

Æschylus, iii. 472. By Stanley, iii.

Æthiopic version of the New Testament printed at Rome in 1548, i. 461.

Africa, travels in, ii. 251. Agard, Arthur, the antiquarian, ii. 263. and n.

Agostini, his continuation of the 'Orlando Innemorato, i. 223.

Agricols of Sexony, mineralogist, i. 459. Agricola, a restorer of learning, i. 106. His erudition, 204.

Agrippa, Cornelius, i. 310. 386. ii. 379. Ailly, Peter d', the preacher, L 557.

Air, atmospherie, its specific gravity. Mercury used in determining its pressure, iii. 200.

Alabaster, his tragedy of Roxana, iii. 54. Alamanni, principles of, i. 359. ii. 93. The sonnets of, 408. Sublimity of his poetry, 409. Severity of his satire, ib. Alba, Duke of, remark on, ii. 49. Albano, paintings of, ii. 101.

Albaten, Arabian geometrician, i. 155. Alberti, Leo Baptista, a man of universal genius, i. 215.

Albertus Magnus, philosophical works of, i. 13. n. 74. ii. 236.

Alcale, Polyglott Bible of, i. 308. -, school at, i. 529. Library of, i. 259.

Alchemy, study of, i, 112

Alciati, Andrew, of Milan, restorer of the Roman law, i. 404. His classical revision of absolute and obscure terms, 1, 405. u. 11, 72

Alemous, philosophy of, iii. 30%

Alcom, poems of, i 47. De Pontificabus Dec Eboraceusis' of, ib. n.

Aldi Nesendemia, i. 251.

Al frich, his treatise on logic, iii, 502. Aldroyandus, his Collections on Zoology, 11, 245, 288, 10, 206, 207,

Aldas Vacatius, his press, r. 219, 250, The Aldree types, 231. Editions of classics, 265, 266, 319, 325. Academy at Venice, established by, 454.

Alexander, Professor of Greek, v. 253, Aleman, Matthew, his Guaman d'Alfarache,' iv. 214.

Alexander ab Alexandro, his Geniales

Dies, i 320 517. Sir William, Earl of Stirling.

sonnets by, in. 41.

Alexander's Feast, Ode on, by Dryden, in. 477.

Alexandrine verse, i. 80. Monotony of, ii. 117. iu. 23. 33.

Alfred, King, I. 16.

Algebra, science of, I. 235, 445 iii. 171.

37. Cubic equations, n. 446. Positive and negative roots, 448. Biquodintae equations, 449. Algebraic imagings as indefinite quantities, at Albert Overard's, ni. 179. Wallie's History of, 180. Discoverses in, n. 219–223.

Albaren, workworf, i. 110. ii. 250,

Allen, the Jesust. 1 538, ii 47,

A) wacedon, Lafe of Servetus by, 1, 547, n, Almanae for 1457, the first printed, 1, 152, Al neloveon, his Lives of the Stephens Family, 1, 487, n.

Alpinus, Prospec, de Plantis Exoticis,

Althusius, John, his 'Pol ties,' ii, 123 Alvarez, Emanuel, geammarisii, i 497 'Amodiga,' the (or Amadis), of Bernardo

Tasso, ii. 93. Amado de Gaul, romance of, i. 302, iii. 157-179-145. A new era of romance produced by it, i. 170

Amalter, brothers and Latin poets, in.

Amises, Romolo, i. 437.

Ambrose of Bergamo, named Bilirius, 1, 702

______, Saint, iit. 144.

America, discovery of, t. 261. Animals of, to 236.

America, North, discoveries in, al 253.

Ammunum Marcellinus, 111, 1728

Amyot, Jaques, Plutarch translated by, ii. 191.

Amyraut, French Protestant writer, i.

Ana, The, of France, an entertaining and useful compilation, siz. 541

Anabaptists, the, i. 311. Their occupation of the town of Munster, 435. Their tenets, i. 517, ii. 350, 546.

Annereon, in 10-14,

Assaulla, sounets of, ii. 90.

Anatomy, early works on, i. 113, 250, 452. Progress of discoveries in, i. 155, is, 245, ii. 212. On comparative, 575. Writers on, 389, et pusson. Of plants, iii. 590.

Anaxagorse, philosophy of, ii. 377 192, Andrew, John Valentine, ii. 516, 517, m. Andrein, the Adamo, and other drawns of id. 57.

Andres, the Jesuit, i. 10, is, 70, 154 ***.

On the use and era of paper, of local, &c., i. 55 140. Unitarisms of, on collegate foundations, 16.

Andrews, Bishop Lancelot, ii. 200 200 Andromaque of Raeine, ui. 586. In excellences, 587.

Angelies, of Boundo, i. 224.

Angennes, Julie d. beauty of, iti. 156. Angela, Chimpanace of, iti. 207, n. Anglo-Saton poetry, i. 10 Language, Angle-Saxon poetry, i. 10 Language, changes to English, 42. MSS, of subcentury, 86 n.

Anguidata, Italian translator of Ovid-

Animals, Natural Hatory of, iii 20%. 'Irones Animalium' of Genner, ii 25%. Description of various, ii. 236-237. 573, 574

Annua, of Viterbo, ii. 218 n. 202

Anselm, Atchbishop, on the existence of a Deity, a 13 n. 67 69.

Antiquaties, Society of, in England, founded, ii, 262

And prices, Or. 1. 517 of seq. is 500. On the Roman, a. 120 in 292 518...
521. Thesauri of Gravius and term norms, on, in, 254. Porter's Antiquities of Greece, 5. Metricia and Greecia, b. 193. Ecclesissed, the mocks of Parker and Gravius, a 511. Collections of, in Italy, in 2011. December of practiced, 202. Jewish, is Antiquity, veneration for, a 101-415, in the int 225, Controversy on the comparative ment of it.

Antonio, Nicolay the Rithotheca Nosa' of, t. 329, 435, B. 514, BL 13,

Antonio, de Dominis, Archbishop, * de Republică Ecclesiastica,' il. 321. n. On the rambow, and solar rays, mi. 202, Apatisti of Florence, iii. 233.

Apianus, the Cosmography of, i. 462. Apollonius, conies of, i. 445. Geometry of, ic 225.

Apologues, or Parables of Andrew, ii. 517. II.

Apparatus of early writers, i. 60.

Apulcius, golden ass of, in 188.

Aquapendente, F de, on the language of brutes, ini. 204.

Aquila, Serafino d', poet, i. 225.

Aquinas, Thomas, his authority as a scholastic writer, i. 17. His works, th n. 345 is 22, 494 504, 504, Arabian physicians, the, and their school of medicine, i. 452. Literary and scientific authorities, d. 297. Mathe-Style of poetry, maticions, L 155. ii. 111 n.

- writers early employed cotton paper, i. 54. Eminent scholars, 461.

11 225.

Arabic, study of, i. 461, in. 224. Leticon of Golius, th. A MS, version of Hippogrates in, i. 54. Arantius, ii. 246. On the pulmonary ctrculation, ni. 214,

Aratus, edition of, by Grotius, ii. 280.

Arbiter, Petronius, style of, it. 284. Arradia of Sir Philip Sydney, ii. 196 216. iii 286. Of Sannazaro, i. 258. ii. 214.

Arcadians, Society of, ii. 85. iii. 459. 5 19.

Archimedes, ii. 25. 239, Inventions of, nii, 171, 173, 176.

Arcopagation, by Milton, iii 130.

Aretin, Peter, poetry of, i. 426 ii. 94.

Arctino, Leonardo, surnamed also Bruni, his Latinity, 1, 8%. His pointed Laves of Dante and atyle, 85 95. Petrarch by, 150.

' Argenis,' Barclay s, ii. 284. id 164. Argens, his Jewish Letters, mi. 550. Argensola, Bartholomew, in 13.

- Lupereio, c., 13.

Argentier, his medical school, i. 453 Novel principle meeted by, it n.

Argonne, d'. Benedictioc, under the name of Vigneul Marville, ai. 135. under the 596, 499 541.

Argyropulus, Greek grammarian, i. 145. Arean doctrine, the, t. 3600. In Italy, 361. In England, in. 278.

Arrosto, his Orlando Furioso, 1,298, 302.

ii. 93, 100, 101, 138, 139. Its delightful episodes, t. 900. His satires and lysed by Gringmane, 408, Rivals Horace, &B. His Epicorean philosophy and gairty, Comedies of, 265, 426 parison with Tasso, ii, 98, 100, 207. With Spenser, 137.

Aristarchus, sive de Arte grammatica of

G. Vossius, ii. 285

Aristides, version of, i 479.

Aristophanes, by Aldus, i. 219. The Wasps' of, iii. 504.

Aristotelians and Ramists, disputes of, L 380. ii. 368. Scholastic and genume, is 1. Second class of, 2.

Aristotle, his philosophy, s. 196. is. 1, 19. 56% in 196. His physics, il. 281. Metaphysics, ii. 363 307, i.i. 300, 305 522 377. Opponents ef, ii 6. See Philosophy. His poetics, i., 204, in, 237. Riles for Greek tragedy, iii, 140. Definition of comedy, iii. 516. History of animals, is 254. Editions of, by Duval. ii. 277. Compared with Boden, a 68, Arithmetic of Cataodonis, i S. n. Armen on dictionary, 111- 225.

Armniamem, i 543 infed. Its rise, 11. 381. Its tendency, 382. gress, 333.

Arminians of Holland, i. 545. d. 456. in 274. Of England, ii. 275. 523. Arminias, James, Professor at Leyden, il 331.

Arnauld, Antoine, French controversial writer, n. 435, ar 280, 272 5At Hos Art de Penset, 520, 366 On true and false Ideas, 399. His objections to the 'Meditationes' of Descartes, 11. 441, Angelies, iii 272. Arndt's ' True Christianity,' ii. 361. Aromatari, botan cal writer, in 582. Arrebo, Norwegian poet, in. 27

' Ary magna,' by Jerome Cardan, the algebraist, i. 449

-, of Haymond Lully, i. 30%, 510.

Artedi, works of, ji. 238,

Arthur and the Round Table, early romances of, t. 130, n.

Arundelian marbles, at Oxford, il. 291. Ascenseius, B., the printer, i 925.

Aselman, i 507 His treatme of the * Schoolmaster,* 510. ii. 194 Toxoghilus, t. 441.

Asellous, his discovery of the lacteals, an. 218.

Asia, voyages to India, China, &c ai. 251, 253, 255

444

Asola, Andrew of, The Galen by, L 321. Asoline, the, of Bensho, 1 259, Astronomy, treatise of Copernicus on the beavenly bodies, i. 112, 450, ii. 7-117 State of the sewnce of, iii, 170, Works of Kepler, 184, Of Tvelo Brabe, 195, 186.

Athreen, refutation of in. 306. Atomic theory of Dalton, it 412.

Attacks on the Church by the literature of the suddle agos, i. 192

Atterbury, Dr., contraversy of with Bendley, ii. 252

Aubigob, Agrippia d', his Baron de l'aneste, us. 168.

Aubres . Manuscripts, ii. 429 n.

Augerianus, criticism on, ii 202. Augsborg, the Confession of, i. 346. 12". 440. 56 1

Augus, Recoul des Anciens Poetes by, p 117.

Augurelius, criticism on, ii. 202.

Auguston, 'de Ussatate Des,' ii. 281 His system of damity, a feli. The Anti-Pelagum writings of ui. W9. The 'Augustines' of Jansemus, do. Doctrine of, it 412, et passem, Con-troversy on Grace and Free-will, 329, 1250).

Augustiaus, archbishop of Tarragona, £ 517.

- on Civil Law, is 70. Aungerville, her library, a 105. Amor. Contene d, novel of, 1. 356. Aurispa, John, i. 96 '69

Australia, supposed delineation of in 1536, 1 407 B.

Autos, or spiritual deamas, of Gil Vi-cente, t. 256, 429. Sacrimentales in Spnat, n. 151.

Avellenada's invectives on Cervanies, 616, 1 34.

Averano, the Florentine, iti, 480,

Avernes, disciples of, a 19. His docteroes, 156, 155, 156, 16.5, 1% As the poems of a % n

Avala, Baltimar, i. 539 On the rights of war, n. 79

Ara, pupils of, 1, 60.

Bacon, Lord, hit Henry VII., B. 424, m. 149. Its philosophical spirit, 229, His Essays, in 52 Jil. Maxims of, His Philosophy, in 500 m 154 281. Letter to Father Fal-gentic, it. 780 n. Philosophy in modicine, it. 152. On the Alemor-ment of Learning, i. 391 n. 401 424 De Interpretatione Nature, 368, o. De Augmentis Scientiarum,

891, 400, 426, His Terretmuranters Magna, 191. Divided into Para-tiones & a taxon, the Novem Or garum, 192 430 Notural History. Scala Intellectus, 18, Acts 2 (4F/2) cipationes Philosophiae, 194. sophia Secunda, st. Course of study-ing his works, 294. Nature of the Bacoman Induction, 197. Her de l'Ac d' Aristotle, 199. June passage on Pieter. 401. Natural theology and rectaplysies, ib. 1 mal causes, 103. Mare 1 M Man in tody and mond, & Lague, Grammar, and Rhetoric, 108. I thin Politics, 10%. Theology, 10%. Deside rata commerciated by Lon, 10%. First buil of the Novem Organism, 434, 426 Fallacies and Idola, confut said with idols, 40%. Second book of the Novam Organum, 401. His confidence, 411. Lumits to our Laumbrige by sense, 414. Inductive lugse, 415. His philosophy founded on observation and experiment, 116. Further summary of his works, 417 4 2 The prejudice against mathematics, 42%. His wit, 42% 512, The Gree on the Continent, 429. On an unversal juris, rudence, 582 Deensional references to his opinions and authorsty, i. 310, n. 17, 25% n. m. 191 307, 343, 360, 59%

Bacon, Roger, i. 25 100. His ! Open Majas, and inventions, 111, His resenthance to Lord Bacon, to. Upter by, n. 230.

Badius, Jizlocus, printer, l. 276. Bad, Tamrus, French poet, i, 328. a 113, 115, n.

Buillet, his opinion of Henry Stephers, 1, 18%. His Jugomens des Sy venes in 11, n, 500. The 1 life of Des-cartes, n 109 n in 714 n 506.

Basis, his doctrine condemned by Piers V., in. 270. Contrarersy raised by. 101.

Badu, John, the "Catholicon" of, L 77.

Balde, his ' Sylva,' in. 5%.

Balds, his . La Nautica, in 92. Sommets nf. ×4.

Haldrie, Bishop of Utrecht, c 88, Bulling, on Roman Law, a 417 16, 74

Bo tur, the , inscornally a feet Halmen of Water berg, to 20%

Balade, Spanist, n. 140 Gen. 148 Engash and Scott, St. 1-3 Gerrinin.

Bulese, n. 129 b. His rectique on Herexius, 51. His Letters 1 : 135 137. His morehly and clea-quence, 134. ' Apology for Balrac,' His style, ni. 524, 529, Handello, novels of, n. 211, m. 121. Barbaro, Francis, ethical 'Dialogues' of, i, 102.

601

Barbevrae, commentator on Greetius and Pullemaorf, ii. 554, 586, in. 404, n. 419, 439, Barbier, d'Aucour, his attack on Bon-hours' Entretiens, iii. 529. On the Turkish Spy, 561, n. Burbesa, Arras, the teacher, i. 329.

Barbour, John, his Scottish poem of

The Bruce, i. 44. Barelay, author of Argenia and Eu-phorimo, n. 164, 285 -. William, * de Regno et Regali

Potestate,' ii 44, 299, 547. Baret or Barrett, John, his Lexicon, i.

Bark, Peruvian, first used as a medicine, in, 589. Barlaam, mission of, i. 94. Treatise of, 512. Bartwus, Guspar, Latin poems of, iii.

Baronius, Cardinal, Annals of Ecclesiastreal History' of, 1, 474, 503, 563, 564. Continued by Spondarus, u. 333.

Barros, J. de, his ' Axia,' in 252.

Barrow, Dr. Isase, Greek professor, iu. 249. Laten poetry of, 483. His Sermans, 260, 275, 296, Barthins, Ginspar, his * Pornohosco-didascalus, i. 257. His * Adversaria, 69 n. u. 281, Bartholm, the physician, ill. 219. Bartoli, Jeunt, his writings, in, 129. Bartolus, jurist, i. 64. n. 72.

Basle, council of, 1. 556 Cathedral, 353. Lerseon of, 325.

Basson, Schustran, ii. 377. Bassompiere, u. 363.

Bathurst discovers vital air, ni, $88

· Hattle of the Books, the, m. 563.

Baulius, Dominic, n. 146. Banhin, John and Gaspar, their works on botany, ru. 211, -, Gerned, his ' Phytopinax,'ii. 244. Baster, William, Las Anacreon, in. 255. His communitary on Latin, 251.

- Richard, Trestiseon the Grotian doctrines, ii. 315, n

Bayard, la Chevaher, memoira of, i. 463 Bayle, his critical remarks, a 505, ii. 450, p. His Philosophical Commentary on Scripture, in 28%, Avis aux Refugies, the, 439 His Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres," 537. His Pensées sur la Comète de 1680,' 529. His Historical and Critical Dictionary, 539. Character of his works, 541. His Dictionary, observation of, 596.

Beattie, Dr. W.lham, Essay on Truth of, m. 437, n

Beaumont and Fletcher, their conjunct thesire - The Woman-Hater, in-98. Corruption of their text, ib. Maid's Tragedy, criticism on, 99, 100. Philaster, 100. King and no King, 101. The Elder Brother, 102. The Spanish Curate, 102. The Custom of the Country, 103. The Loyal Subject, to Beggar's Bush, 104 The Scornful Lady, to. Valentunan, 105. Two Noble Kassmen, 106. The Parthful Shepherdess, 45, 97, 107 a Wife and Have a Wife, 108. Knight of the Burrang Pestle, 48, Various other of Fletcher's plays, i& Origin of Fletcher's comedies, 109. Defects of the plats, 110-112, n, Sentiments and style, dramatic, 110. Characters, 111. Their trugedor inferior to their comedies, it. female portrastures, 113. Criticisms on, 16. n.

Beaumont, Sir John, his . Besworth Field,' iii. 36.

Becanus, principles of, il. 519.

Beccari, Agostini, ii 150. Beeker, his Physica Sobterranes, iii. 567, Beds, his censure of Liramus, L. 348.

Bede, the Venerable, I. 5.

Bekker, his 'Monde enchanté,' ici. 299, Behmen or Bochm, Jacob, n. 380.

Behn, Mrs., id. 515, 858

Beloe's Ancedotes of Literature, ii. 277. n.

Bellarmin, Cardinal, a Jesuit, i, 545, n. 355. The chief controversal writer of Rome, 5%, 359 tri. 238. Hephes by his adversaries named Anti-Belhimmus, 555,556. His Aporer to James L. n. 299.

Bellay, French poet, ii. 113, 115, Latin poems of, 144

Beilenden, his treatise "de Statu," is, 520. Bellius, Martin (or Castalio), i. 549, 550 n.

Bello, Francesco, auruamed il Cieco, i. 225.

Betrort, Italian antiquazian weiter, it 954. Belon, Travely of, Natural History by, ii 237, 248, 241.

Bembo, Pietro, i. 508, 474. The Asolant' of, 259. An imitator of Petrarch, and in Latin of Carero, 10%

Beauties and defects of, 407. Tassoni's remure of, for adopting lines from Petrarch, 407. His elegance, 262, 316, n. 317, 437. n. 202. Le Proce, by, a 441. Latin pooms of, 425. Enjoys his library, and the society of the learned at Padus, 439. Bembus, ii. 202.

Benzeus, poems on the, 1 425.

Benedetts, the geometrician, ii. 227.

234 Benedictnes, i. 4, 70. Of St. Maur, the 'Histoire litteraire de la France,' by the, 1, 14-51.

Benefices, Sarpi's Treatise on, ii. 200. History of the Council of Trent, 201.

Bom, his commentary on the Portics of Aristotle, it 204, in, 131.

Beniment, poetry of, i 22.6

Benserade, French court poet, iii. 459. Boutham, Jeremy, in. 897.

Bentivoglio, Cardinal, his Letters, ni. 126, His Civil Wars of Flanders, 228, Sutires of, it 95.

Bentley, Dr. Richard, his epistle to Mill, in. 251. On the epistles of Phalaris, & Controversy with Atterbuty, 252. Benzoni, in Novi Orbis Historia, in. 241.

Berchieur, learning of, i. 91.

Berenger, controversy with, I. 13.

of Carpi, his fame as an anatomist, t. 45% in, 21%. Berence, trageds of, by Rueine, a surprising performance, in, 48%.

Hergerne, Cyrano de, his Le Pedant 1002, in 75 His Romanoes, 525.

Bengard, Claude, his 'Circult Pisani,'

Berkeley, Rishop, works of, ti. 437. id. 354, 369.

Bermudez, tragedies of, in 160,

Bern, Les Orando Innanierata, i. 299. 358. His lighter productions, chatacter of, 159. Boracio's poem of Orlands, re written by, 110. I odurous poetry named after him, Poem Bernesca, 409.

Bernier's Epitome of Gassendi, io. 315, 565.

Travels, id. 593.

Bernoudh, John, on the Differential Calendos, in 589.

Bernaldo, librarian of the Vaticas, i. 202 Bessarion, Cird nul. his * Advanus caluminatorena Patonis * ii 147

Bethune, Mr. Drmkwater, her Life of Gal less, in, 190

Beta, " de Harretten punsendis," i 550, 552-562. His Latin Testament, 567. Latin poetry of, ii. 148. Bibliera, Cardinal, his comedy of *Calandra, i. 256.

Bible, the, i. 150, 357. iii. 229, 224. In modern languages produbited by the Polygiott Bible of Alcala, i. 200. The Sixture Bible, 366. That by Clement VIII., 567. Protestant Bible and Testaments, ib. Geneva Bible — Coverdale's Bible, ib. The Bishop's Bible, 365. English Bible, translated under the authority of James 1, n. 385. See Scriptures.

Bibliographical works, ii. 25.4 Bibliotheca Universalis, of Gesner, ii. 25.4.

Bibliothèque Universelle, of Le Clere, in 274,

Bibliotheques, Universalle, Cheiste, et Ancienne et Moderne, celebrity of these reviews, in. 274.

and of Verdier, n 200 76.5 Biddle, Un turns writer, in 278.

Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, ii. 481 n. Biographic Universelle, the, ii. 340 n. of pairing.

Blackmore's poems, iii. 479. Bladus, printer at Rome, i. 321. Black, ' Mapa of, '&c. iii. 22", 328.

Blank verse, first introduction of i. 420, in 122. Nilhoo's in 405. Of Marlowe, ii. 170. Of other authors, 174.

Blomfield, Dr. Charles, Bishop of London, on the corruption of the Lirich language, 1, 93, n, Article in the Quarterly Review, 209, n.

Blandel, controversalist, it 334, 355 Blood, circulation of the, in 212, 219, 556

Borcacio, enticism on his taste and Lotin works, 1-79, 408. His "Eclogues," 80. His Novels, 435, n. 211. His "Gencalogia Deorum," 5, 4. His "Decemerone," 138 His "de Casilias Virorum Blustram," 121.

Boccalon, Trajan, in 127. His Ragguagh di Parnawo, A 223.

Bochart, the 'Geographia Saera' of, in, 223. His 'Hieromous,' it. His works on Hibrow, &c., 590.

Bodin, John, writings of, a $64, 58 C, in 521, 525, in, 146. The Hepaths of in $1 - 67. Comparison of, with Marbiavel and Aren, the 68, With Mantisquien 48. See 68, ii

Bodius, Alexander, 1, 147.

Bodleyan Library at Oxford, u. 252.

iii. 250. Its catalogue, 232. Its Ori-

Boerhaave, works of, nr. 589.

Boétie, Etienne de la, * Le Contr' Un * of, n. 36.

Boethius, his Consolation of Philosophy, i. 2 Poem on, 33.

Boiardo, Matteo Maria, count of Scandanso, i. 223. His Orlando Innamo-rato reviewed, 224, 299.

Boileau, saure of, nl. 163-461. Pranes Malherbe, 21. His ' Epitres,' 457.
' Art of Poetry,' 456, 457. Comparison with Horace, 409. His Lutrun, 8, n. 458, 480. Uharneter of his poetry, 458, 458, Bois or Boyse, Mr., reviser of the English (

Housebert, French academician, iii.

Bologna, university of, i. 15, 16, 19.

Bombelli, Algebra of, ii. 225.

Bon, Professor of Civil Law, iii. 446, n Bonarelli, hix Filli di Sorro, a pastoral dimma, iii. 58.

Bonamy, literary everys of, i. 19. Bonaventura, doctrines of, i. 139.

Bond, John, his notes on Horsee, h. 282. Bonfadio, correspondence of, ii. 190.

Bonnefons, or Boniforms, in 146. Books, the earliest printed, i. 148. 150.

Prohibition of certain, it. 265.

Bordone's Islands of the World, with Charta, i. 469.

Borelli, ' de Motu Animalium,' iii 588. Borghino, Raffaelle, treatise on Painting by at 189.

Borgo, Francis dake of Gondin, i. 363. Borgo, Luca di, il. 321

Bowan, Spanish poetry of, i. 411. ii. 105 iii 12

Bessu, on Epic Poetry, iii. 542.

Bessuet, Bishop of Meaux, i. 294. ii.
337, 342. in 280, 292. The 'Histoire Universelle of, 256, 595. His Sermon before the Assembly of the Gallican Clerga, 259. Draws up the Four Articlea, 260. His 'Exposition de la Foi Catholique,' 263.
Controversial writings of, 274 ii. 265.
His 'Variations of the Protestant Churches,' i. 294. iii. 267. Funeral discontrage of, 292, 520.

Bornt of Asts, in 217.

Botanical gardens instituted at Mirburg. Prat, and at Padua, i. 457 ii 240. no. 583.

Botany, science of, i. 447. li. 240. Writers on, ili. 210. 238, 576, 580. Botero, Giovanni, his 'Ragione di Stato,' ii, 49. His Cosmography, 25%. On Political Economy, 525

Boucher ' de pratis Henrici III. abdicatione,' ii. 44

Bouchetel, his translation of the Hacuba of Europides, i. 429.

Bouhours, entie and grammarian, iii.
20. His 'Entretiens d'Ariste et d'
Eugène,' 527 Sareanns of, 449,
His 'La Mamère de bien Poeser,' 530.

His 'La Manière de bien Pener,'590, Bouilland, the Italian astronomer, ni. 191.

Bourbon, Anthony, original of Pantagruel, i. 437.

ni, 50. Barbonius, Latin poetu of,

Bourdaloue, le Père, eyle of his sermons, in 292

Bourdin, the Jenuit, objections by to the Meditations of Descartes, ii. 441. Bourgeeis Gestilhomms of Mollers, a diverting moral satire, iii. 502.

Boursault, his 'Le Mercure Galant,' iii.

Bouterwek, eriticisms of, i. 120, 257, 258,n. 412, 429 ii. 93,n. 104, 105 111,n. 155, 157 268, iii. 14, 23, 24,n. 64 155, 459.

Boyle, Charles, his controversy with Bentley, in 251

Bradshaw, Welliam, literary reputation of, iii. 56R. n.

Brodwardine, Archbp., on Geometry, s. 15, 112.

Brain, anatomy of the, works on, iii 587. Bramball, Archboshop, it. 515, n.

Brandt's History, a 531.

Brant, Natural History, &c. of, iii. 207. Brekeuf, his ' Pharsalie,' in. 461

Brentine, his controversy on ubiquity,

Breton, English poet, is 125. 'Maralla' of, 218 n.

Breton lays, discussion on, i. 13. Briggs, Henry, mathematicism, ii. 172.

Briggs, Henry, mathematicism, n. 172, 174. The Binorial theorem of, 179, Brissin on Roman Law, a. 517, n. 78, British Bibliographer, n. 119, 199.

Brito, Gulielmus, poetry of, i. 72 Brooke, Lord, style of his poetry obscure,

m. 29 Broughton, Hugh, i. 554 m. 249,

Brown, Mr. George Armitage, Shakspecie's autobiographical poems' by, iu. 40, n. Brown, Dr. Thomas, ii. 409.

Browne, Sir Thomas, his ' Religio Me-

"s Britannia Pastorals, td. 95.

"s Inquiry into Vulgar Errora, its.
36, 592.

Bruccols, the Venetian publisher, i. 357. Brucker, his History and Analysis, i. 3.n. 310, n. 369, 377, n. ii. 1, 2, 8, 9, 13.

Brueya, Prench dramatic author, i. 307. Brunkela, Otto, the 'Herbarum vivæ Encomes' of, i. 457.

Bruno, Jordano, theories of, i. 88, 310. n. 8, 9, 377, iii 343. His philosophical works, ii. 9, 10, 14, 227. His puntheism, 18. On the plurality of worlds, 12. Somets by, 12, n. Various writings of 190

Brayler, La, Caracteres de, iii. 409. Braylers, Sir Egerton, Les British Bibliographer, ii. 412. His Censura. 199. Bucer, works of, circulated in a fictitions

Dime, 1, 357

Buchanan, his Scottish History, i, 501, in 257, * De Jure Regna, i, 515, in 38, 42, in, 439. His Latin poetry, in 147, in, 51. His Palms, 53, Bockhurst, Lord (Thomas Sackville), his Induction to the Missour of Magistrates, n. 121, 142, 167.

Buda, royal library, a 161.

Budwus, works of, 1 228 276 321, 347, 403, 506. The Commentary, Linguise Graces, 423 His observations on the Pandeets, 263, 403, Buble, analyses the philosophy of Cesalpine, it. 5, 6. Commentaries of, on the works of Brano, 8-13. Remarks by, in. (14, 94).

Bulgarina on Dante, n. 106.

Bull, his 'Harmonia Apostolica,' i. 276. His 'Defensio Fidei Nicenze,' 278.

Bullinger, theological writings of, a. 562. Bunel, Peter, epistles of, i. 318. n.

Bunyan, John, his ' Pilgrim's Progress,'

Buomarotti, Michael Angelo, in. 369 a. Buommatau, on the Lingua Toscana, ni. 149, Burtage the Player, m. 78 n.

Burne, Edmand, compared with Lord Barne, 1: 425.

Burkeyb, Lord, refuses to sanction the Lambeth articles of Whitzift, in 1890. Burkespie poetry writers, in 194.

Burman, quotation from, in 29 %

Burnet, Bishop, his 'History of his Own ,

Times, 'ili. 276. His 'History of the Reformation,' 595.

Burnet, Thomas, his Archaeologia Philosophica, his 282. Theory of the Earth by, 584.

Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, iii.

Bury, Richard of, t. 52, n. Library and 'Philobiblian' of, 75, 91.

Buscobaum, his * Medulla casuum Conscientie,' ii. 50).

Butler, his 'Hudsbras,' ili, 462, 474. Butler's 'Analogy,' in '594. ii, Buxtorf, the elder, Hebraut, ni. 221.

text of Seripture, in. 223.

Cabbala, the Jewish, i, 200, Cabot, Schastian, i 462 ii, 253. Cadamosto, the Venetian, his soyages of discovery, l. 260.

Carlina Rhodiganas, a 517, 524,

Carsalpin, botanical writer, in 243, iti. 210 576. His Quarstiones Peripatetion, 218, ii.

Casarios, Homilies of, i % a. Casus, Roman preshyter, i 12 a. —, Dr., on 'British Dogs,' ii 239. Cajetan, controsersialist, i. 556.

Carderon de la Barca, Pedro, tragi-comedica of, ui. 39. Number ofe-hia pieces, Gl. Comedies of, rb. His 'La Vida es Sueno,' 52. His 'A Secreto agravio secreta Vengança,' 64. His atyle, ib. His ment discussed, 66. His school, ni. 185.

Calendar, the Gregorian, 1. 526 Calegio, Latin dictionary of, 1. 251, 326, Calesto and Melibra, Spanish play, 1. 256. Its great reputation, 257.

Caliston, George, desired union in religion, ii. 319, 332 n.

Callistos, Andromeus, a teacher of Greek, 1-14s.

Calprenede, his ' Cassandra,' iii. 161. His ' Cleopatra,' ib.

Caism, John, been in Picardy, 1, 425.

Her Institutes, a text book, 527, 355, 560, 567 in in 276. Their great reputation, 1, 367. Exposition of his doctrine, 355. Received as a legislator at German in His controvery with Cassander, 541. Dotth of Servetus instigated by, 546, 557, 550, ii 343. Calemost favourable to republican institutions, 324. Iberr doctrines, 418, 20, 530, 556, in 264, 277. Who styled Crypto-Calemats, ii 543.

Calvinus, Seth, Chronology of, in. 291.

Cambrensis, Giraldus, remarks on Oxford University by, i. 16.

Cambridge, university of, i. 16. 286. n. 533. 537, 438. 507. 509. n. ii. 158. The university library, ii. 259. iii. 931. The press, i. 512.

Camden, his Greek Grammar, i. 512. His 'Britannia,' 514. His Life of Elizabeth, iii. 229.

Camerarius, his age, i. 330. His Commentaries, 489, 491. A restorer of ancient learning, 506. On botany, iii. 210. 582.

Cameron, a French divine, ii. 334.

Cameons, the 'Lusiad'of, ii. 107. Its excellences, 108, 109. Minor poems of, 110.

Campanella, Thomas, ii. 8. iii. 199. His ' Politica,' ii. 520. His 'City of the Sun,' 165. Analysis of his philosophyin the 'Compendium de Rerum Naturâ, 372-377.

Campano, his Life of Braccio di Montone, i. 317. n.

Campanus, version of Euclid by, i. 109.

Campbell, Mr. Thomas, remarks of, ii. 121. 126. p. 191.

Campion, English poet, ii. 132. Campistron, tragedies by, iii. 498.

Caninius, Angelus, I. 475. 489. ' Hellenismus,' a grammar, 487. iii. 245.

Cantacusenus, Emperor, i. 94.

Canter, Theodore, the 'Varier Lectiones' of, i. 490.

William, his version of Aristides, i. 479. His ' Novm Lectiones,' B Sh E

Canus, Melchior, his 'Loci Theologici,' i, 367. *5*61.

Capella, Martianus, Encyclopædia of, i. 3. Capellari, the Latin poet of Italy, iii. 480.

Capito, German scholer, i. 294. Cappel, Louis, his 'Arcanum punctuations revelatum, iii. 222. Critica Sacra' of, 223.

Caraccio, his 'Corradino,' iii. 485. Carate, the Spanish author on Botany, ii, 241, Cardan, Jerome, algebraist, i. 387. 446. His Rule for Cubic Equations, 448. ii. 219. 221, iii, 179. 181. On Mechanics, ii. 250.

Cards, playing, invention of, i. 148. Carew, Thomas, merit of his poetry, iii. 42, 462,

 Richard, his translation of Tasso ii. 191,

Carion's Chronicle, by Melanchthon, i. 463.

Carlostadt, religious tenets of, i. 494.

Carlovingian kings, charters by the, i. 53. Caro, Annibal, correspondence of, it. 203. His translation of the Eneid, 86. 95. His dispute with Castelvetro, 209.

Carreri, Gemelli, his Travels, iii. 593. Cartesian philosophy, summary of the, ii. 434 461. iii. 310. 318, 366, 371. See Descartes, and respective heads in Index.

Carthusians, learning of the, i. 69. Cartwright, his ' Platform,' i. 516.

-, William, couplet by, iii. 93. n. Casa, licentique verse of, ii. 94. His

' Galateo,' 32. 84. 188.

Casaubon, Isaac, editions of the classics by, i. 504. ii. 273. iii. 250. A light of the literary world, 505. Correspondence with Scaliger, i. 501. 521. n. iî. 909. Attack on Bellarmin by, 555. n. —, Meric, il. 278. n. 310. n. account of Oxford University, iii. 290. On the Classics, 250, Casimir, lyric poetry of, iii. 50. n. 51. See Sarbievus.

Casiri, Catalogue of Arabic MSS, by, i. 54.

Casks, Kepler on the capacity of iti. 175.

Cassander, George, his 'Consultation' on the Confession of Augsburg, L 540. His controversy with Calvin, 541. Grotius's Annotations, ii. 316.

Camiodorus, i. S. and notis, 22. Castalio, Sebastian, i. 549, 550. n. iii. 330. 343. Beza's reply to Bellius, id est Castalio, i. 550. Scriptural ver-sion of, 567. Version of the German Theology by, i. 133. Castanheda, description of Asia by, ii. 252.

Castell, Edmund, his Lexion Heptaglotton, iii. 590.

Castellio, his work on Hydraulies, iii. 199. Castelvetro, criticisms of, L 299. E. il. 203. His commentary on Aristotle's Poetics, 204.

Castiglione, Latin poetry of, i. 425, ii. 202. 268.

Castillejo, Spanish poet, ii. 105.

Casulstry, ii. 495-495.

Casuata, writings of certain, il. 500, The English casulats, 506. The Romish, 493.

Catalogues of new books first published, ii. 269. p.

Caterus, his objections to Descartes, li.

Cutharin, his work not orthodox, i. 367. 561.

Cathay, or China, ii. 252.

' Catholicou' of Balbi, in 1460, i. 77.

Catholies, their writers, i. 555. 566. English Catholies, 567. Catholie

Bibles, 566. See Rome. Cats, popular Dutch poet, iii. 26. Caudine Forks, the, it 559.

Cavalieri, mathematician of Bologna, iii. 176. His geometry, 177.

Cave on the Dark Ages, i. 4. p. Caxton, first printed books of, i. 157. Cecebant, celebrated barlequin, mi. 60. Celso Magno, Odes of, n. 86, un. 451.

Cobo, Mino, ' de Heretien,' &c., i. 551. 14, 343, Celtes, Conrad, i. 206. Dramas of, 208.

Academies established by, 466. Celticus sermo, the patous of Gaul, i.

Centuristors, the, who termed, i. 562. Of Magdeburgh, $43, 564.

Cersantes, Latin poems of, in. 50.

Corvantes, reputation of his 1 Don Quixote, in, 134 German criticium as to his design, 155. Observations on the author, 158. Excellence of the Romance, 159. His minor novels, 160. His tragedy of Numanera, n 208. is, 160. Invectives on by Avellenada, in 154. Criticism by, 164

Cosalpini, Quantiones Peripatetice, li. 5. Cesarins, merit of, us. 50, Cest. Prince Frederic, founds the Lincean Society at Rome, in, 189, 234.

Cris, his Latin poems, in 480, Chalcondyles, arrives from Constantinople in Italy, 1-145.

Chaldee, the language and Scriptures, i.

108. hi. 221, 224. Chalover, Str Thomas, his poem * De Republick Instauranda, it. 148, 210. Chamberlayne, in 468.

Champeaux, William of, 5, 14.

Champ mele, Mademoiselle de, ni. 487. Chancellar, his voyage to the North Sea, in. 243.

Chapetain. French poet, iii. 158. La Pucelle, 451.

Chapelte, or l'Hudher, poet, iti, 459. Chapman, dramas of, in. 122. His H aner, it. 130, it. 124.

Charlemagne, cathedral and conventional schools established by, i. 4, 6, 11, 15 Charles I. of England, i. 517, ii. 304.

463. m. 78, 120,145, 151, 461.

Charles II., education and literature in his reign, ai 250, 295, 200. Decline of poetry, 478. Latin poetry, 484.

Comedy, 514. Charles VI. the Emperor, b. 102. Charles IX. of France, if 114.

Charles the Bald, a. 7, 25, 24 B. Charleton, Dr., his translation of Gassendt, ui. 365.

Chardin, Voyages de, ni. 593. Charron, Peter, treatise * des Trois V6rites, &c. by, i. 363. On Wisdom, ii. 462, 509, Charters, anciently written on papyrus and on pareliment, i 53, 55.

Chancer, remarks on the poetry of, i. 45. 122, 420, 421, h. 121,

Chaulieu, poems of, in. 450.

Cheke, Sir John, i. 327. Greek profes-nor at Cambridge, 336, 538. His Seformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum,' it.

Chemistry, science of, ili. 567 570. Chemists, the Loci Theologies of, ii, 361, 562.

Chevalier, Hebrew professor, il 249. Chery Chase, its probable date, in 160.

Chabrers, Italian port, m. 9, 52, 449, Bis imitatore, iii, 11. Chiffet, the Jewit, the first reviewer, i.i. 536. Child. Sir Josiah, on Trade, iii. 442.

Chillingworth, writings and ductrines of, и, 27%, 416. . Religion of Protestonts by, 324.

Chimpanice of Angola, id. 207. n. China, stereotype printing known in, i. 148 Missionarus to, il 259, ili 225. History of, ii 253. Nieuboff's account of, m. 594. Voyages in, 255.

Chinese language and manuscripts, iii. 225

Chivalry, its effect on poetry, i. 125. Romances of, 128, 435. 129, Christiad,' the, of Vida, t. 428.

Christins of Sweden, ii. 459. iii. 453. Christine of Pias, a lady of literary accomplishments in the court of Charles V. of France, i. 92.

Christopherson, his Jephthah, 1, 448, Chronology, Joseph Scaliger's 'de I men-datione Temporum,' i 524. His Juann Persod, 525. Archbuhap Usher's, in, 256. The Hebrew chronology, ib.

Writers on, 256, 257. Chrysoloras, Emanuel, i. 91 95. Chrysostom, editions of, il. 277. Cinconnus, Alfonsus, 1, 522.

-, or Chacon, Peter, i. 522. Campali, the 'Rime' of, in, 11.

Cibber, his plays, iii. 518. a.

Cicero, orations of, discovered by Poggio, i. 82. His style a criterion of language, 84. 316. Argument by, 225. Editions of, 157. 319. 481. a. His orations elucidated by Sigonius, His epistles, ii. 192. iii. 243. Quotation from, 584,

' Ciceronis Consul,' &c. by Bellenden, ii. 520,

Cid, the, of Pierre Corneille, iii. 69. Critique on, 140. Romanoes of the, iii. 12.

Cimento, Academy del, iii. 564. Cinthio, Giraldi, his tragedy of the 'Orbecche,' i. 427. His 'Hundred ' Orbecche,' i. 427. Tales,' ii, 212, Circumnavigators, account of, ii. 251.

Cistertians, learning of, i. 69. Civil Law and Civilians, i. 70--76, n. ii. 540. at soq. iii. 422, 445.

Clarendon, Earl of, his History, iii.

Clarius, Inidore, edition of the Vulgate by, i. 566. ii. 249.

Classics, first and celebrated editions of the, i. 252. 324. 471. 512, 513. iii. Variorum editiona, i. 320. iii. 243. Delphin, 246. et passim.

Clauberg, German metaphysician, iii. 317.

Claude, French Protestant controversial writer, iii. 263. His conference with Bossuet, 264, Clavius, Euclid of, ii. 225. Calendar reformed by, 229.

Clemangia, religious views of, i. 133. Clement VIII., i. 545. Character of, ii, 38, 334. An edition of Scripture authorized by this pope, 567. Clement, Jaques, the regicide, it. 45.

Clenardus, Greek Grammar of, i. 524. 488. iii. 246. Clerselier, metaphysician, ii. 435. iii.

199. 317. Cleveland, satire of, iii. 474. 478.

Clugni, Abbot of. See Peter Cluniscensis, i, 54, &c. Library of the Abbey of, 70.

Clusius, his works on Natural History and Botany, ii. 243. iii. 206.

Cluverius, his Germania Antiqua, ii. 293. Coccejus, Summa Doctrine of, ii. 356. Feet of, iii. 316.

Codex Chartaceus, Cottonian MSS. (Galba, B. I.) contents, and materials written on, i. 57.

Coeffeteau, translation of Florus by, iii. 134.

Coiter, Pathological Anatomy by, ii. 246

Colebrooke, Mr., on the Algebra of India, i. 236.

Coleridge, Mr., his praise of Beaumont and Fletcher, iii. 81. n. His philo-sophical view of the plays of Shakspeare, 94. Remarks by, ii. 185. iii. 218. n. 469. His ' Remains,' 464. n. Colet, Dean, founds St. Paul's school, i. 511.

Colineus, his press at Paris, i. 325. BALL.

Collaito, Count of, ii. 90.

Collier's History of Dramatic Poetry, and Annals of the Stage, i. 257. n. 451. ii. 78, 79, 80. 166, 167. n. 168. 171, 194, Colocci, Angelo, Latin poet, L 464. Colomies, the ' Colomesiana,' i. 554, n. Colonna, Vittoria, Marchioness of Peacars, beauty of her cansones, i. 860.

408. ii. 92. Coluccio Salutato, literary merits of, i.

Columbus, Christopher, Epistle of, i. 261. Discovery of America by, 61. 311, 312.

Rualdus, 'de Re Anatomicâ,' il. 246. iii. 214. 217,

Columna, or Colonna, his hotanical works, iii. 210. His etchings of His atchings of plants, 210. 576.

Comedy, iii. 517. Italian, i. 425. ii. 149. Extemporaneous, iii. 59. Spanish, ii. 154. &c. See also names in Index of English and French drama, tists.

Comenius, his system of acquiring Latin, ii. 272.

Comes Natalis, Mythologia by, i. 524. Comets, theory respecting, iii, 186. Comines, Philip de, ii, 237.

Commandin, the mathematician, ii. 225. Works on geometry edited by, ib. Commerce and Trade, works on, ii.

526. iii, 441, 442. Commonwealths, origin of, ii. 53. iii.

591. 595. Condillac, works of, il. 475, 579.

Confession, auricular, its importance to a church, ii. 493. Strict and lax schemes of it, 496.

Congrere, William, his comedies, iii. 516. Old Bachelov, ib. Way of the World, 517. Love for Love, ib. His Mourning Bride, 514.

Conic sections, on, iii. 175. Problem of the cycloid, 178.

Connan, the civilian, ii. 73.

Conrad of Wurtzburg, L 37. Conragues, Herman, u. 519, 540, Coustance, council of, t. 556. ii. 65. Constantin, Robert, reputation of his Lexicon, i 483 510. Constantinople, revolution in language on its capture by Mahomet 11., i. 92 Constitutions of European states, printed by the Electrical, 519.

Contareni, rigid picty of, i 537

1. 1 62

Contracts, on, ii. 521 55%.

Contrat Social of J. J. Rousseau, in. 58.5.

Controversy of Catholics and Protestants, 11, 30G.

Convents, expulsion of nums from their, i S13,

Cooke, Sir Antony, daughters of, i. 514.

Cop, the physician, i. 328

Copernicus, astronomical system of, i. 450 is 91 226, 571 of 187. His system adopted by Galileo, in 237. ili. 180, 191,

Coptic, this language indebted to the researches of Athanasius Kircher, in Cordava, Granada, and Malaga, colleguite institutions of, a lb.

Cordas Euricius, his Botamlogicon, 1. 437.

Cornelle, Pierre, dramas of - his Me-Lit, 10, 68, The Cid, 69, 490 His Chiandre, La Veuvy, and Médéc, 68, 68 Let Horsees, 71. Cinus, His tragedy of Polyeucte, ib. Rodo. gane, 73 494. Powper, 73. Herachus, 74 Nicouncide, 16. His co-medy of Le Menteur, 75. Style of, 70. Faults and beauties of, 74. His tragedies unequal in merit, 485 Comparison of Racine with, 195 His party, 5.7.

____, Thomas, dramatic works of, iii 496.

Cornelius à Lapide, ii. 355.

Cormoni, critical remarks of, i. 159. Jan. d. 92, n. 158 190, m. 451.

Correggio and Tasso, their respective bilents compared, ii 101

Currespondence, literary, it 264. Cortesius, Paulise line Dealogue de hominibia doctis,' i. 8% n 177, Ha commentary on the scholastic philosophy, 474

Cotvinus, Mathies, King of Hingary, i. lost.

Coryents, a patron of learning, t. 464.

Cosmo I., of Florence, type of Mac tinvel's Prince, to 206.

Cossili, Hatory of Algebra by, i. 447. ii. 448, il. 224, n.

Costxaro, Angelo di, ii. 84, 95.

Costar, Lawrence, printer of Huarlem, 1. 1.19

Cota, Rodrigo, dramatic author, i. 246. Cotcher, his Greek erndition, us. v48. Cotta, the Latin poet, ii 202.

Councils of the Church of Roune, I. 293. 363 538, 557 566, ii 901 318

Conrectles, Arminian divino, it. 208. 10 273, 278

Cousin, M, remarks of on the works of Deseattes, a. 451-461.

Construyon, Spanish lawyer, ik 76, 80. Mtz.

Covenants to be fulfilled, ii. 528, 537.

Coverdale's edition of the Dunay coo-Cowley, puems of, in, $3-472. His Pudane Oles, it. His Latin style, Pudane Oles, it. His Latin style, · Epitaphum Vivi Auctoris,' 483. His prose works, 543.

Cov. Leonard, his ' Art of Rhetoric,' i. 444 th, 20 a Crakanthorp, logical works of, ii. 872. Cranmer, Archbishop, ii. 139 347

Crashaw, style of his poetry described, Lt. 32, 93.

Craston, Lexicon of, L 166, 219. Printed by Aldix in 1497, 220.

Creed, the Apostles', ia, 345. Athanasian, 346.

Crellius, de Satofactione Christi, h. 3.6. His ' Vandacine,' $44.

Cremonini, Casar, ii 4, 6, 370.

Cresci, on the Laura of Petrarch, ii. 203, Crescimbent, poet and critic, 1, 408, 11, 88, 206, in 10, 153, National Poetry by, 519 History of Crispinus, Milo, Abbot of Westminster, l. 68, n.

. Centier Sacri, i. 562, in 297.

Criticism, literary, names eminent is, i. 475. Gruter's Themarus Criticus, 16. Lambinus, 18. Cruquius, 182. Hunry Stephens, ib. of passem. French treatises of, in 208 Italian, i. 441, in 88 201. Spanish critics, 207. Early English critics, 200

Croix du Mane, La, n. 200, 265. Croke, Richard, orations of, p. 286 in 332, Croll, of Hesse, on Magnetium, in 219 n. Cromwell, state of learning in the Pro-tector's time, in. 249, 427, 462. State of et ligion, 278. Cruquius, or de Crusques, Scholisst of Horace, L 452.

Crusades, and commerce with Constantinople, influential on the chasical Literature of Western Europe, i 92.

Crines, dells, the Vocabotaria, is 207. in 129. The Academy of, in 206. 261. iii, 234.

Crusius, teacher of Romaic, i. 494.

Cudworth, tils doctrine, in. 276, 278, 337, n. His ! Intellectual System." 304, 382, ii. 409, On 5 Free-will, iii. 35 k. . Immutable Morality, by, 387.

Cueva, Juan de la, Art of Poetry' of, at. 208.

Cupacius, and his works on Jurisprudence, ii. 70-73.

Culagne, Count of, type of Hudibras, Comberland, Dr. Richard, ' de legibus Nature,' in, 387-397. Remarks on his theory, 397, 406.

-, Mr., criticisms of, iii. 96. Cunwus, on the Antiquities of Judaism, BIL 225.

Curcellacus, letters of, ii 336.

Currouty, attribute of, in 482.

Curves, the measurement of, iii. 175. Cusanus, Cardinal Nicholas, mathematician, t. 155. Custom of the Country, by Fletcher, til.

Cuvier, Baron, his character of Agricola, ava German metalturgist, t. 459. Opinion of, on Conrad Gesner's works, ii 235. Also an those of Aldrosandas, 239. See his remarks, 16, 200. Cycles, solar and lunar, &c., 1, 526.

Duch, German devotional songs of, iii. 25. Ducier, the Horace of, in. 247. His Aristotle, it 204. in. 247.

Madame, Translations of Homer and Suppho by, in 247. Dailié on the Right Use of the Fathers,

n. 71 332, 533

Dale, Van, the Dutch physician, iii. 523. Dalechamps, Hist. Gen. Plantarum by, tt. 244.

Dalgarno, George, his attempt to cetablish an universal character and langoage, in. 361. Character of his writings, 362. Attempt by to instruct the deaf and dumb, 362. n.

Dalton, atomic theory of, n. 412. Dampier, voyage round the world by,

in. 594. Dancourt, his Chevalier à la Mode, in-Danes, Greek professor in the university of Paris, i 327, 425.

VOL. III.

Daniel, his 'Panegyrie' addressed to James I., m. 50. Bis Civil Wars of York and Lancaster, a poem, 34. . History of England' by, 149

- Samuel, his ' Complaint of Rosamond, n. 197.

Dante, Alighieri, Life of, by Aretin, i. 159 Commentary on, by Landaro, th. Ilis Divina Commedia, 1, 41, 102, in, 467. His ' Purgatory ' and ' Para-Comparison with Homer, dine. 466. ii. 424. Comparison of Milton with, iii 462, 466, The 't golino' of, ii. 161.

Date, the ' Prose Florentine' of, ili. 519. Davanzati's l'adatus, il. 190.

Davenant, Dr. Charles, iii 444. 1 Essay on Ways and Means, 445. His

-, Sir William, his ' Gondibert,' iii. 89. 478.

Davies, Sir John, his poem ' On the Immortality of the Soul, it 128, in, 29, Davila, History of the Civil Wars in France by, in. 228.

Davison's Poetical Rhapsody, a collection, it. 126.

Decembero, the philologist, i. 105.

Decline of learning on the fell of the Roman empire, I. 2. In the sixth century, 5.

Dedekind, his poem on Germany, ii 32. Definitions of Words, on, by Descurtes, 11, 450.

Degrando, remarks of, tii. 314. 4 Histoire des Systemes, by, in 18, n. Dekker, the dramatic poet, in 125. Delambre, the mathematician, i. 155, Delhoo, dramatic works of, in, 485, Deliene Poetatum Gallorum, n. 144. - Belgarum, 11. 144.

146. - Italorum, ii. 144. Scotorum, n. 146.

Delphin editions of the Latin chooses, iii. 246.

De Marca, the controvertist, ii. 306. Demetrius Cretenius, a translator for the Polyglott Bible of Alcala, a 208.

Democritus, corpuscular theory of, ii.

Denham, Sir John, bis ' Cooper's Hill,' in, 30, 472.

Denmark, Scandinavian legends and hatlads of, m. 27.

Depping, Moorish romances published by, 11, 110.

Deseartes, philosophical and scientific deductions, &c. of, 1, 15 n, 449, 1d, 178, 191, 307, 318, 313, 375, Summary of his metaphysical phylosophy,

&c., ii. 493. 461. His algebraic improvements, 224 in. 181, App hes algebra to curses, ib. Indebted to Harriott, 182. His algebraic grountry, 184. His theory of the world, 192, 195. His mechanics, 197. Law of motion by, 194. On com-pound forces, 199. On the lever, th. n. His dioptrics, 199, 208 On the curs es of leaves, 334. On the rambow, 205 His 'Meditations,' 500, 314. His 'Correspondence,' 315. Accused of plagiation, it. 18, 19, 459. in, 182, n. Process of the Cartesian philosophy, in opposition to the Arietotelian, 316.

Deshoulières, Madame, poems of, iii.

Designates, the 'Clovis,' of, iii. 461. Despencer, Hugh le, letter of, 1315, to,

Desportes, Philippe, the French poet, 25, 117,

Deixponts, Dake of, cocourages the progress of the Reformation, i. 342

Deventer, classics printed at, i. 227. College of, 134, 177,

Dinns of Montemayor, ii. 213.

Dilsdin's Classics, i. 471. Dictionaries, early Latin, i. 77, 326 Lexicon Heptaglotton, iii, 221, 590 Arabie lexicon, 224. Hebrew lexicon, i. 460. Voenbulario della Crasca, in 207. id. 129 Lower Greek, ti 277. Dictionnaire de l'Academie, di 526. Its revision, 18.

Dieu, Loms de, on the Old Testament. m. 92., 225

Dieze, the German critic, ii. 107, iii. 13. Digby, Sir Kenelin, philosophical views of, mi. 301, 582, Diogenes Lacrins, i. 325, fil. 303, 388 Dionymny of Halicarnassus, edition by Stephens, of, i. 525. By Sylbargous,

Diophantus, his method in algebra for indefinite quantities, 1, 450

Disperses, science of, in 159 209.

Dioscordes, History of Plants by, ii.

Disputation, scholastic and theological, 1 559 560, n, 1 -3

Divine right of kings, ii, 521.

Bodoens, or Dodonneus, botanical work of, it. 211, 242.

Doddey's Old Plays, i. 431.

Dolster, Ralph Roister, play of, L 484. Dolor Ladorico, treatmen of, r. 442, in 149.

Dolet, Stephen, ewsgr of, i. 442. ii. 202.

Domat, 'Loix Civilea' of, iil. 447. Domenickino, his style of painting, it.

101.

Donnienn order opposed to the Franciscan frare, 1. 364. See also 545. ii. 22, 3 14, Donati, the Jesuit, his Roma vetus et nova, li. 291.

Donatus, grammar of, printed in wooden stereotype, L. 66, 148, 132.

Doni, his 'Libreria,' a bibliographical bistory, ii. 265.

Donne, Dr., his satires, ii. 129 Founder of the poetry styled metaphysical, its 20, 32. His verse inharmonious, ib. Sermons of, ii. 35%, Dorat, French poet, i. 475.

Dorprus, letter of, on Erasmus, i. 288. Dorset, Dake of, poetry of, in 474.

Dort, synod of, ii. 331 in 275.

Douglas, Gawin, his Encid, i. 273. His poems, 420

Douss, poems of, il. 146.

Drake, Sir Francis, soyages of, ii. 25%, Drams, the regular, when revived, i. 236. Ancient Greek, iii 466, 472, Of Portogal, 256. Of Spain, ib. Translations from the Spanish theatry, 59. Lope de Vega, 6tt. Calderon, 61. The Autos Steramentales, ib. the Italian and Spanish drama, it. 149 ml 57. The Pastord, in 150, in 58, 97. The French stage, 67. The stage popular in the reign of Ebrabeth, 77 Mysteries and Moralities, i. 430-432. Various dramis described, 202, 305 iii. 485. Italian opera, ii. 152 The Melodrame, 153. Latin plays, i. 433. First English comedy, 434. Shakspeare, iii. 79-94. Ben Jonson, 91-98. Beaumont and Fletcher, 98-114. Other dramatic works, with observations, under respective titles.

Drayton, Michael, tris ' Barons' Wats,' n. 128. His ' Polyolbion,' m. 35 Dreams, phonomina of, and the plun-tauns of men awake, it 464.

Drebbel, Cornelius, the microscope of, iii. 202.

Drummond, the poems of, ill. 56. Sonnote of, 41.

Drusius, Riblical criticism of, ii 248. Dryden, John, no 458. His ourly poems, 472. 'Annus Mirabilis,' 473. His carly Absolom and Achito, bel,' ile Her genus and wit review his satire, 474, 'Mae Flecknoe,' id. ' Hand and Panther, 475 Fables, 476 Alexander's Feast' and the Odes, 477. Translation of Virgil, ib. His prose works and style, 544. His remarks on Stakspeare, 92. n. 'Essay on Dramatic Poetry,' 97. n. 113. n. Criticisms by, S07. His berois tragedies, 510. 'Don Sebastian,' 511. 'Spanish Friar,' 512.

Duaren, interpreter of civil law, ii. 72. Du Bartas, poetry of, ii. 16. iii. 458. Dublia, Trinity College, Library of, iii. 231.

Du Bois, or Sylvius, grammarian, i. 442.

Ducaus, Fronts, or La Duc, his St. Chrysostom, ii. 278. n.

Du Cange, Preface to the Glomary of, i. 20. 23. n.

Du Chesne, 'Histoire du Balanisme,' by, i. 544. n. 545. n.

Duck, Arthur, on Civil Law, ii. 541.
Dunbar, William, 'The Thistle and Rose' of, i. 259. His allegorical poem, 'The Golden Targe,' ib.

Dunciad, the, of Pope, iii. 457.

Dunton's ! Life and Errors, &c., ili. 562. n.

Duns Scotus, a scholastic Barbarian, i. 507.

Du Pett Thouars, remarks of, ii. 248. Dupin, M., spinions of, i. 555, 561. His panegyric on Richer, 302. His Ancient Discipline of the Gallican Church, iii. 260. Ecclesiastical Library, 261.

Du Plessis Mornay, i. 553. ii. 903. Duport, James, translations of Scripture by, iii. 248.

Duran, his Romancero, or Spanish romance bellads, it. 1. iii. 12. u.

Duras, Mademoiselle de, Religious Conference before, iii. 265.

Durer, Albert, treatise on the perspective by, ii. 230.

Duryer, his tragedy of Scévole, iii. 75. Dutèna, his 'Origine des découvertes attribuées aux Modernes,' iii. 215. 217.

Du Vair, style of his works, ii, 192. iii. 183. 142.

Duval, Aristotle of, ii. 277.

Daverney, Treatise on Hearing by, iii. 588.

Dyce, Mr., remarks of, ii. 174, a. Dyer, Edward, style and poetry of, ii. 810.

Dynamics of Galileo, iii. 195.

Earle, John, the * Microcomographia * of, iii. 152, 153.
Earth, rotation of the, ii. 232. Theory of its revolution round the sun, iii. 189. Burnet's Theory of the, 584. Eastern languages, study of, i. 255. iii. 220. 224, 225.

Eckius, dostrines of, i. 556.

Remomists, political, iii. 440. et seq. Education, Milton's Tractate on, iii. 410. Locke on, 411. Ancient philosophera on, ib. Fénélon on female, 417. Edward II., death of, ii. 40. Reign of, 128. Life of, 171.

Edward III., embasey from to the Count of Holland, i. 56.

VI., state of learning in the time of, i. 507. ii. 59. 193. Stage plays, &c. suppressed by his council, i. 433. Anabaptists burnt, 548.

Edwards, Richard, poet, the 'Amentium Irm' of, ii. 120. n. 'Damon and Pythias,' 167.

Eichhorn's Geschichte der Cultur, &c. i. 4. 6, 8, 227. n. 285. n. 563. iii. 220. n.

Elias Levita, criticism of, iii. 222.

Elizabeth, state of learning during her reign, i. 507. ii. 32. Inferior to its state in Spain, 513. Her own learning considerable, 514. Philosophical works in her time, 516. ii. 32. Works of fiction, iii. 166. Poets, ii. 123. 131. The stage popular, iii. 77. Court of, described, ii. 195. Punishment of the Anshaptists, i. 548. English divines in her reign, 554. Bull of Pius V. against the queen, 558. See also ii. 47. 126. 259.

Ellis's 'Specimens of Early English Poets,' il. 195. a. iii, 42. 44.

Ellis, Sir Henry, on the Introduction of Writing on Paper, in the Records, i. £7. Eloise and Abelard, i, 32.

----, learning of, i. 90.

Elyot, Sir Thomas, his work on government, i. 993, 391, p. 999, 441.

Elsevir Republics, the publication of, ii, 519.

Emmius, Ubbo, 'Vetus Gracia illustrata' of, ii. 295.

Empedocles, discoveries of, ii. 243. Empiricus, Sextus, on Natural Law, ii.

Empiricus, Sextus, on Natural Law, i 30, 510.

England, its language of Anglo-Saxon origin, i. 42. Old style of, S06. Improvement of, iii. 144. Native authors not addicted to the use of Latin, i. 516. State of learning in, 254. ii. 32. Restrictions on the press unfavourable to literature in, 267. Historians of, i. 440. iii. 228, &c. Poets of, ii. 119. iii 27. 461 &c Dramatic authors of, 454 Sec. 510. Moralities and similar plays in, i. 429. Works of section in 201, iii. 166. * Mose of fection in, 304, in 166. Anglesma of Latin writers in, 483. Criticism and philology of, 248-251. Pointeal writers of, 428, 440. Theologisms and sermons, i 554, ii. 35%, iii. 269, 275, 296. Homely of the Church of, against rebellion, to 42. W.cliffe and the reformers of, i. 357. Writers in, against the church of Rome, in 268. Breach of, with Rome, i. 578, (See Reformation.) The Church of, it. 924 High church party, 321. The Lambeth Articles, 250.

RRS

· England's Helicon,' contributors to, enumerated, ii. 125,

English Constitution, the, id. 437,

- Revolution of 1688, m. 438, 439, 440, 479.

-, style of at close of seventeenth century, mi. 542.

Ennius annals of, i. 225.

Entomology, writers on, in. 206. Engine, Francis de, New Testament by, € 874.

— Juan de la, works of, i. 75%. Edbauus Hessus, Latin poetry of, i. 331. 4-6

Epicodia, or funereal lamentations, in.

Epicurus, desepce of, ii. 387. iii 903. Episcopius, Simon, ii. 319, 331, writer for the Remonstrants, in 27%. 276. His Theological Institutions, in 332, ni 277. His Life by Lunborob, ii. 333. n.

Epithalamia, or nuptial songs, in. 52. Erasmus, his criticisms on Petrarch, L. 79. Vosta England, 230. Greek professor at Cambridge, 254. His Adages, 765-276, 278, 280. Jes-lousy of Budaeus and, 276, 277 n. His character, 277 His Greek Tes-tament, 283, 288. The Colloquies of, 247 452. His Encounter Morie, 286, 288. The Coverenment of, 317, 326. On Greek pronunciation, $34. Was a precursor of the great reformers, 294, 347. His lydoobayin, 490 His letters, 349 n His contreversy with Lather, 297 n. 3 0. His 'de libero nib trio,' 350. His epistles characterized, 151. Hivalienation from the reformers, 352. His death, 351. His paraphrase, a superior semptural interpretation, 366, His 'Encharation' and ethical writ-40pt, 992

Erastus and Erastianism, ii. 338. Errolla, the * Argumana * of, ti 106. Eccolano' of Varchi, n. 206. Er genn, learning of, i. 8. Erizzo, Sebastian, a noble Venetian, L.

523. 1. 260

Espenius, Arabic grammar by, iii. 224.

Erythman, or Ross, lus Pinacotheca virocum illustrium, in 50.

Escobar, easnistical writings of, il. 500. Expinel, the 'Marcos de Obregua' of, m, 14, 160. Espinel, Vincente, La Casa de la Memorta by, ii. 107, n.

Esqualace, Borja of, ni. 14.

Essex, Earl of, 'Apology' for the, in. 145 Private character of, it. 126

Estaco, school of, a 329. Este, house of, patrons of learning, i. 223.

300 ii. 153, 241. Etheroge, Sir George, I. 509. Style of his comedies, in 315.

Ethies, on, ii. 406 in. 377, 379, 387. See Philosophy

Eton Greek Grammar, its supposed origin discussed, L 324. Education of boys at, in 1586, 51th n.

Etrusean remains, works on, in 292. Euclid, first translations of, 1, 109, 448, Theorem of, m. 176. Editions of, n. 245.

* Euphues, the Austamy of Wit,' &c. ii.

' Euridice,' opera of, by Renuccini, ii. 1 53.

Euripides, il. 164 167, n. ili 465, 492, French translations of, i. 440. 444 Eustachius, Italian anatomist, n. 245. Enstatting of Thesealousen, his use of Romaic words, r. 93, n.

Entychnus, Annals of, by Pococke, iii. 591.

Enelyn's works, it., 54 f.

Evremond, M. de St., poetry of in. 524. Exclange and currency considered, in Experience, on, in 465.

Paber, or Fabre, Autony, celebrated lawyer of Savoy, ii. 73 540.

-, Basilius, merit of his Thesaurus, i, 492

-, Stapulensis, a learned Frenchman, i. 267 547. 575.

-, Lanaquil, or Tanneguy le Fevre, in. 247. His daughter, Anne le Fevre, 247.

Fabry, Peter, bis Agonisticon, sive de re nOdetica,' i 591. Art de RhétoFabretti, on Roman Antiquities and Inscriptions, ini. 254, 255.

Fabrician, George, i 494. iii 245. His Bibliotheca Green, 25%.

-, John, astronomical observations by, iis, 188

...... de Aquapendente, on the Language of Brute Animals, nr. 208. His medical discoveries, 212. Fabroni, 'Vite Italorum' of, in. 175,

176. n. 255,

Fabry, on plain Hibetoric, i. 442.

Facry Queen, Papers on, by Professor Wilson, it. 136, n.

Fairfax, his 'Jerusalem,' imitated from Tavio, ii. 131.

Paleomeri, his 'Inscriptiones Athleticae,' m. 254.

Falkland, Lord, translations by, ii. 394. Fallopius, the anatomist, ii. 245, Fanaticism, its growth among some of the reformers, a. 345.

Farinacci, or Farinaccus, jurist, ii. 540. Farmer's Essay on the Learning of Shak-spenre, ii. 181. n. Farnaby, Thomas, grammarian, in 282.

Parquhar's comedies, in. 6-40. Farringdon, Hugh, abbot of Reading, i. 444.

Fathers, the, religious respect for their works, u. 307, 329. Doctrine of some of the, 442.

Exyette, La, Countess of, novels by, in. 553.

Feltham's Resolves, ii. 513.

Fencion, archivehop of Cambrai, his Maximes des Saints, al. 280. Female Education, 417. * Dislogues of the Dead' by, 521. Merit of his · T. lémaque, 557.

Ferdinand of Tuscany, plants introduced into Europe by, ii 240.

Fermat, his discoveries in algebra and geometry, in 178 183, 204.

Fernel, a degree of the meridian, how measured by, t. 445. Emmont Prench physician, 433, Ferrara, Duke of, botanio garden establushed by, a. 210.

-, Hercules 1 marquis of, i. 233, -, Spanish Bible printed at, i.

Ferrari, the mathematician, i 447, 450, Lexicon Geographicum' of, in. 227. Syriac lexicon of, 224.

Ferritrim, Octavius, on Roman Dress, il. 272; m. 254.

Ferreira, Portuguese poet, ti. 110. Ferreo, Scapio, inventor of cubic equations, i. 446.

Pibonacci, Leonard, the algebraist, i.

Ficings, Marsilius, Theology of, i. 136. 147 196, 196. Translator of Plo-DRIES, 220.

Fiction, on Works of, i. 495. n. 211. iii. 154. English novels, is 216. us. 166. Spanish romanom, n. 214, nr. 154. Italian, i. 159. ii. 211. Moorish romances, 111.

Field, on the Church, ii. 357.

Fuscole, villa of, i. 173.

Filelfa, philologus, t. 93 tt. 96.

Filicaja, Vicenza, has Siege of Vicano, 12 450. Hat Italia mea, a sonnet, ib Filmer, Sir Robert, bis ' Patriarcha,' il. 535, 111, 129, Finer, Oronce, a mathematician, i. 445, Fioravanti of Bologua, a. 155.

Fiore, or Floridus, algebraust, i. 446.

Fioretti, or Udeno Nisielo, writings of, ra 141 239.

Firenzuola, estimosi poet, ii. 94. His prose enchanting, 189.

Fischart, German poet, ii. 118.

Fisher, the Jesuit, Laud's conference with, di. BOB.

l'isberies, rights to, ti. 551. Fishes, on, is 238, iii 574.

Flucius Illyricus, Contorus Magdebutgenum, chiefly by, 1, 513, 560.

Flammic, Italian poet, i. 359 elegies of Flammus, 425.

Fles of the witwat Postiers, ii. 145 n. Flechier, bushop of Names, hi 165 291 Harmony of his diction, 294.

Fleming, lyric poetry of, in. 25. Fletcher, Coles, his poems, in 28,

-'s ' Faithful Shepherdess, 11i. 46. 97. 107. See Beaumont and Fletcher. Pleary, Claude, ' Eccles astical History,' by, in 262. He Descetations, 263

Florence, Platonic and other academies of, i. 195 220. Controvers that the Lungua Toscano is properly the Florentine, n. 441, 465 in 206, m. 129. The Apatisti and men of letters of, lii. 233. The Laurentino Library, i. 467. Poets of, in, 450. Academy del Cimento, 564. The villa of Famole, i. 17%

Flores, lines to by Adrian, t. 29 tt. Fludd, Robert, his Mosaic Philosophy, 11 379,

Folenge, invents the Macaronic verse, it. 94 1s

Forts ne, Lo, fables of, in. 454 456 n. Fontenelle, postry of, 10, 460. Criticums by, n. 163, m. 485, 492, 495, 552, 571. Character of his works,

K = J

521. His subgies of academicians, ib. His 'Diatogues of the Dead,' 532. His 'Plurahty of Worlds,' 528. 'History of Oracles,' ib. On Pastoral Poetry, 554.

Ford, John, critique by Mr. Gifford on his tragedies, ni. 118.

Forge, La, of Saumur, in. 317.

Fortescue, Sir John, on Monarchy, L.

Fortunatus, Latin verse of, i. 29. Fortuna, on Italian Grammar, s. 441.

Force, La, his Manhar, in 497 Fouquelon, his Rhistorique Française, in 208.

Fourier, M., on Algebra, ii. 224, n. Fowler, he writings on Christian Moenhty, iii. 277.

Fracastorous, the poet, i. 424. ii. 202. France, poets of in the reign of Francia L. L. 414. Of Louis NIV., in, 20. 455. Latin poets of, it. 145, 145, in. 40, 481. The first historians of, 111 227. Grammarians, i. 442 &c. Académie Française, un 157, 520. Progress of learning in, 1, 327, 475. lie, 479 Royal Library of, it. 259. Drama of, 165 iti. 67-76 485-506 Opera of, 507 Musterion and moralities, i. 430. Romance writers Novelists of, II. of. 31. m. 160. 217. French sermons, in 259-291. 293 The Gallican Church, v. 206. in 219 Protestants or Hugoenors, 1 536, 552 it 306 Edict of Nantes, i 552 Its revocation by Louis XIV., iti, 20.1 28s. The league against Heary III , is, 42. Language of, its correctness in the reign of Louis XIV., ni 519. Genius of in that reign, 521. Reviews by Peter Bayle and other errors, 517 -580. Entertaining miscellaries named Ana, 541. Academy of Sciences of Paris, 565. Ita Micmorra, 865.

Francis I king of France, i. 327 Treaty of with the Turks, ii. 538 Poets in the reign of, ii. 414. University of Paris encouraged by, 475 Francis of Assau, St., t. 199.

Franciscan order, the. t. 863. Franco, Italian poet, d. 94

Frankfort fair, a mart for books, ii. 281.

Frederic II. the Emperor, i. 52

patron of learning, 1 7-2.

Prec. John, error respecting, r. 141, n. Free-will, controverses on, n. 338, 456, nr 453. Friers, Mondicant, philosophy of, L.

Frobenius, press of, i. 289, 284, 325. Froissart, history of, belongs to fourteenth century, i. 237.

Fuchs, Leonard, his botanical works, i. 438, ii. 241.

Puretière, Dictionnaire de, iii. 826. Roman Bourgenie of, 555.

First, partner of Gutenberg in printing, i 149. Their dispute, 153. Fust, in partnership with Schuder, 16.

Gaguin, Robert, r. 228.

Galateo of Casa, his treatme on politeness, it. 31.

Gale, his notes on famblichus, iii. 251. His Court of the Centiles, Sus.

Gilen, medical theory of, i, 452, 454, in 212. Edition of, by Andrew of Asola, i, 321. Translations of his works, 332.

Galdeo, persecution of, i 451, iii. 190. His elegance of style, 126. Remarks on Tasso by, 13th On indivisibles, 176. His theory of comets, 186. Discovers the satellites of Jupiter, 187. Planetary discoveries by, 188. Maintains the Copernican system, 189. Della Scienza Mecanica, il. 231, tii. 194 Statics of, ib. His Dynamics, On Hydrostatics and Pagu-His telescope, 201. maties, 199. Comparison of Lord Bacon with, it. Various sentiments and opitrions of, 415. id. 550 Importance of hix discoveries to geography, 595. Gallantry, its effect on manners in the middle ages, i. 129. Gall-can church, liberties of the, ii. 206.

Gall-can church, liberties of the, ii. 200 302-309.

Gallous, M., critic, iii 537. Gallutzi, observations of, 11. 266.

Gambara, Verontea, II. 1/2.

Gammer Gueton's Needle, comedy, i.

Gandershein, Abbess of, i 10. Gatedasso, i. 411. His style of celogue, th. iii. 12.

Gardem, Rapin's poem on ill. 481, 482 n. Lord Baron on, n. 513, Botanical, i. 457 n. 240, nr. 583.

Garmer, Robert, tragedies of, ii. 168. Garth's 'Disponsary,' ii. 479. Is a l'ink of transition between the style of poetry under Charles and William and that during the reign of Anne, iii.

Gaseayur, George, his "Steel Glass," ii. 122. His "Supposes," 166. "Juenta," a tragedy, 167. a. On versification, 209.

Gasparin of Barxies, excellent Latin style

of, i. 80, 84, 137

Gamendi, astronomical works and observations of, in, 194. His lafe of Epi-curus, ottack on, ii, 387 iii, 307. His philosophy, ir 315, in 307, 309, 313, 355. Attack on Descartes by, u. 445. His logic, 319, 370. His physics, · Exercitationes Paradoxicas. 311. His ' Syntagma Philosophia Epicuri, 313. His phtlosophy misunderstood by Stewart, 16. Entume of the philosophy by Bermer, 315. See also ili 377, 385.

Gast. Lucas de, writes the romance of Tristan, i 190, n.

Gataler, Thomas, it. 957. Cinnus or Adversaria, by, iti. 250. His ' Marcus Antoniaux, id.

Gauden, Bishop, and the ' Icon Basilice,' iii. 151.

Gaunelo's metaphysics, a 13.

Gell.brand, mathematician, ni. 174. Gence, M., on the Authorship of De Imitatione Christi,' L. 134.

Geneva, republic of, Calvin invited by the, i. 355. Servetus burnt at, 146. The prew flourishes in Switzerland, being mostly suppreced in Italy, 263.

Genus absence of, in writings of the dark ages, i. 8. Poetic genius, ii. 95 -118.

Gennari, his character of Cujacius, ii. 79, 74, 9,

Gensfleisch, the printer, i. 149.

Gentain, Alberreus, in 72, 78. On Embecause, 80. On the Rights of War, Geoffrey of Monmouth, i. 35.

Geoffry, Abbot of St Alban's, i 210,

Geography, writers on, t. 186, 311, 461, ii. 251 258, ut. 226. Progress of geographical discoveries, $50).

Geology, sevence of, 1st. 583, 585, Geometry, science of, il 225, au. 170. 3 17 941. 367.

Georgeus, Francis, scheme of Platonic philosophy of, 1, 387. Gerard, his Herbal by Johnson, in, 244.

iii. 211.

Cerbert, his philosophical eminence, i. 8, Gering. Ulrick, the printer, entired to Paris, 1, 157.

Gertrand, sacred criticism of, ii. 355. Devotional songs of, in. 25.

German poetry, speciment of early, i. 10. n. 36. Its decline, 38. Imaganative spirit of, 415.

German hymns, i. 364, 416, In. 25. Ballada, in 118.

Germany, learning of, in the tenth evatury, i. 8. The Reformation of religion, 201. 342. 305. 405. 527. Character of the nation influenced by n, 193, 495. Schools of, 177, 830. Pt lologists of, 490, 494, iii. 446. Metaphysicians of, 370. Modern Latin poets of, 50. Decline of learning m, t. 285. id. 244. The press of, i. 226, 252, 284. Book fairs, it 20%. Literary patrons of, i. 284 Rise of poetry in, in, 25. Poets, 461. Universities, L 284. The stage and populse dramatic writers of, 900, 431. Protestants of, 34%, et seg. 35%, 582. 545. The press less controlled than in Italy and Spain, in 267. Gesner, Courad, Pandeets of, L 459.

Great gradation of, 492 His Mathridates, swe de differentus linguarum,' ib. His work on Zuclegy, in 235. iti. 210. His classification of plants, in 241. Bibliothees I inversalis of, 265. Botanical observations by, in.

577.

Gerson, John, Chancellor of Paris University, opinion of, 1 334, ii 505. Genlina, metaphysics of, in, 317

Gieler, Jaquemars, of Lille, writings of, L 131.

Gifanius, German civilian, ii. 73.

Gifford, Mr., eriticisms of til. 96, 97, n 117, 116, 119, Gilbert, 'On the Magnet,' in 227, 234.

Gil Blas, Le Sage's, ii. 214. iii. 160.

Gillan, 'de vi et natura animalium,' i. 45%

Ginguene, remarks of, L 57, 82, 209, 205. p. 458, 426. n. 93 149, 153, 186. Giotto, works of, i. 102

Giraldi, Libio Gregorio, his 'Historia do day gentrum," i 524.

Garard, Albert, bin ! Invention nouvelle en Algebre,' iii. 179.

Glanvil, Joseph, vanity of dogmaticing by, m. 501. 357. His 'Plus altra, Glagow, university of, i. 515. ii. 20. Glass, Philologia Sacra by, in 3'3 Glauber, the chemist, the salts of, the 567.

Goosary of Spelman reviewed, ii.

Glasses of early writers, i 60 Gloucester, Dake of, Ubrary of, i. 105, - and Bristol, Bishop of, iti.

894, n. 253.

God, the eternal law of, disquisition on, ii. 504, 505. Ideas of, by certain metaphysicians, ii. 5. 384. 438. 449. 456. 487. iii. 334. 339. 344. et seq. 355. 372. 386. Attributes of, according to the divines, 381, 382. Godefroy, James, his Theodosian Code, ii. 73. iii. 447. Godwin, Francis, his 'Journey of Gonsales to the Moon, iii. 167. –, Mr. remarks of, ii. 126. n. -, Dr., ecclesiastical antiquities of, i. 516. Golden Number, the, i. 526. Golding, poems of, il. 210. Goltzius, Hubert, Flemish engraver, i. 523. ii. 260. Gombauld, French author, iii. 21. 138. Gomberville, his romance of ' Polexandre,' iil. 142. n. 161. Critiques by, 522. p. Gondibert, poems of, iii. 37. Gongora, Luis de, the Spanish poet, affectation of, iii. 132. His poetry, 170. Schools formed by, 18. Goose, Mother, Tales of, iii. 556. Gordobue, a tragedy, by Sackville, ii. 167. Gothofred, writings of, i. 517. Goujet, criticisms of, i. 442, ii. 208. iii. 291, 526, Gourmont, Giles, established the first Greek press at Paris, i. 252. Goves, civilian, ii. 72. Government, patriarchal theory of, ii. 520. Writers on, 393. iii. 420. ii. 520. Writers on, 398. iii. 420. 486. Writers against oppressive, ii. Origin of common-33. 35. 40. wealths, 53. Rights of citisens, ib. Nature of sovereign power, 54. Despotism and monarchy, 55. Gower's poems, L 45. Gracian, Spanish author, iii. 132. Gradenigo, his testimony as to vestiges of Greek learning in Italy, i. 91. Græcia Illustrata, Vetus, of Ubbo Emmius, ii. 295. Edi-Gravius, Collections of, i. 519. tions of Latin classics by, ii. 244. *Thesaurus antiquitatum Romanarum' by, 254. Grammars, Latin, J. 20. 22. iii. 245. Greek, i, 252. 324. 487. 508. iii. 246. French, i. 442. et seq. Oriental, 307. Hebrew, 460. English, and various, passim. Lancelot's French, iii. 527. Grammaticus, Saxo, the philologist, i. 70. Classical taste of, 71. Grammont, memoirs of, iii. 594. Granado, college at, i. 16. 236. 'Las Conquest of, by Graziani, iil. 11. Translation of, by Mr. Washington Irving, ii. 215. Wars of, by Mendons, iii. 228. Grant, his 'Graco Lingua Spicilegium,' i. 510. Grassi, Jesuit, his treatise ' De tribus cometis, anno 1619,' ili. 186. Graunt's 'Bills of Mortality,' ifi. 444. Gravina, criticisms, &c. of, i. 301. ii. 72. iji. 447. 454. 481. Gravitation, a general, denied by Des-cartes, iii. 191. Gray, Mr., his remarks on thyme, i. 20. n. 31. n. On the Reformation, 357. Graziani, his 'Conquest of Granada,' iü, 11. Graszini, surnamed Il Lasea, the burlesque poet, ii, 94. Greaves, Persio Grammar of, iii. 225. Greek learning, revival of, i. 86. 322. On Greek tragedy, iii. 465. Greek a living language until the fall of Constantinople, i. 92. Appointed to be taught at Oxford and Cambridge, &c., 334. 510. iii. 249. Scholars, i. 86. 267, 475, 494. On the pronuncia-tion of, 334. Printing of, 252, 266. tion of, 394. Printing or, and tion of, 394. Editions of classic authors, 220, 263, 265, 325, Grammars and lexicons, 266, 325, 482. 487. 510. iii. 245. Physicians, the teachers of science and learning, i. 452. Decline of Greek learning, ii. 273. Early printed book in, i. 179. n. Greene, Robert, plays by, ii. 125, 178, n. 176. 198. Novels by, 218. Gregorian calendar, the, i. 525, 596. ii. 229. Gregory I., i. 4. n. - IV. Pope, opinions of on learniog, i. 491. - XIII., Jesuits encouraged by, i. 534. Greek college established by, ib. His calendar, 526. Maronite college founded by, 250. of Tours, i. 21. Gretser, Romish controvertist, ii. 355. Greville, Sir Fulke, philosophical poettas of, iii. 29. Grevin, his 'Jules César,' il. 168. Grew, his botanical writings, iii. 580. Grimani, Cardinal, his library, i. 467. Grimoald, tragedy on John the Baptist by, i. 433.

Gringore, Peter, his ' Prince des Sots et la Mère sotte,' i, 303.

Guerras de, romances, il. 112. 215.

Grocyn, William, a Greek scholar, i. 230. Grollier, John, library of, i. 329. Groningen, college of St. Edward's near, i. 177. Gronovius, James Frederis, critical la-bours of, iii. 243, 244. His 'Thesaurus antiquitatum Gracerum.' 254. Groot, Gerard, college of, i. 105. 135. Grostête, Bishop, Pegge's life of, i. 90. Grotius, his various works, de Jure Belli, &c. &c. ii. 77. 81. 280. 336. p. 342. 509. 541. 579. 586. iii. 51. 403. 419. 448. Latin poetry of, jii. 51. His religious sentiments, ii. 312, 313. n. 357. Controversy thereon, 312-319. Controversy of with Crellius, 336. Treatise on Ecclesiastical Power of the State, 339. His Annotations on the Old and New Testament, 357. De Veritate, 364.

Groto, Italian dramatist, ii. 149. iii. 54. (see n.)

Gruchius, or Grouchy, De Comitius Romanorum of, i. 159.

Gruter's 'Thesaurus Criticus,' i. 514, ii. 279. The 'Corpus Inscriptionum' of, 290. His 'Delicise poetarum Gallorum,' &c. 144.

Gruyer's Emays on Descurtes, ii. 435. n. Grynseus, Simon, translator of Plutarch's Lives, i. 331. His geography, 462. ii. 251.

Gryph, or Gryphius, tragedies of, ili. 25.

Guarini, biography of, i. 96. His ' Pastor Fido,' ii. 151.

Guarino, of Verona, i. 88. iii. 58. Guevara, his works much read, i. 389. 390. n. ii. 268.

Guiceiardini, his History of Italy, i.

Continued by Adriani, ii. 256.

—————, his brother Ludovico, ii.
519.

Guidi, Odes of, iii. 9. 451. 453.

Guido, imbued with the genius of Tasso, ii. 101. iii. 557.

Guienne, Duke of, poems by, i. 31. Guignes, De, History of the Huns by, iii. 591.

Guijon, Latin poetry of, iii. 50. Guillon, his Gnomon, an early work on Greek quantity, i. 26. n.

Guinot, M., his literary observations, i. 4. 10. n. On Alcuin, 6. 9. n.

Gunpowder plot, the, ii. 298. Gunter, on Sines and Tangents, iii. 174. Gunther, poem of Liguriaus by, i. 70. Gustavus Vasa, king of Sweden, confiscates all coolesiastical estates, 1. 343. Gutenberg, of Ments, inventor of the art of printing, i. 148.

Guther, on the Pontifical Law of Rome, ii. 292.

Guyon, Madame, writings of, iii. 280. Guzman d'Alfarache, of Aleman, ii. 214.

Habington, his poetry, iii. 44. Haddon, Walter, his excellent Latinity, and 'Orations' of, i. 501, 502.

Hakewill, George, on the Power and Providence of God, iii. 256.

Hakluyt's 'Voyages,' ii. 253. iii. 226, 227.

Hales, scholastic reputation of, i. 13. n. 16. n.

____, John, on Schism, ii. 324. 327, 328, n.

Hall, Bishop, his works, ii. 308. n. 506. His 'Mundus alter et idem,' 167. 'Art of Divine Meditation,' and 'Contemplations,' 360. His Satires, 129.

Hamilton, Anthony, iii. 542. 556. Memoirs of de Grammont by, 556.

Hammond, his 'Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament,' ill. 277.

Hampden, Dr., remarks of, i. 9. 13, 14. Hanno, Archbishop, poem on, i. 10.

Harding, metrical chronicler, 1. 306.

Hardy, French dramatist and comedian, iii. 67. Comedies of, 68.

Harlequins, Italian, iii. 60.
 Harpe, La, criticisma of, ii. 114. iii. 69.
 73. 163. 294. 460. 497.

Harrington, Sir James, his 'Oceans,'

Harriott, his generalisation of algebraic equations, i. 447, 449, ii. 223, 460, n. His 'Artis analytics: praxis,' iii. 179, 180, n.

Harrison, on the mode of education at the universities in 1586, i. 509. At the great collegiste schools, 510. n.

Harrow School, rules by its founder, Mr. Lyon, i. 511.

Hartley's metaphysical tenets, ii. 491.
Harvey, William, his discovery of the circulation of the blood, i. 456. ii. 347.

iii. 212. 216. On Generation, 218., Gabriel, ii. 132. 210.

Harwood, Alumni Etonenses of, i. 433. n.

Hasterood, Mr., collection of early | Herbelot, d', Bibliothèque Orientale" English critics by, it with it.

Haughton, style and comedy of, ii. 178 a.

Hany, scientific discoveries of, ti. 412. Havelok, the Dane, metrical remance, Hawes, Stephen, his 'Pastime of Plea-sure,' &c 1, 904. Hawkins's Ancient Drama, i. 481. il.

178. D.

Headley's remarks on Daniel, ii. 128. Heat and cold, antagonist principles, ii. 7.

Heber, Bakop, edition of Jeremy Taylor by, 11 451, n.

Hebrew, highly valued by German li-terate, a 460. Books 40%. Study of, in 249, m. 202. The vowel points, 272 The Masoretic punctisation of the Scriptures, do. The Rabbanical Interature, 223 -- 225. Eminent scholars in, h. 249. in. 224. Grammars and lexicons, i. 460. Types, in 249. Speneer de legibus Hohrworism, ili 590. Critics 215.

Heetor and Andromache, Dryden's criticum on Homet, in. 546.

Heeren, criticisms of, i. 3, 4.

Hegius, Alexander, i 178. He delberg, bbraries of, 1, 467.

Hemerons, remarks of, th 71,

Heinnigs, Darnel, epitiph on Joseph Scaliger by, i 504, p. Works of, u. 80, Latin elegies, in 51. His Poplus Genevium epigraminatum,' 53.

Holden Buch, the, or Book of Heroes,

Hebrew Cantides of Andréa, i. 567.

Helmont, Van. medical theories of, iti. 219, 567, 582 588,

Helmstadt, I assersity of it. 258, 370. Henri III., ii-42, 44, 45, 49, Iliza Assassination, 45

- IV, deserts the Protestant cause, i. 552. Conference before at Fontame-bleau, 553. Rebellion of League against, ii. 42. Reconciled to the Roman church, 298. 308. Assessmation of, 318. Poets in the reign of, pi 20.

Henrietts, duchess of Orleans, sudden death of, mi. 293.

- Marri, Queen, in 120, 293.

Henry, Dr., History by, 5, 3, 6, 6, Honry IV of England, 6, 40.

- VI , reign of, 1, 212, 492, - VII of England, reign of, i. 254 306 431.

- VIII , 1 274, 927 357, 491. 443, 452, 558, 11, 13, 534, al, 14. 19.

Herberay, translations of, i. 302.

Herbert of Cherbury, Lord, his Henry VIII , in. 229. De religione Gentilium,' is 364 383. * De veritate, 354 351, Axioms, 381. Conditions of truth, 382 Instructive truths, 383. Internal perceptions, 381. Notions of natural religion, the tenasendi's remarks on Herbert, 386.

-, George, his Country Parson, a pleasing book, ii. 362.

-. Sir Henry, master of the revels, iii. 78,

William, Earl of Pembroke (Makspeare's Sonnets dedicated to Mr W. H.), m. 38, n. 40. Ha poems, 44

Herbert's Catalogue, quoted, L. 513. Herder, the 'Zerstreute Blatter' of i. 10, 290, n. h. 516.

Harmolana Barbarus, celebrity of, i.

Hernando, d'Oviedo, Natural History by, 1. 297, 252,

Herrera, Spanish poems of, is, 104. Herrick, Robert, poems of, in. 43, 45.

Herschel, her John, remarks by, si. 441. m. 410. n.

Hersent, or Optatus Gallus, in defence of the Galitean liberties, it. 106.

Heywood, his play ' The Royal King and Loyal Subject,' in, 103 Account of his dramas, p. 175, iii 120.

Higden, Ranulph, Chester mysteries by,

Hinemar, Bishop, letter of, i. 88.

Hippocrates, Aphorisms of; Arabic version on linen paper, a. p. 1100, 1.54. His system of medicine, by whom restaruel, 453

Hutorians, Ecclesissical, i. 562.

Historical and Critical Dictionary of Bayle, nr. 539.

* Hotoric of Grande Amour,' by Stephon Harry, t. 201, 305.

History, is, 401, 518, ni. 594. Writers of, a. 463, tt. 236, iii. 226, 229, Classe, is 34

Hobbes, Thomas, his philosophy and writings, in 509 am 277, 281 304. 307, 391, 397, 408, 419. Sommery of his works on metaphysical philosophy, is tot -450. (See his topics stated separately in Index, j. De Cive. by, n. 161, id. 123. "Lenstlan" by, ii. 462, 473, 309, 539, l'olitical. works of, 528-510. He objections to the 'Meditations' of Descartes, 441.

445. Style of, and the English writers | after the Restoration, 54%.

Hoceleve, English poet, 1, 420, 421.

Hody, error of, 1. 94 n.

Hoffmanswaldsu, German poet, ini. 461. Holben, amusing designs of, i. 287.

Holmshed's Chronicle, i. 441. n. Holland, Lord, is. 102, 157, 158, 160.

di. 18. - literature, philosophy, and poetry of the Dutch authors, i. 504. 523. n. 280, ini. 24, 51, 243. Political state of, 383, 428,

Homer, comparison of Virgil with, ii. 210. Of Ariosto with, i 298, 299. 302. ii, 101. Of Milton with, iii, 463, 465. Of Tano with, ii, 95, 101. Translations of, n. 131, nl. 128, 247, (See also i. 188.) Of Racine with, iii. 491, 545. With Fenelon, 559, Hooft, Peter, the Dutch poet, in 26. Hooke, Dr., nt. 566. His Micrographia, 570, 580, 585,

Hooker, * Ecclountical Polity * of, i. 515. ii. 23-25. See also u.512. 515. 554, i. 48, 198, 331, 503, 534, iti. 434, 438, 543, Hursce, emendation of the text of, by Lambanus, i. 480. The edition of, by Cruquius, styled the Scholast, 482. Daeier s, in. 247. Odes of, i. 33. n. Imitators of, 10, 13. 103. nr. 10.

Horrox, scientific discoveries of, fir 194. ' Horness Lus,' tragudy of ' by Corneille,

iii. 71.

Hoschus, Sidonius, worke of, iii. 51. Hospital, Do P. Latin poems of, ii, 145. Hottinger, 'Bibliothees Orientalis' of, iis. 590.

Hottoman, Francis, the ' Franco-Gallia' of, u. 95. 37. His Anti- Friboniunus,' 74. On Cujacius, 70.

Housaye, Amelot de la, m. 427. Howard, Sir Robert, his Observations on Dryden, and the poet's reply, mi. 340

Howell, James, his . Dodona's Grove,' iii. 168, 428, Howes, the historian, iti. 78.

Hroswitha, Abbess, poems of, i. 10,

Hudibras, in % 462.

Hudson's Thucydides, in 251.

Huet, bishop of Avranches, his De-monstratio Evangelica, in 287. Antag most of Sea ager, in 296 iin 163. Remarks of, a 457, in. 245. Index to the Delphin Classics designed by, 247. Him Cemura Pinlo-Esplice Cantestions, 317.

Hughes, works of, a. 174.

Huguenote, conversion of the, 1 552. Human nature, on, ii. 461. et eeq. iii. 284-286.

Humbert, Cardinal, controversy by, i.

Hume, David, Essays of, ii. 457. n. Hunnis, William, poems of, ii 120.

Hunter, observations of, til. 305. - Mr., researches on Shakspeare by, ii. 176. n. Hurd, Bishop, his remarks on Shakspeare, in. 94. On Euripides, 491. On Mohere, 499.

Huss, John, n. 65.

Hotcheson's philosophical works, iti. 397. Hutten, Ulric von, the ' Epistolæ obscurorum virorum,' 1. 289, 297.

Hutton, Dr., quotations from, i. 448. Hutton's Mathematical Dictionary, il. 219, 225, Huygens, mathematician, ni. 564. Hyde, . Religionis Persarum Historia!

of, in. 591. Hydraulies, science of, explained by Galileo, ili. 200.

Hydrostatics and Pocumatics, ii. 233. Of Galileo, ni. 199.

Hymns, German, 1 416, iti. 24. Of Latheran church, a. 364.

Icon Basilice, author of the, ni. 151. Icthyology of Rondoret, Salviani, Hay, and others, II. 25%.

Idens, the association of, iti. 330-350. Universal, 351. Comendes theory of 309-311. Of reflection, ii. 442, 414. 416, 416, 465 Abstract, 439. and false, of Descartes, 440. Origin of, 465. Of sensation, 468. Sample and complex, 474. Innate, 475, 486.

Idola, and follacies, ii. 408, 421, n. 492, u. 569.

Ignominee and Prejudice, on, by Hobbes, in 1805.

Illyricus, Flacius, the coclesisatical historian, i. 562.

Imagination, the, Theory of, ii. 443.

Independents, the, toleration claimed by, 11 744.

Judia, Portuguese settlements in, ii. 252. - History of, by Acosta, it. 25 h mi. 207.

Intidelity, progress of, ii. 968.

Infrates, theory of, ii. 438. Infinity. Hobbes against, 466.

Inghiratin, on Etruscan Antiquities, ii.

Ingalfas, his History, i. 27. Innocent X., m. 271

Innocent XI, dispute of with Louis, XIV., in. 259.

- XII , treaty of, iii. 260." Inquisition, the, a 582, ii. 8. Bibles and numerous books burnt by, 266.

Inscriptions, ancient, the memorials of the learning of antiquity, t. 320, ii. 260, 290, 10, 254, Insects, General History of, iii. 575. Insulia, Gunlierus de, Latra poetry of, Iphigenie of Racine, in. 491.

Iradem, character of his works, ii 323, Ireland, History of, i. 5. Monasteries Imerius, labours of, i. 59, 60.

Iscanus, Joseph, leonmo rhymes of, i. TO Indore of Seville, i. 3, 4, ii. 303.

Italy, Greek learning in, i 82 86, 188, Academies of, 195, 220, 461, 11. 261. m. 129-233, 234. Universities in, n. 202, 257-369. Latin poetry of modern Italy and of Europe, 1, 425, ii. 20% in 50. (See Latin) The Tuseer dialect, i 441 466 n. 93, m. 129 529. Superior taste in, 1 314. iii. 449. Its decline, a. 443 Criticism, &c , 441. ii. 88, 198. Emmentscholars, Way (See the nothers, nominal in, in Index) Poetry and poets of, 158. 193, 225 il 83 -102 m. 1, 449, 467. Character of poetry, t. 407., &c. Somnets, splendid and also tedious, 408. (See Sonnets.) Proce authors, 159, li, 189 (See them, nonrodim.) Letter writers, 189, 264. Contractof Italian and Latin, t 487 Modern Lazinnes, their style, 500, is $84. Tragedy, i 427 is 149, m. 57. Co-medy, i. 426 ii. 150. The opera and melodrome, 152. Novelle and works of fiction, 211 in 121. Heteroloxy of certain authors until persecutions against the Reformation, i. 35%. Writers on morals in, ii. 31.

Jackson, the English commentator, ii. 357.

James I, hterature and philosophy in the reign of, a 516, m, 29, 46, 121, 145 His ' Apology for the Oath of Allegiance, 299 Principles of government in the reign of, 521 His encouragement of the stage, 78, 79. The Analispents possibled by, 1, 349. The Bible translated into English by, ic Jameson, Mrs., her Essay on the Femair Characters of Shakspeare, i.e. D4. Jamyn, Amadis, the poet, ii. 116.

Jamentsm, rise of, ii. 334, Jaments, the, and Port Royal grammarians, i 488. in 246. Their controversy with Rome, 269, 271. Westings of Arnauld, 272. Perwentions of the, it. Their ensuring opposed to that of the Jeants, is 495. Their polite literature, in 520.

Jansenius, bishop of 1 pres, i. 544. * Augustinus, it. 334. Lt. 269. condemnation, 272.

Jarchi's Commentary on the Pentateuch, a. INN

Jauregas, his translation of the Amenta of Tasso, ii. 106. n.

Jenkoson, Anthony, his travels in Rusan and Persia, it 258.

Jons, Zachary, in 202. Jerusalem of Tasso, it. 95.

Jesamine introduced into Europe, ill.

Jesuits, bull of Paul III. establishing their order, t. 362. Their unpopularity, is we. Their casaistical writ-18gs, 498-500, t.t. 380, Colleges, and scholastic establishments of the, 1 495, 525, 534. Then learning, 196, Latin poetry of, in. 480, 480. Their influence, i. 484, 361 ii. 319. Siture upon the, iii. 166. Their corruption of morality, 499. Their missionaries in China, ii. 253, iii. 225. colleges in France, 245 Semmary at Rome, i. 534. Writings of Molina and Lassius, 545, un. 270. See also ii 518 ni 271, 520.

Jewell's ' Apology,' t. 558. ' Defence of the Apology,' 516. Lectures in chetoric at Oxford by, 509 a.

Jews, their theory of natural law, 1, 198. it. 507. The Cabballa, 1, 200, 251. Cabbalistic and Rabbinson authors to 379. Invention of Hebrew yourd points, vi. 222 Their history, i. 199. Their hors id 590.

Joan, Pope, Apothemis of, i. 214. Jobert, his 'La Science des Medailles,' 111 256.

Jodelie, dramatist and poet, ii. 117. Tragedors by, 16% Comedies of,

Johannes Seeundus, i. 425.

John Malpaghino, or John of Ravenda,

- II . King of Castile, favours learning, t. 21.

— NXI., Pope, logic of, t. 17.

Johnson, Dr Samuel, has Lives of the Poets, in. 462, 468, n. 470, 472, 474, 311. His opinion of Cowley, 543. See also it. 51 5.

Johnson, Story of Seven Champions of Christendom by, it 218

Jourville, De, ancient manuscript letter of, i. 55. n.

Jonson, Ben, his ' Every Man in his Humour,' meet of, if 186 His minor poetry, iii. 49. His plays, 94. The Alchemest, 95. Volpone, or the Fox, 96. The Silent Woman, 97. Pastoral drama of the ' Sad Shepherd,' 43. 46, 98. This drama the niverest approach to the poetry of Shakspeare, 99. His Diseaveries made upon Men and Matter,' 153. English Grammar by, 547.

Jonston, Arthur, his Delicize Poetarum Scotorum, in. 53 His ' Psalms,' ib. , Natural History of Animals, by,

In. 207, 374.

Jorton's Life of Erzamus, i. 288. Jaubert, emment in medicine, at Montpelier, ii. 247. Journal des Savans, iii. 535, 536, Jouvancy, Latin orations of, in. 245.

Jovins, Paulus, his History of Roman Fishes, 1, 459.

Judd, Leo, Latin translation of the Scriptures by, i. 375

Ju herum de Stylo Historico of Scioppins, in 285.

* Jugemenades Savana, Baillet's, iti. 540. Julian Period, invention of the cycle of the, by Scaliger, i. 525 ii. 295, ' The Gar-

Julie d'Angennes, in. 136. land of Julia, 136, 168.

Jungius, his ' Imgoge Phytoscopics,' iti, 570

Juntus, Francis, version of Scripture by, L 567. n. 249.

Jupiter, satellites of, iii. 599.

Jureu, polemical writer, in 289, n. 539 Jureprudence, the Civil Law, t. 18-58. ii. 540. iii. 422, 445. The golden age of, ii. 70, 72, 75. Opponents of the Roman law, 73. See Law. Justinian Code and Pandeets, i. 59.

in. 446, 447.

Juvenal, t. 189.

Kaimes, Lord, his commentary on Shakspeare, m. 91

Kant, the metaphysician, ii. 445.

Kastner, the mathematicion, i. 110. Passage from, on an algebraic dis-Covery, 446, n. ii 222 Kempa, Thomas a, treatise by, ' De Imitatione Christi, i. 154. Controversy respecting, ib. 135.

Kepler, his logarithms, ili. 171. His modern geometry, ib. His Stereo-metric dollorum, 175. His Com-His Commentaries on the planet Mars, 185. His discoveries in opties, 201. On gravitation, 191. His demonstrations, 550. King, Gregory, on the political state of England, ni. 434.

Kings, the popes claim the power of deposing, i. 557. Engagements of to their subjects, in. 566.

Kircher, Athanasius, the Mundus subterranencof, ni. 384, On China, 591. Knolles, his grammar, i. 512. History of the Turks, to. all. 146.

Knott, the Jesuit, argument of, il. 324. Koornhert, Theodore, i. 551, 552, n.

n. 343. in. 26,

Koran, the, by Paginus, i 461, ii 250, By Marneei, a fine edition of, 591. Kyd, tragedies and poems of, ii. 174, and n.

La Bruyère, Caractères de, iii. 409.

La Croix du Mame, il. 209, 265, La Croze, M., reviewer, in. 538.

La Fayette, Countess de, her povels, isi. 559.

La Fontaine, Fables of, iii. 455, 456, n. La Forge of Saumur, iti. 317

La Fosse, his tragedy of Manlius, til.

La Harpe, criticisms of, ii. 117. iii. 161. 294, 460, 466, 497, 527,

La Mothe le Vayer, 'Dialogues,' &c. of, u. 364, 510, 521, Remarks by, on the style of the French language, isi. 142.

La Noue, political and military discourses of it, 48-213 n.

La Placette, his ' Essois de Morale,' lin 38% 40%

Labbe, Philip, ii. 276, 355.

Lacepede, M., Zoology of, n. 238. Lectus, Pomponius, L 206.

Lalemandet, Decisiones Philosophiere of, u. 370.

Lamb, Charles, * Specimens of Early English Poets' in 170, n

Lambert of Aschaffenburg, i. 67. Lambeth Articles of Whitgift, in $30.

Lambinus, his Homie, t. 480. His Cicero, 481.

Lami, 'Rhétoric or Art of Speaking' of, ni. 547.

Lancelot, author of the Port Royal Greek Grammar, 1 487 nn. 245, 272, This French Grammar, 526.

Lancifotti, bix ! L'hoggidi, or To-Day, ini. 235, Landino, critic, i. 176.

Lanfrane, Archiv, and his schools, i. 15 67. 69. Knowledge of Greek by, 92.

Langing, Rodolph, p. 179, 180.

Language, on the Origin of, ii. 467. On unmeaning, by Hobbes, 483. Effect of ignorance of, and prejudice, 456. Origin of the French, Spanish, and Itahan, i. 19. Works on the French, iii. 197, 138, 139, 140, 144, High refinement of the French, 519 dera, when rendered at for poetry, i. 125. Angla-Saxon, the foundation of the English, 47. Spanish dialects. 411. Oriental literature, in. 220. et acq. On aucient and modern, 648. English prose of Dryden, Cowley, and others, 345-332. See Greek, Latin, &c in this Index.

Languet, Hubert, Vindicia contra tyrannes' usually asembed to, it. 35, 37. Republican notions of, 42. Theories of, repudiated, 31M,

Larivey, French comedies by. in 164. Larroque, M., Avis aux Refugres' attributed to, his 440.

Lascuria, Constantino, L. 146. His Gruek Grammar, 166.

... John, Grock Grammar of, i. 262, 84

Latinier, Sermons by, & 968.

Latin poetry of the dark ages universally jejune, i. 10. Low Latin unfit to express any popular sentiment, 21. The Ciceronati style, 317. Modern Latin poets, 423. ii. 202. Of Italy, iii. 480. Of France, is. 14%, iti. 41, 481. Of England, ii. 483 in 54. Of Scotland, 53. Editions of classics, i. 167. 226, 472, 518, b. 226, b. 244, 246, Its sulgar dialect, styled quotidianne, pedestris, and usualts, i. 20. Clergy presented in, 27. Companion of cultivation of, on the Continent and in Firg and, 516. Latin style in the Moenth century, 89. In the six. teer th and sever teenth centuries, 437. 493, it. 143, in. 143, 480. Decline of choose learning, i. 493 503. In Germany, iu. 244. Latinety of the seventeenth century, ri. 28th 2(a), Preddection of modern authors for the language, 284. Methods of learning, by Lucky, in. 115. Latin metres limitated in the modern languages, if Restrictions on the 94 11% 129. press, a cause of the use of Latin by men of letters, Mist, Latin compared with French and Italian, its. 523. Various remarks on learning, and the simily of the classics. Learning.

Latin Brunctio, philosophical treator of, k 95.

Latinus Latinius, bis classical emineurs,

Latitudinarians, tenute of the, is 327. iii 275.

Laud, Archbishop, il. 509, 325 227 342. His addition to the Butters Labrury, six 281.

Laumoy, treature by, L. 7.

Laure of Persuch, real existence of deputed, ii. 203.

Laurentian Labrary purchased, i. 467 Law, carly MSS, books of, on purch. ment, 1, 57. Legal studies facilitated 58 Unwritten feudal customs reduced into treatmen, ib. Roman and card, handed down in perpetual succession of ages, it Codes of Theodosius and Justimusu have always been an force, 4, Study of Civil, 14. at 422, 440, not countenanced in France, 11.75 Of Nations, 76, 78, in, 420, 472, 447. Writers on Roman Jurispendenov, 445. The 'Corpus Jurn Civilus' 446. On Public Law by Victoria, 44, ii. 78. Theory of natural law of Hooker, 28. Of Grotius, 541. Opponents of the Roman law, 75 Writers on jurisptudence, 70-75. Canon law, the, 76,

Lawrence, region professor of Greek,

s. Seaff

Layamon, proubatities in the works of i. 4 l.

Lazarillo de Tormes, by Memdous, ii.

to Buruf, researches of, i. 19.

Le Clerc, John, embeisms of, iii. 247 270, 298. His commentary on the Old Testament and Hibbothoque Universelle, &c 274. Support of Cudworth by, 305. Settles at Alin sterdam, 55%. His Parchasiana, 542 On the Duties of Ecclesinstical Hutaruna, i. 563. Defence of Grantina by, ii. 532. Critique du Pere Simon by, 261. His refluence aver Protestant Europe, 429.

Le Grand, w. rks of, ris "17, Le Long, Polyglott of, in. 590,

Le Ma stre, formule speaches of, He. 144, 144 292

Le Sage, Gil Blue of, in 214, in ten. Le Tourneur, dramatust, un 193 League, Catholic terests of the, it 49-45. Sattre Memppoe, upon the, 193.

Lenke, Col. William Martin, hls ! Mores." 563. tt.

Learning, retrospect of, in the Middle Ages, i. t Loss of, on the fall of the Roman Empire of the West, 2 Its rapid decline in the sixth century, 3. The church an asylum for, it. Profane framing obnoxious to the Christian priesthood, 4. Their influence in the preservation of, 5. Clerical education revived in the monastenes of Ireland, 5. Classical learning revived at York, and in the Anglo-Saxon church, 6, 7 Cathedral or conventual schools established under Charletnagne, 6. Its progress in the tenth century, 7. Modern languages forming only a colloquial jargon, ill conveyed either grace or sentiment for the poetry, IO. Circumstances that led to the revival of, 17. Universities, investigation of Roman law, study of pure Latin, ib. In the fifteenth century, 296. Account of the progress of polite learning, arts and sciences, 507. ii 388 iii, 243. Decline of, ji. 494. 50% 40%.

Lebrus, Spanish commentator, i. 171. 308 329,

Lee, dramatic works of, iii. 514.

Lecuwenhock, the anatomist, circulation of the blood demonstrated by, ii. 587.

Leger's supposed forgeries, i. 28, n. Legislative Authority, on, iii. 435.

Leibnitz, observations of, i 309, ii 425, His correspondence 460, 10, 370, with Bosonet on an agreement in religion, 266. 'On Roman Law,' 445. Preface to that work, ii. 17. iii. 564 · Protogues of, 585.

Lelevator, Earl of, charges against Oxford University by, 1 509 n

Leigh's 'Critica Sacra,' in 357

Lupue press, the, 1, 226. The Leipsie Acts, first German Review, in. 538.

Lemene, Italian poet, ni 453. Lemery, his *Cours de Chymie, iii. 571. Lenses, on, iii 204. Curves of, 205.

Leo Africanus, travels in Africa by, ii. 251, 261-268,

- X , the patron of the literati of his age, i. 288, 314, 426, 458. His authority attacked by Li ther, 291.

Leon, Fra Luis Poncy de, poetry of, ii. 103.

Leonard of Pisa, i. 447, n. ii. 221. Leonicemus, Nicolas, physician, r. 452, - Omnibonus, the critic, 1 Leonine rhymes, i. 72.

Lepidus, comedy attributed to, and other works of, L 215.

Lerminier, . Hist. Gen. Droit, by, ii. 69 n.

Leroy, canon of Rouen, entire on the Lengue by, li. 193. L'Estrange, Sir Roger, Zoop's Fables by, iis 543, Leshe, has . Short Method with the Detsts,' iii. 287.

Less, essentieal writings of, it. 500.

Lecons, the Jesuit, ii. 270

Leunchvius, his version of Xenophon, 1, 479,

Levasseur, acquainted with the circulation of the blood, i. 456. iii. 213, Levits, Elian, the learned Jew, i. 160. Lexicons, i. 220. Se. See Dictionaries. Leyden, University of, ii. 258, 416. Professors of, in, 224 The Library at,

n. 259, 316, nl. 224, 232, Libanius, copied by Ben Jenson, hi. 97. n.

Liberty, civil, defined by Locke, iti. 431.

natural, is 939. Libraries, public, university, and private, i. 75, 172, 315, ii. 467, 260, m. 225. 229, 232 259

Library, Royal, founded at Paris by Charles V., i. 75.

Liburnio, his Volgari Eleganzie,' i. 441. Laceto, Fortucio, o. 371.

Lightfoot, Biblical works of, ii. 357.

Libus, mathematician, it. 229.

Lilly, writings of, is, 174. His 'Euplaces, 194, 196.

Limborch, an Arminian divine, nl. 273,

Linnere, eminent English physician, i. 230 232 244 452.

Lincoan Academy at Rome, iii. 189. 234.

Linen paper used in 1100, i. 54. In 1909, 57

Linnaus, his classification of animals, it. 236. m. 207, 575. His Critica Botannes, 578, Linneaux, Vincent, maxim of, ii, 325, Lips.us, Justus, 1 329 On the Roman Militia System, $20. On Roman Antiquities, 521. Remarks on, 480. His atyle, 496, 502, n. ii. 272, nounces the Protestant creed, i. 553. The 'Politica' of, ii. 49.

Liron, remarks of, it 238, n. On the Origin of the French Language, 1 22. Liste, De, has mup of the world, in 592. Lasmanan, Polish edition of Scriptures

by, 1 36M

Lister, Dr., his 'Synopsis Conchyliorum,' in. 575. On Botany, 582. On Geology, 585.

Literature of Europe, want of taste in the tenth and succeeding centuries, 1, 9, Modern languages, 19. et passem. Progreen of philology, 471. Latin and Greek studies, 472, 493, 503, in 27, The warenteenth century of, in Italy and in France, ii. 387, hi, 519. Of Germany, s. 11. ii. 177, 226, 415, 474-493, in. 50, 292-244, History of English literature, s. 42-316, in. 27, 77, 144 166, 248. Of Holland, ii, 25, 51, 242 &c. Aneient literature, in the seventeenth century, ui. Its salutary influence on the public tasto counderable under Eliza. both, is 267 494. Checked under the probibition of books and presses, 267. Early reviews and their editors, 537-541.

OUT THE HARMED MEN THROUGH-

Liturgy, Anglican, by Whitaker, ii. 510. Livy, his History, i. 520. Commentary on, 521.

Lobel, the 'Stirpium adversaria' of, ii.

Lobeyra, Vasco de, his Amadis de Gaul, i. 130, 302, ini. 157, 159, 435

Loci Communes, or theological systems, L 357-560.

- Theologics, i. 560.

Locke, John, his philosophy, ii, 447, m. 281, 339. His 'Letter on Toleration,' 281, n. His 'Letter on Toleration,' 281, n. His did not borrow from Gassendi, 314, n. His originality and love of truth, '773. His 'Essay on the Human Understanding, ii, 450, 491, n. 314, 362, et seq. His 'Conduct of the Understanding,' 377, 111. Merits of his 'Tristisse on Education,' 410. Its defices, 411, 'On Government,' 490—437. Observations thereon, 458. 'On the Coin,' 442, His exide, 439. Observations on his style, 549.

Lankmart, Mr., Spanish Ballada of, ii. 112, n.

Lodbrog, Regner, song of, i. 10, Lodge, poems by, ii. 125, 174.

Logarithms, invention of by Napier, it.

Logic of Cassiodorus, i. J. n. The Partisian achool of, i. 14. Treatises on, ii. 171. The Arist-tessammethod, 17. 518, iii. 201. Of Descartes, ii. 137. 451. Of Gassandi, iii. 309-418. 419. Of Hobbes, ii. 489. Of Jean Scenin Regn, iii. 317. The Port Royal Art de Penser, 309, 318, 320, 322, 375 Of Locke, 365, et seq. Aconcio's methods of, in. 17. Of Ramus, i. 381, 382, ii 20, 368, Of Bacon, 400, 420. Of Wallis, iii, 302, Of Wilson, ii. 203.

Logos, the Trinstarian controversy, iii.

Lobenstein, imitator of Ovid, ini. 461. Lombard, Peter, Theology of, i. 13

London, publishers of literary works in, in the reign of Elizabeth, i. 312—313. The press prohibited excepting only in London, Oxford, and Cambridge, ii. 207.

Longmun, translation by Boileau of, iii.

Longolius, Latin scholar, i. 318. ii. 289. Longomontanus, seientific writings of, ii. 208.

Lord's Prayer, the, in twenty-two languages, it. 251.

Lorenzo, Latin poetry of, i. 192.

Inberality of, 148

Lothaire, school under, i. 7.

Louis of German poet in Latin, E. 143. Louis of Germany, onth of, i. 23.

- the Debomair, v. 7.

— III, victory of, a. 10.

— XII, high refinement of French language in the reign of, iii. 519.

- XIII., nobility of his court highly polished, in 20.

XIV., iii. 243, 258. His dispute with Innocent XI., 259. His reign, 427, 483. Poets and literate of his age, in. 510. iii. 67, 456, 481, 521, 522, 525. Edict of Nantes coroked by, 263, 288.

Louvain, Bible of, revised by command of Charles V , t. 375.

Love, the theme of ancient minstrels, i. 36.

Lovelace, poetry of, iii. 45 462.

Lower, chirurgical researches of, iii. 586, 587.

Loyola, Ignatios, followers of, i. 323. Founder of the order of Jesuits, 362. 535. u. 498

Lucan, Pharmia of, i. 173, in. 461, 461, 461

Lucium, true history of, iii. 559, 555. Ludolf's account of Abyssima, in: 591. Lulls, the musical componer, iii. 507.

Lully, Haymand, has now method of reasoning, a 309, 510. Exterled by Brune, p. 13.

Luther, Martin, his thesis as to Indulgeners and Purgatory, t. 291. Popularity of, 299. Account of his dangerous tenets, 295. Explanation of hix doctrines, 296, 556, ii 530, Ha writings, i. 295, p. 560 Source on, 432. Antinomian extravagances of, 344. His controversy with Leavmus, 350. Their increasing dislikes 952. Life of, 494. His preaching, 358. Confession of Augsburg, 1, 346, 527. His character, 364. Not m-His preaching, tolerant, 549. Hashymna, 364. His critical opinions, in. 221, n. Lutherm principles of the Italian writers, a 367. Of the Spaniards, 362. Of the Germans, in 266.

Lutheran hymns, i. 364. Churches, il. 330, 362 Intelerance of them, 309. Lutherana, mered criticism of, 355. Laters of Boiless, up 457. Lycophron, Cassandra of, in 18. Lycosthenes, Conrad, ii. 264 Lydgate, his poems, i. 122, 306, 421, Lydiat, Chronology of, n. 294. Lyon, Mr., the founder of Harrow whool, i. 511. Lyons, the press at, i. 226.

Lyndsay, David, morst of his pooms, a 416, 417, Lyrse pactry, it 91. n. isi. 9. 458. Lysius, Athenian grator, i. $12.

Maani, Lady, an Assyrian Christian, Travels and Adventures of, in. 227. Mahillon, i. 55.

Macarius, Greek lexicon compiled by, i. 69. n.

Macaronic poetry, invention of, ii. 94. M. Crie, Dr., History of the Reformation by, v. 172, 359, n. 360, n M. Cullock, Mr., observations of, iii.

441. n.

Machiavel, Nicolas, his writings in political philosophy published postitu-mously, i. 395 His treatise of the mously, i. 395 His treatme of the Prince, ii. 33. He was secretary of government at Florence, i. 393 He sought the patronage of Julian de' Medici, io Probable influences that governed him, 396. His motives, ib. His maxims not so immoral as hes been alleged, ib. Some of them perilous to society, 397 Pallintion of the doctrines in his ' Prince,' 308. Type of his Pronce, in 206 Discourses on I wy, i was. Leading principles of, 399. Permanence, the object of his system of government, ib. Influence of his writings, 400 His History of Florence, its furnisman development, 401. His dramas, 256. His 'Mandragola,' and 'Cliss,' covot. H.

medien, 426. il. 186. His Belphegor, i. 435. His History, 463. Comparison of Bodin's ' Republic' with, o. 68. Of Bacon with, 300. His taste and diction, 180, 268. The Golden Aus! from Apuleus translated by, 189.

Marintosh, Sir James, quoted, u. 586. 111, 399,

Mackenzie, Sir George, Essaya of, us. $49. Madden, Sir Frederic, on the orthograthy of Shakspere, n. 175, n.

Maches, Hobbes on, i. 484. Martin, the mathematician, ii. 227. Maffer, History of India by, in 253. Magalotti, letters of, nt. 519.

Magdeburgh, siege of, poem on, is, 144, , centuratura of, i 152, 864. Magdelenet, French lyric poet, id. 50. n.

Magellan, circumiavigator, L 462. it.

Magic, writers on, ii. 379. Maggi, poems of, in, 459. Magnen, theories of, a. 378 Magnetism, inchical, in. 219. ----, terrestrial, ii. 233, 234.

Maintenon, Madame de, ni. 493. Mairet, dramatic author, in. 68. Sophanale, 74.

Marttaire, but life of Henry Stephens, i. 482. n. On Scapula, 486 Malaga, collegiate institution at, i. 16.

Malala, John, Chronicle of, in. 251. Maldonat, his Commentary on the Evangelats, t. 562.

Malcheanche, m. 485. His ' Truté de la Nature et la Grace,' iii 272 317. · Lattres du pere Mulebranche, 273. His ' Recherche de la Verne,' 322-337. His style, 323. His character, 338. Compared with Pascal, 339

Malerlu, the Venetian, translation of the Bible by, a 169.

Malberbe, a polished and accurate French versifier, iii. 19. His gallantry towards Mary de Medien, 20.

Malleville, French poet, iil. 21. Mallory at La Morte d'Arthur, il. 218. Malmesbury, Wil tamof, history by, L. 71. Malone's Shakspeare, u. 177, n. 179.

111. 94. 544 Mainight, hotameal works of, us. 580.

· Mambriano, poem of Francesco Bello,

Man, natural history of, ni. 209. His state, at 404, 529, no. 285, 286, 390, Her soul, a. 442, 443, m. 310, 312, 37). (See Philosophy) Human nature of, 285, et see Metaphysical inquiry regarding, it. 5. it. 274 (See names of metaphysicisms in Index.

Masseini, Hortense, Duchess of Masserin, att. 524

Mandeville, Sir John, the Travels of, L

Manfredi, the 'Semramis' of, it. 149 Manley, Mrs., statements of casumed, iii. 563, n.

Manners, Hobbes on, ii. 485

Mantaun, Baptesta, Latin-poet, i. 221.
Manuscripts, wilful destruction of, i. 507. At Leydon, ni v2. In the Bodlesan library, 6. Chinese MSS, ib. See also t. 172.

Manutus, Aldus, i. 219, 503. (See Aldas.)

of, il. 20th

Paulus, (Paolo Manuzie,) works of this eminent scholar, 1, 317, 327-480, 499-517- ir 140, 303 Manzolli, his Zediaeus Vita, i 359, Anead, i. 191. n. 202, 289.

by, i. 501.

Maps, geographical, a criterion of progress in the science, iii. 227 Early charts, i. 186, 462, n. u. 252—255, in 162.

Maracci, professor, a fine edition of the Koran by, 10 391

Marson, John Paul, author of the Turkish Spy, in. 560-562.

Maraota on medicinal plants, ii. 240 Marbles, scriptures, and bronus, ii. 260.

The Arundehan marbles, 291. Marburg university, i. 442.

Marcgraf, his Natural History of Brazil, Bt. 207

Marco Polo, Travels of, i. 260, 461, h. 242

Marculfus, grammatical rules of, i. 21. Maruna, 'de Rege,' ii 45. 518. History of Spain by, 257-259. n.

Marioi, Giovanni Battesta, bad taste of his school, il. 5 51 43, 50, 449 461, 466. His 'Adone,' iii. 3. Story of Pryche, 7

Mar can is on the Topography of ancient Rome, 1 320 517. His 'Fasti convillates,' 321.

Marlowe, plays of, al. 77. Song by, if i.v. Hiss 'Hero and Leander' from Mossos, 1831 'Tembration', 170, 'Jew of Multa,' if. 'Mephistopheles,' 171, 'Edward II,' ib.

Marmocchan's translation of the Scriptures, 1 474.

Marot, Element, simplicity of his style, or marrete, i. 414, 10, 21, 445.

Marracer's Koran, in. 591.

Marriage, Gratius on, ii. 552.

Mars, the planet, eccentricity of, til.

Marsham, Sir John, his * Cason chromens Egyptiacos, no 257.

Maraton, satires by, is 219. Pramatic works of, in 122.

Martini d'Auvergne, his 'Vigiles de la Mort de Charles VII.,' i. 207. Muruany on Chronology, in 257.

Martyr, Peter, epistles of, on the do-

Marullus, Latin poems of, t. 221, ii.

Marsell, Andrew, entires of, da. 474.

Mary 1. of England, her reign unfavourable to learning, i. 507. u. 39, 193.

Mary, Queen of Scots, n. 49, 114. Mascaron, the French divine, m. 291. Mascas, the learned Hebrart ii. 249. n.

Masser of Verney, anatomist, 1, 456.
Massinger, Philip, his 'Virgin Martyr,' in 114 General nature of his dramas,
ib. His delineations of character, 115 His subjects, 116. Beauty of his style, ib. His comic powers, 117.
Has triggedies, ib. His other pinya,
118 His character of Sir Gilea
Overreach, 115, 118. Critique ob,

119, 501, Materia Medica, on, h. 240, 245.

Mathematical and Physical Sciences, the, i 112, 154-215, 445 ii 219-225. Mathematical propositions, iii 1"0. De Augmentis Scientinium of Lord Bacon, ii 391, 426. Mathematics of Decartes, 459. Mathematicians, iii.

Math os, edition of Gray by, i. 31, 8, Matthew Paris, History of, i. 210, Matthews's Bable of 1537, i. 373.

Matthae, Preface to his Greek Grammar, i, 488, n.

Matthioh, his botanical 'Commentaries on Diosecrides,' i. 458.

Maurice. Elector of Saxony, deserts the Protestant confederacy, i. 543.

Maurolyens, geometrician, Optics by, il. 22).

Max milian, Emperor, patronses learnage, t. 284.

Maximi of Rochefouesuit, in: 161, 407,

May, supplement to Lucin by, in 54. History of the Parliament by, 131

Mayward, eleganor of his French poetry, in. 21.

Mayow, Fesays of, iii, 571. On Respira-

Mazarin, Cardinal, attempts to establish an Italian Opera at Paris, in 507. Mazarin Bible, the. 1. 150. Its beauty und scarcity, 151.

Mazochius, the Roman bookseller, i. 321 Mazzoni, his treatise "de triplici Vita," ii. 31, 206.

Mechanics, laws of, discovered by Gahleo, in. 191. Of Descartes, 197. Writers on, u. 280.

Meckerlin, German poet, ril. 28. Medals, authors on, r. 424, ro. 255. Collections of gems and, ri. 250.

Mede on the Apocalypse, ii. 357.

Medici, Cosmo de', a patron of learning and the acts, i. 146, 147, ii. 206. His rule arbitrary and jealous, 262, 268. Death of, i. 158.

______, Lorenzo de', t. 158, 172, 188, 193, 195. Character of, 175. Vills of, 174. Botanical gardens established by, 457. ——, House of, p. 153, 240. Expulsion of the, from Flavence in 1494, i. 220.

Medicine, revival of therapeutical science, i. 451. The Greeks the best teachers of, 452. Anatomy and medicine, ii. 245—251. Progress towards securate investigation, 247. Valves of the seried discovered, iii. 242. The circulation of the blood, 586. Transfusion of the blood, 587. Navel Medical theories, 588. Innovations in, i. 443.

Medicis, Marie de, marringe of, is 153.

Meditations' of Descartes, if 434 of eq. Objections by Hobbes, Arnaud, Gassendi, and four others, on the, 441.
Megicer, forty languages of, is 251.

Melan, on the Horentine literati, i. 80. His life of Fraveisari, 1 92.

Meigret, Louis, the Orthography of, L.

Memers, Comparison of the Middle Ages by, i. S. 8, 13, n. 79, 80, n. His life of Place von Hutten, 289.

Meister-singers of Germany, ii. 22.
Mela Pomponius, Geography by, v. 221.
Melanchthon, the Reformer, v. 545.
ii 358. Early studies of, i. 258. A promoter of learning, v. 131. ii. 370.
Countrosaices Aristotle, v. 79. buide to the composition of Sermons by, ii. 358. The advice to Luther, 243. ii. 358. The advice to Luther, 243. ii. 356. ii. 360. Character of that work, i. 356 ii. Translation of 337. Style of his works, 442. His tenets, 542. His adversaries, 543. Chrometar by, i. 463. Ethics of, 957. Purity of dietion and classical taste of, i. 427.

Mélanges de Latterature, by d'Argonne, in 541. Melebior, Adam, the German biographer, t. 494 Metvelle, Andrew, i. 515, ii. 20, 146.

Memous, political, d. 48.

—, French, p. 257, m. 594. Memory, the, theory of, ii. 443 Mena, Juan de la, i. 257, m. 205, —, Christopher de la, iii. 15.

Ménage, Latin poeme of, in. 481, 553. On the French language, 527, 587.

* Meungiana, '641.

Mendicant Fraces, their disputations promoted scholastic philosophy, 1 17. Their superstitions caused the return of ignorance, 7-4. Their contention with Reachlin, 280.

Mendoza, Diego, Spanish poet and statesman, u. 412, 413, iii 12. His Lacarillo de Tormes, i 435, ii, 120.

Mendoza, his 'History of the War of Granada,' in. 228, 'History of China,' by, n. 259.

 Mennes e Moça, early Portuguese Romance in prose, i. 413.

Menochius ' de præsumptionibus,' U. 540.

Menzini, Benedetto, un. 452.

Mephatopheles of Marlowe, ii. 171.

Mercator, Gerard, his charts, ii 255. Merchant Taylors' school, statutes of, i. 511.

of Venice, comedy of, it. 185. Mercure, Galant, the, by Vice, in. 536. Mercury, transita of, it. 194. Merca, 'Wit's Treasury' of, it. 177. n.

184. n. Meran, collection of voyages by, ii.

25 1. Mermaid Club, account of the, in, 94.

Merula, criticisms of, i. 172.
Mersenne, works of, in. 178. 183.

Writes against Descartes, is 441. Meroringian period, barbarism of, i. 6. Metaphasics, see Philosophy.

Metastasio, style of, it. 152.

Metrus, of Alkimer, in. 202.

Moton, Atheman astronomer, his lunar cycle, 1 526.

Metre and rhythm, on, i. 29. Of modern language, 28.

Memmus, writings of, iii. 254. On Grecian antiquities, ii. 233.

Mereray, the first general historian of France, to 278

Michael Angelos ili 369, n

Micheli, Venetian ambaisador, i. 528, Mickle's translation of the Luxud' of Camouns, n. 109, Microscope, the, in 202 588. Micyllus, 'de re metrics,' a 331. Latin poetry of, 426.

112

Middle Ages, eminent scholars of the, 1-13. Literature of the, 2.

Middleton, pays of, d. 17%.

Marghey, Dr., the 'Physician' and the " Purkish Spy," m. 562, a. 553, n. Millington, Sir Thomas, in, 581.

Milner, Issae, t. 293, p. 293,

Milton, John, 'Paradise Regained,' of, 46 'Lycidas,' 47. The 'Abegro' and 'H Pemerosa,' 48. 'Ode on the Nativity,' 16. His Sonnets, n. 89 in 49. His feeling of antiquity genuine, 32. His Latin poems, 56. His controversy with Sal-55 485. maxim, ii. 283. Has Paradise Lost, in fet, 460, 470, The polement writings of, 130, 278. His tractate on Education, 410. Imitates the Greek tragedians, 465, 471. Elevation of his style, 468 His blindness, to. His passion for mine, 16%. His celebrity, 470. Ceitajue on, 470, 472. · Samson Agon stee of,' 171

Mind, the human, in 148 352. See Philosophy, Spinosa on the, iti 349. Minoralogy, scientific, of England, iti.

'Mineryn' of Sanctius, a grammatical trentise, i. 197

Munne-sungers of Germany, i. 36.

Miranda, San di, Portuguese poet, 1, 413. Mirrour of Magnirates, the, a corlection of Tales, in 121. Induction to. by Sackville, 121, 167,

' Misingonias,' an early comedy, ii 166 · Muhridate,' by Haeme, beauties of the composition, na 490.

Mitscherlich, discoveries of, il. 412.

Modern, academy of, i 560, n 204, Albanous to the bistory of, iii. A. 10.

Molanus, German contrarectist, in 266. Molicre, his gentus and diminitie works, is 165, 196 n. Hu 'L'Avare,' mi 498, 'L'Ecole des Femmes,' 499, *Le Mesantbrope, 200. Les Femmes Sauntes, 481-201. Tarquife, 18. · Bourgeon Gentilhomme, 30. George Davidon, ib. Character of his works, 40% 504

Molms, his treatise on Frie-will, 1 445 His Semi-Pengun doctrine consured, 545. n. n. 384. His tenets, nr. 270, Molzo, Italian poet, n. 425. His Latin postry, wh

"Monarchia Sol psorum, a satire on the Jestite, in 166.

Monasteries au pressed at the Reformation, 1 212 In lecland, 5.

Money and Coin, on, in 105, 143. Monetary writings, it. 525.

Monk, Dr. Bishop of Gloveester, id. 249. Lafe of Beatley by, 253, 274, n. 356.20

Monks attacked by Erramus, a 288. Despised in Germany and Switzerland, 297 Yarious religious orders of in the twelfth century, 72.

Manstrelet, instorical works of, i. 235. Montago, Mrk., ber Essay, nr. 94

Mortague, Essays of, u. 26, 192. The or characteristics, 26. His sprightproduct spirit, 28. He histograd from antiquity id. His critical opiproms, ib His good sense, 2%. His moral scept even, id. By what authors criticised, id. The charm of his simplicity rendered his writings popular, "1, 16%. Aliusions to, s. 134, 564, 566, m. 282, 410, 544.

Montanus, Aras, a. 252, 508. Antwerp Polyglot by, 248

Montausur, Duke le, suggests the Delplun editions of the Classes, in 246.

-. Madame, funeral wrinten co, by Flechier, nr 201, n.

Montemayor, the 'Diana' of, il 105, 213, Montesquan, the 'Cirancent et Dreadence, of, ii. 520, 395 . L'Esprit des Lorz, $43. See also, 68.

Montfauçon, references to his authority, 6 53.

Montlue, memoura of, in 267

Montpe ier, school of medicine at, 1 19. Montpe lier, Botameal garden of, is 1940. Marticla, quoted, 1, 445-449, 11, 221

227 239 On indevioules, in. 176. Observations on geometricums, 178. 180 n. On the microscope, 202.

' Moon in the New World,' by Wilkins, un 550.

Moore's History of Ireland, i. 5.

Moors of Spain, Conde's History of the. u. 216. Moorsch Romancie, i. 251, i. 140. n., 12. n. See Remaney.

Moral Fictions, popular with the Aristoeracy, c 120,

Moral Philosophy, writers on, in, 379. SS I

Moralities, dramatic, i. 214. In France, 130 In England, 131, 1 ud as religious satire, 4.2, 4.5.

Morats, Ita an westers on, ii Sl. Jesustical scheme of, our and false, 497 --

More, Henry, on Witcheraft, in. 200, His metaphysical phthoophy, is, 413. n. 308, 340, of Edward V. by, 305, 440. His · 1 topia, 274.

Morel, John, his Lexicon, i. 510.

Morgan, Professor de, on geometrical errors, t 44%, rt.

'Morgante Maggiore' of Pulei, i. 193. 131 N.

Morhof, quotations from the 'Polyhistor' of, a 191 310, 331 487, 488, it & 58, 470, 16, 440, 540, Morin, protestant theologian, mi. 227. Morison, Dr., Professor of Botany, ni. 576. His works, 577.

Mormey, Du Piesson, a 553, m. n. 508. 904

Morosina, Sonnets on the death of, i. 407. Mesel anus, l'eter, 1, 390, 347

Moses, the author of the Pentateuch, doubted, in. 281. Mosaic instory of the Deluge, &c. 583 585. Imiriutions, 590.

Mosheim, his ' Ecclesiastical History,' t. 12, 295, 554, m. 270 n. 554 562, Mothe to Vayor, La, his Dinlogues, in 465 510 521 id. 192

Mouffet, his Theatrum Insectorum, iii.

Mouset, Prench poet, H. 117, n. Mulgrave, Lord, 'Essay on Poetry' by, iii 532. n. Poemvof, 474. 479.

Mun Thomas, on foreign trade, ns. 441 Munday, Anthony, translator of Amadis de Cool, i 502 ii. 218

Mundana, anatomical works of, i. 260. 454

Munster, Sebastian, l. 462. Munster, freeman whooleat, 1, 226

Muratori, Drosprations, &c. of, quoted, i. 3. n. 12. 20 26 49 148. ii 84, 85 Della Perfetta Poesin, iti. 88, 89, n. S. n. 6, n.

Moretus, Mare Antony, great utility of Varie Lectiones of, i. 177 ii. 280. Diversity of his subjects, 47% n. Orntions of, 400 His Latin style, 145. 499. On the massacre of St. Bartholomew's, 499. n.

Mesarus, editions of, i. 218, ii. 201 502. Museules, Wolfgang, theological writer, 1. 55%.

Museum, British, it. 6

Music church, in [52 n. Operatio, ib. The Melodrame, 153

Musirus, Marcus, the eminert Greek scholar, 1 219 262

Mysteries, dramatic, their origin, i. 200. Of France, 480, n. 163 Of Spann, 1, 256, 11, 154 Of England, 1 210. 431 Of Germany, 213 Of Ches. ter, 211, 112 n. The Country, 212. Mystical medicines of Paracelsus, iii. 414.

Myntleism, on, ii. 378.

Mystics of the Roman Church, ili. 279. Mythology, writers on, 1. 524.

Nabarro, Torres, Spanish comedies of, L 428.

Names, on the me of, ii 468, 469, 471. Nantes, Edict of, i. 559. ii. 548. vocation of the ediet of, no. 26 : 288.

Nanteud, epigram on a portrait by, 111. 169. n

Namer, John, of Merchiston, his invention of logarithms, in. 171. His tables, 173

Naples, Academy of men of learning at, 1. 200.

tical of, in 251

Nash, dramatic author, it, 169, n. 174. 196

Natans Comes, Mythologia of, i. 474, Nations, rights of, il. 561, 569

Natural kistory, progress of the study of, i. 447, no. 206, 572. Gesner's works on, it 204

Nature, law of, ill. 387, 494, 499, Phys. nomena of, 410. Laws of, 11 529-5 13

Naude, Gabriel, his ' Considérations sur les coups d'état, ' D. 521 His . Naudmans, p 564, 371 in 441, Naugerius, Letin poet, i. 425,

Navarre, Queen of, Histoire des Amans fortants' of, a. 212.

Navigation, art of, by Baldi, ii. 92

Neurder, Michael, grammerson, 1 491, ' brotemati Ling. Hobraw of, t 218. Newton, Ser June, works of, n. 125. m 203, 569. His Principa, 371. Definition of algebra, by, it. 224. The Newtonian system, ni 194 569 His discoveries in chemistry, 570.

Netherlands, persecution of Protestants in the, i. 582.

Nucene faith, the, iii. 278.

Niceron le l'ere, biographical works of, L 316 n. 483. u. 31. n.

Nicholas V., a patron of fearning, 1, 140, Character of, 144. 'Letters of indul-gence,' by 1, 152. I trary of, 165. t. Nicole.' Essuis de Morate,' &c. cf. ni.

263, 270, 320, 384,

Nichobs on the antiquities of Rome, quested, i. 114.

Nieuholl, account of China by, ni 594. Nile, the river, 11 254.

Nizol un. Mart a. It tempgrapher, i. 122 in 1800. His principles of philosophy, 17, 18, Nonh, Seven Precepts of the sons of, il. 508.

Palingenius Stellatus, or Manzolli, i. 359, 425, n. 202.

his 'Zodiacus Vitie,' ci. 148.

D-12-17

Palindius, the Dune, translation of the Scriptures by, i. 374. Paliasiemo, Fernante, writings of, iii. 128.

* Palmerio of Oliva, romance, i. 435.

of England, ii. 2003.
Palmers, the 'Vita Civile' of, 1. 159.
Palagrave's French grammar, L. 442.
Panerrollin, his 'Notitia Dignitatum,'
1. 572.

Pandolfini, his moral dialogue, i. 159.
Pannan, Mr., on the 'Orlando Innamorato,' i. 358. n. On the extemporancous comedy, m. 60. n. On the 'Amadigi' of B. Tasso, u. 92. n.

Pannartz, printing press of, in Italy, i.

Pansanus, Onuphrus, his learning, s. 317, 'De cevitate Romana,' 518, 'De Ludis Circensibus,' 524.

Panier, 'Annales Typographic', i. 156. Papal influence evaded on north ade of the Aips, in. 191.

Paper, its invention, i. 53. It supermeded the papyri, parchments, waxen tablets and style, ib. Cotton paper preceded that from linea rag, ib.
Clanters and paper bulls on cotton paper, 54. First used in the Greek empire in the twelfth century for MSS, ib. In Italy in the thirteenth, ib.
Among the Saracens it was of remoter autuquity, ib. Called Charta Damascens, being used by Arabian literati, ib. Linea paper dates from A.D. 1100, ib. Of mixed materials, 55. Not of rapid introduction, 56. Excellence of the timen paper first used for books and printing, 59.

Papins, his Latin dictionary, i. 68. His acquaintance with Greek classics provid by his Latin version of some lines of Humod, 92.

Pappus, the geometer, editions of, is. 224. Papyri employed for all documents under Charlemagne, i. 53, n. The Egyptian, m. 238.

Paracelsus, his speculative philosophy in medicine described, i 453, in 219, School of, in 217, 379-389, in, 588. Theo, impostures and extravagances of, 1 385,

• Para the of Dainty Devices, the, ii. 120,

 Paradise Lost, vi. 469.
 Paradises, Robbeck, o. 481. Of Sir Thomas Browne, 514. Parmos, on the Ephtle to the Romans, and the divine right of kings, it. 524.

Parchments, the two of them much superseded by the invention of paper, 1.53. Their expense, ib. Erasure of MSS, thereon, for the sake of new writings, ib. More uncorts of learning and record thereby lost, ib. Restoration of some effected, ib. Law hooks, generally MSS on, 59.

Paré, Ambrosse, chirurgical writer, the founder of chirurgic science, ii. 246. Parental authority, ii. 552, iii. 492.

Parfre, John, his mystery ' Candismas-Day,' i, 429.

Paris, University of, i. 581. Its scholastic philosophy, 11. Its increase, 14, 16, 927. First Greek press at, 252, 326. Its reputs for philological pursuits, 475. The Royal Library of, ii 250. Nominalists of, i 180. Forbioden to confer degrees in civil law, ii. 75. Pressat, i, 220.

Parker, Archbishop, i. 516. ii. 259, 268. Parkinson, his 'Theatrum Botanicum,' Parhament, English, and constitution, itl. 436, 437.

Parmenides, on heat and cold, ii. 7.

Parmaso Espanol' of Sedano, n. 102,

Parmassus, News from, by Boccalini,

'Parriasiana' of Le Clere, id. 542. Pariita, Paolo, 'Discorsi politici' of, id.

Pascal, his experiments on the Puy da Dôme, 10. 200. Writings of, 272, 327, 338. His Thoughts, 284, 360, 410. His Pressincial Letters, 284, On Miracles, 286. On Geometry, 340. His reverence for religion, 341. His seute observation, 342-520.

Pasquier, in 162-164. His 'Recherches de la France,' 209.

Preservanti, religious writer, i. 159, Passerat, Latin poet, n. 145, 193 Passau, paedication of, i. 327, 529,

Passions, the, 62, 337, 355, 385. Anni-

Paston Letters, the, L 163, 306.

Pastoral romance described, t. 256, 258, m. 161 Poetry, it. 128, 126, 210, m. 462, Dramas, h. 150, m. 58, 98, Pastorim, sonnet of, Genoa by, in. 453, Patrino, Ludorico, sonnets of, h. 87, Patrin, Guy, writings of, h. 364, ili, Patrizi, Francis, on the Roman militin system, i. 520. Has Decusiones Peripatetica, ii. 6,

4 5 4

561, il. 102. iii 208. Sende an embass) to Pekin in 1580, ii. 253, 266, Philip III of Spain, iii 13.

--- IV. of Spain, id. 12 102, n. Philips, his 'Thestrum Poetarum,' iii. 548.

Philo, and the Alexandrian school of philosophy, t. 200.

Philology, progress of, i. 471. In Ger-many, 494 ni. 245, &c. See Celebrated Authors in this Index

Philosophers, the Aristotelian, ii. I. iil. 280, 800, 815, 842

-, the ascrent, allusions to, ii. 309, ni 303 306.

Philosophia elementa' of Hobbes, ii.

Philosophy, the scholastic, i. 12-19. nr. 300. Of Bacon, n. 16, 368, ni, 281 301. Of Locke and Bayle, 281, Of Descartes and Gassendi, it 301. 307, 309 311 n 315 &c. Of Gallico and Kapler, 11, 36%. Nizolius's praciples of, 17. Of Hobbes, 461 Melanchthon's 'Philippie method of,' 370. Campanella's theory, 972. History of speculative philosophy, 1 an. 701 The Aristotelmin philosophy, i 146 ii. 1, 17, m. 500 379 370. Of Boethus, i y The Platonests, 146 195 ii 13 iii 303. The Permatetic dialectics, if 359. Scholastic and genuine Aristotelians distinguished, 1 370. The Epienrean school, 467. Metaphysical writers, 370 490 in, 275, 278, 300 et reg. 908. et sey 322. et seg Moral Philosophy, or Ethies, ii. 22, 494, at. 380 387. Political Philosophy, it. '5.5 5)7, iii 408

Physicians, College of, founded by Henry

VIII , t. 452

Piterae, a lawyer and versifier, is. 116. Piccolomini, Alexander, Moral Institutions' of, it '31. ' Austomie prodec-Lones of, 246

Picus of Miran Iola, i 201 204, ii. 7.

'Pretra del Paragone' of Frajan Boccalint, 16 128.

Pigafetta, vayages by, ii 251

Pignoria on the Isiae tablet, u. 292 Postus, Leon, translation of Homer by, 1 95

* Pilgrim' of Purchas, ni. 226.

· Pilgrim's Progress" of John Bunyan, iii. 556.

Pinetano's (Spanish) Art of Poetry, ii. 208.

Pincinnas, works of, i. 429.

Pindar, in. 9, 10. Italian translation of, 11.

Pinelli, Gian Vincenzio, libreal aupport of the fine arts by, in 240, 260, Pinkerton, certicisms of, 1. 260.

Pinzon, his voyage with Columbus, it. 236,

Pirekheimer, Bihhald, t. 268, n. 347. Epistle of, to Melanchthon, 343, a., and Frasmus, 346. IL

Pisa, school of, n. 4. Siege of in 1508.

256. Leonard of, 221.

Pitiseus, the mathematician, it. 226, Prus V., bulls of, against Barus, 1, 544, in. 271. Against Queen Lhraheth, i. 558. His rigour against the press, L 266. Placette, La, ' Escala de Morale' of, iii.

1901, 40st. Plants, elawafication of, ili. 578. Distinetion of trees and shrubs, 579. On regatable physiology, 580. The ana-The sexual system of, tomy of, id. 3K1.

Plater, medical discoveries of, ii. 247. Platina, the academicini at Rome, i.

Plato, remarks on, by Lord Becon, in 399. By Descurtes, 443.

Platonic philosophy, the, i, 146, ii, 4, m. 503. Theology, a. 195

Platonism, the modern, i. 146, 195, ii. 13, 10, 903.

Plantos, recovery of his comedies, i. 82. is, 272. The Menechan of, imitated by Shakspeare, 179, no. 505. Aulularus, 198

Playfur, dissertations of, i. 447. n. ii. 232, 410, 419 10 196,

Pletho, Gemistus, i. 146.

Phitmus, philosophy of, i. 200, ii 13,

Plotarch, anitations of, in $11. Transintions of into rulgar Greek in the fourteenth century, i 93, n. Amyot's French, ii, 191. Aylander's version of, 1 479. North's, in 87. Of singular benefit to Shakspeare, &. Drydon's Lafe of, iri. 544

Pococke, his great enidition, in. 223. 274, 591.

Poetry, rude in the touth and next enaming continues, s. 10. Anglo-Naxon, 28. Scandinavia and German, 11. Latin poetry barbarous, 14 French and Provençal, 31. Bacon's observations on, in 101. French metre and versification, 118. Italian poetry, i. 83, 158, m. 130, 233 449, Castilian poets, t. 411, ti 102 Prench poetry in the reign of Francis I, and its metrical attucture, 414. Introduction of blank verse, 420. Change in its iii. 68, 459. Partoral, i. 257, iii. 161, 459. Epic, ii. 95, 99, 106, iii. 461, 464, 512, 547, 557. English poets, ii. 121, iii. 27. English hear neter verse, ii. 129, Philosophical poets, 31. The norrative and historical poets, 34. Milton, John, i. 221, iii. 46. Shakspeare, 37, 80, 29. Ben Jonson, 93, 97. Dryden'a Essay iii. Dramatic Poety, 544. Parallel of Poetry and Painting, iii. Influenced by religion, i. 129, I grace, iii. Spain, ii. 102, 106. Poggto Bracerolim, the first half of the fifteenth century called his age, i. 82.

On the rains of Rowe, 142.

Poiret, his 'Divine (Economy,' in, 280.
Poland, Protestants in, 1-545. The Antifuntarians of, 548. Visited by Servetas, 549. Seemans of, ib. 566.
College at Racow, 548. in 335. Polish version of Scripture, 1, 567.

Pole, Cardinal, ii. 40.

Polentone, Secco, Dramas of, i. 207. Poletian, his Italian poeins, i. 159, 191. 208, 439. On the death of Ovid, 222, ii. 202. Version of Herodian by, 190. Misrellances of, i. 188.

Political literature becomes historical, ii. 519. Economists, 525. in, 448. Science, ii. 405.

Polo, Gd, poetry of, ii 106, 214.

Marco, Travels of, i. 461. It. 252.
 Polybras, commentary on the History of, ii. 460.

Polyglotta, various, it 251 di. 222, 224 Bible of Alcala, t 308, Of Antwerp, u. 244. Polygott Alphabet, 1, 461. Brom Walton's, m. 224

Pomfret, hit 'Choice,' a pown, in 479, Pomponature, 'd, immorts state,' i 508, 309, n. 564. On fate and free-will, 380

Pomponius Lactus on antiquities, t. 517. Pontagus, Neapolitan his, works, 1 227 His poem, 'de bortis Hesperidum,' 1, 457 n.

Pool, Matthew, Synopsis Criticorum,

Pope, Alexander, his Correspondence, in, 1-7.

Pope Joan, existence of, n. 123 n.

Port Royal Greek grammar, the, 1 488, iii, 243 Racine's 'History of Port Royal,' 270, n. Dissolution of the cornent of, 272 Literati who resorted to it, or Messicurade Port Royal, 35 Phen Logic, or 'I Art de Penser,' 102, 518, 522, 322. Their style, 529, 532 Ports, Baptists, ii. 230, 300.

—, Sunou, a rigid Aristotelian, it. 4. Portal, 'History of Anatomy 'by, quoted, i. 455, 456, ii. 246, iii. 213, 316, 586.

Portia Capece, wife of Rota the poet, ii.

Fortuguese dramatic works, 1 256.
Poets, 413 428 u. 107. The pratoral is the chief style in the soft language of the, 1 415. Men of learning in, 359. Conquests in India by the, ii. 253. Discoveries in Africa, i. 187. Lyric poetry of, 283.

Portus, Emilius, a teacher of Greek, i. 175, 481-495.

Possevin, History of, i. 534, 586, ii.

Postel, William, i. 461.

Potstoe, early notice of the, ii. 241.

Potter's 'Antiquities of Greece, in. 254, His ' Lycophron,' 251, Poynet, or Ponnet, John, on * Politique Power, in 39.

Preaching, ityle of, before the Reformation, n. 58. In Lighard after the Restoration, in 295.

Pregadice, on, Hobbes, ii. 486,

Prescott, Mr., History of Ferdinand and Isabella by, i. 312, n.

Press, the ner Printing.

Present, Mr., his remark on identity, il. 475. u.

Penting, art of, paper its handmaid, i. 53. Invention of, 148. Block books, ib. Known in Clans, ib. Gutenberg's mayable characters, 149. First printed Bible, 15th Progress of the art, 148 155. Peter Schieffer's engraved panels, 150. Fast of Mentz, 149, 156. Early sheets and books, 150-15. Unit Gering introduces the art into France, 157. faston, English printer, it. In Italy, by Greek and Roman classics, first editions of, a 15% 232, 472, 512, 513, Restructions on the press at Rome by Paul IV and Prus V., in 265. Spain by Plahp 11., 266. In England by Larabeth and the star-chamber, +67 The Index Purgatorius of prob bred books, meluding thinks in modern lar gauges, 203. Many printers forbal to earry on their profession, 20%. Districts n of editions by the Inquattion, it. Learning and knowledge thereby checked, th. Woodcuts and illustrations, i 185

Prisoners and states, Grotius on the usage of, n. 570-577

Pronunciation of Greek and Latin, on the, a 334. Of modern languages, 111 52K

Property, law of, in 582. Hight of, 551. m. 128 Census of, n. 65.

Prose, elegance of French, admitted, i. 250, a. English writers of, Hobbes, in 543. Cowley, 16. Evelyn, 544. Dryden, ib Prosody, fatin, i. 29. n. 285.

Protestant religion, the, progress of, i. 299, 291, 342 349 359, 359, 366, 495, 527, ni. 263, 267, See the Re-

Protestants, their tenets bronched by Wichiffe and his followers, 1, 457. Luther, 345-350 358. Of Spain Of Austria and Poland, ib. Of Boand the Low Countries, 362 3.15. testant controverse in France, in. 263. French Protestant refugees, 288. The Huguenots of France, 1 335. 3.52. in 20. in. 263, 288. Religious intolerance, when manifested by, 1, 549. Decline of Protestantism, 552.

Provençal poetry, the, 1 31, ct eeg. ti. 162, m. 15. Language alhed with Latin, t. 29, 31.

Prodentius, Latin verse of, i. 29.

Prynne, the ' Histrio-mastek' of, Lt 79, Psalters and littirgies, Greek, used in the church offices in Italy, a 92. The Pialter (printed in 1457), 130-152.

Psychology, the ideal and sensual, ii. 411 464 492.

Ptolemy, the Cosmography of, 1, 187. 260.

Puffendorf, Samuel, on the writings of Bacon, u. 480 His Law of Nature and Nations, 577, 586, 16, 390, 999-407, 448 Hot Duties of a Man and a Citizen, 399 4c2. Comparison of, with Dr. Paley, 407. Theory of Postical of, 419.

Puler, Luigi-poents of, h. 159, 198. His 4 Morgante Maggiore, 198 299, us. 8. Pultency, botaniese observations of, in

240. in 578, 580

Punch in printing invented, i. 150.

Punphment of crimes, on, by Gratius, 11. 562.

Partnell, German mathematician, his discoveries, i. 151

Purchas, the 'Prigrim,' a collection of voyages by, m.

Puritans, the, t. 548, 41, 125.

Puttenham, his ' Art of Poesie,' i. 417. 511.

Pyrebonism, ii. 13, 27, 194, 210, 487. Pymon, books printed by, a 267. n.

Quadrio, Italian critic, i. 301. ii. 88. Quadrivium, made of education, i. 5. n. ы. 258. п.

Quakers, superstitious opposition of, to lawfol war, it 546

Quantity, works on Greek and Latin, L. 28, 488,

Quarterly Review, articles of the, quoted, î. 93 n. 522 484, 486, it. 108 ni. 66. On Milton, 467 n. Articles of, ascribed to Dr. Blomfield, 1, 93, 0, 323.

Querenghi, Italian author, in. 50. Quevedo, Spanish exterist, in. 14. Vipione, 352.

Quicusts and Mystics, the, mi. 280, 386. Qunlet, Caude, in. 481, Quinault, dramas of, au 498. . La More Capactio, 505 Орегия об. 307. Quintiliar, 1 3. Styles colloquial Latin as quotidianus, 20, 21, m. MSS, of, discovered by Aretan, 84.

Quixate, Don, high reputation of this work of fiction, in. 174. New views as to the design of, 155. Probably erroneous, 156. Difference between the two parts of, 157. His library allufed to, in 213, in 157. Texaslations of, 543. Excellence of this romanoe, 159.

Rabelnis, his Pantagruel, a. 436. Works of, still have influence with the public, ii. 268. un. 563.

Racan, French dramatic author, id. 21.

Racine, Jean, his History of Port Royal, m. 270 p. Tragedies of, 485 His 'Androinaque,' 486 'Britanmena,' 488 'Berenice,' 489. 'Bajaret,' i6. * M.thridate, 400, * Iplingense, 491, 1 Phedre, 192 'Esther, 193 'Athane, 15 His female characters, 494 Comparison with Corncilie and with Latripides, 465. Beauty of his style, 496. His comedy of 'Les Plasteurs,' 504. Madame de Sevigaé on, 52% n.

Racow, Ante-Prinitarian Academy at, L 548.

Rathert, Paschaum, quotations by, i. 25. B.

Italizzed, Prince, prints the Polish vernon of the Scriptures, i, 568.

Haffaelle d' Urbino, L. 261.

Ramonds, John Baptiste, the printer, rt. 250.

-, the first Italian teacher of Hebrew, i 188.

-, Persic grammar by, in. 225. Ramaldus, Annals of Basonius continued by, 1 563.

Rainbow, theory of the, and the outer bow, us. 205

Ramolds, Dr John, i 555 ii. 42 n. Character of, by Wood and others, i.

Raleigh, Sir Walter, il. 125-210, 515. His History of the World, va. 148, 149, n. 543, Rambouthet, Marquise de, Catherme de Visunne, and her daughter Julie d'Angennes, celebrated literary society of, in. 136. The Hotel de, a literary coterie, 136, 163 500, 514.

Rammentas de Prado, Philology of, ii. 269.

Ramus, Peter, his Greek grammer, i. 488 til 246 His logic unfairly treated, t. 381, 382, in 20, in 302. 371.

Rammio, Travels edited by, n. 252. Ranke, German historian, i. 47, m. 152, n.

Raphael of Volterra, antiquary, i. 321. 517.

Rapheling, his Arabic lexicon, 1st, 224. Rapin, Nicolas, Latin poetry of, ii. 198. us. 50, n. Extelled the deputations Impation of of the schools, 300. Horace by, n. 118.

- Rem. merit of his Latin poem on Gardens, ni. 481. On Elequence and Poetry, 590. Hos Parallels of the great men of antiquity,' 531

Rauwoil, the German naturalist, ii. 241. n.

Rawley's Life of Lord Bacon, ii. 389, u.

Ray, his "Synopsis of Quadrupeds," si. 236 un. 5"2 "Historia Plantarom," &c., 577, 583, 585. Geological obwerntoons of, 5KS.

Raymond of Thoulouse, his letter to Henry HII , 1. 55

Raymouard, M., has Chotz des Poisses des Fronhadours, 't. 20 On the Provençal or Romance language, 21-23 34 n. On Portuguese lyric poetry, 23.3. Criticisms of, on the Armeana of bacilia, n. 106.

Realists, disputations of the, L. 18, 180. 0.420

Resson, human, on, i, 197, ni. 340, 350.

Resoning art of, it. 474 m. See Logic. False Reasoning, it 477

Rebulgo, Ming , Pattends of, ii 150. Recitative suggested by Rinuccini, it.

Becord, Robert, 'Whetstone of Wit,' by, a 2200

Reds his philosophy, in 196. Sonnets of, and ode, ' Bacco in Toscana,' iii. 453 His correspondence, 519. Zoology of, 574.

Redman, Dr., character of, i. 336 tutor of repute at Cambridge, 307

Reformation, the, its rise, i. 291. ii. 35. Spirit of, 1 369. Its tenets, Passions instrumental in, 871. 330 Establishment of new dogmatisan by, 372. See Luther, Melanchthon, and Zwingle, Progress of, 297 342 Controversies of Catholic and Protestant churchmen, it 90%. Defections to Catholicism, 308, 310. Not favourable to learning, i. 297 n. 13th terference of the civil power with, 342, Confession of Augsburg, 346 597. Controversies of the chief reformers, i. 350, et seq. Its revolutionary tend-uncy, 353, 528, ii. 35 Compar, son with recent innovations, ib. Dispute between the Swiss reformers and Luther, 35%. Its progress, 267 494, 527 The 'Reformatio Legum Ecclescusticarum, under Edward VI. SUZ Protestants of France, their controversy with the Galliean church, iii. 263-267 Church of le gland distinct write against the doctrines of Rome, 1978, 269 Re-action in favour of the church of Rome in Italy and Spain, i 550 531, 537, ri 307 The * Formula Concording,' of the Lutheran churches, 519, 543. Church of England, the Thirty-nine Articles, f. 542. 544 n. The high-church party, it 321.

Refraction suggested as the cause of prisaratic division of colours, 1tl. 202. Law of 203, Regio, works of, i. 173.

Region outanity, the mathematic in, i. His treatise on triangles, 445, 416.

Rogie, Jenn Silvain, his . Système de la Philosophic, in 317, 415

Reg us Professor at Utrecht, i. 173, ii. 4.19

Regnard, dramatic author, ii, 165. "Le Joueur, n., 504 - Le Légalaire," 503, "Les Menechines," il.

Regimer, satires of, in 10

· Referent, the,' a saure by the Duke of Buckingham, is 547.

Reid's Essays, it 441 438 n in 326, Retudeer, the, Albertus en ir 236, Remes us, a Saxon physician, Varine

Lectiones, of, il, 281.

Remold, Propoun tables of, it 227

Rel gam, natural, on a 19%. By Lord Bacon, o dot On its laws, in 587. Influence of remon, i. 166. Its influence upon poetry, i. 129. Inspiration and Scripture, 197. Five Innotions of, ii. 384. Evidences of denied by the Soemans, 335. Tradi-tions, 199. Legends and influence of saints, th. Doctrines of the Christian, Vindications of Christianity by Pascal, Ed. 282. By Huet, 28A. Toleration in, ii. 342, 143. Union of religious parties sought by Grotius, 317 And by Cabatra, 319. Controversy on Grace and Free-will, 328. See Rome, Reformation, Protestants.

Religious Persecution of the aixteenth century, 11. 342.

Remonstrants, the, if. 331. lii. 274, 276. See Arminiany,

Renée, duchess of Ferrara, il. 357.

Renovard on the state of learning in Italy, a. 503.

Reproduction, autual, id. 588.

· Republic of Bodin, analysis of, ii, 51 6,9.

Republics, on the institutions of, in, 426, 122. 139.

Resende, Garciade, Latin grammar of, 1. 19

Retz, Cardinal de, Memoirs of, in. 394. Reuchlin, caballistic philosophy of, 1, 227. Contention of, with the monks, 489, 200. See n. 286. On accent and quantity, 34. See also i. 652 in, 349, Studies Greek at Paras university, L. IHO.

Revelation, arguments founded on, iii. 388, 330.

Receit, master of the, duties of, in 168, Resiews, the first, mi. 25. The Journardes Savans, 16, 536. The 'Mercure Galant,' ib. Bayles ! Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres,' 537, 548. Le Clere & Bibliotheque Universille," 16. The Lespaie Acts, in Italian journals, sh. 'Mercure Savant,' ib. English reviews, 54%.

Review the theologian, ii. 442.

Ribeticus, Josehun, mathematician, i. 446. n. 226.

Rheode, 'Hortus Indious Malabaricus' of, in 583 Rheims, Vulgate of, translation of New Testament from, by Loglish Cathohes in 1983, i 567, Rhenauts, Beates, 1 282, n. 347, 351, n. Rhansh Academy, the, 1, 205, Hibetoric of Casaiodorus, t. S. ft.

Rhodiginus, Colina, Lectiones Antique of, i. 320, 517, 524.

Rhodomann, Laurence, his grammatical works, 1. 488. His Lafe of Luther, 494. Greek turnes of, the Rhyme in Latin, i. 30.

Ribeyro, Portuguese pastoral poet, i. 413 Hiv Diana of Montemayor, id. Ricci, the Jesuit, travels in China by, Lily 225

Richard 11,, dothronement of, ii. 40, III , players in the time of, a. 431

Richelet, Dictionnaire de, in. 526.

Richelieu, Cardinal, a patron of men of learning, in 186, 188, 149 525. Supports the liberties of the Galliean church, il 106. Prejudice of agmost the Cid, 140. Letters and writings of, 138. See also, to. 269, 270. Lord Dacon esteemed by, ii. 429.

Richer, his work on the ecclesiastical power, ii. 502. n.

Riganit, or Rigaltius, French critic, i., 252

Rinuceinl, Ottavio, suggests the idea of tecitative, in 15th.

Rivet, Calvinest werter, it. 255. Revinus, his ' Res herbaras,' ist. 578.

Rivoli, Armenian dictionary compiled by, al. 225.

Roads, Roman, bistory of, ii. 192. Hubert, king of Naples, a patron of Petraren, 1 7A.

Robertson, Dr., remarks of, 1. 4, 57. 312. His ' History of America,' 311. 10. 147.

Robertal, French mathematician, iti. 178 199.

Robison, works of, ii. 481.

Rubortelius, phnological work of, i. 490. 517. His controversy with Segonius, 519, n. On military changes, 521

Rochefoucault, Duc de la, his maxima, ш 161. 407.

Rochester, Earl of, poems of, in. 474, Rodolph 11, of Austria persecutes the Propostants, r 551.

Roger, the Jesuit, Travels of, in. 224, Rogers, his ' Anatomy of the Mind, i. Side.

Rojas, Fernando de, Spanish dramatist, 1 235.

Rollenhagen, the ' Freechmaweler' of, 11. 119

Rodock, Hereales, poem by, ic 147. Comaic, or modern Greek, origin of, i. 941, Romance, its general tone, 1, 130. Influenced the manners of the middle agen, th

- language, or Provençal, i. 23. 27, 31 54, 0, 215

213 in, 13, 154. French, s, 42, 54, in, 160, 552, Herore, in, 161, 553,

Of chivalry, i. 485. ii. 212. Of Italy, 159. English, ii. 358. nme. See Latin and Learning. Uni-Rame. versity or gymnastim of, t. 26%. Ltbrary of the Vaturan, n. 259. Topography of aucient, 517 Poppin on the rums of, t. 143 Jurisprachance of, in 79, 540, 584 in 400 347, 448, &c Works of Manutius, Sigmus, Robertelius, and Gruche is, respecting the history and antiquitae of, i. 517, 518. Cicero, Lory, Dionyseus, Gelius, and Pomponius, respecting the same, 590. Modern poets of, in. (53. On the mu tary system of, 500. Home sucked by Bourbon, i. 314. Sale of Indulgences, &c., attacked by Luther and Zwingle, a 291 Church of states of Europe which disavoued its tenets, on the rise of the Reformation, +12, &c. (See Reformation.) Reaction in favour of Home, 530. Its causes, 537, 11, 308. Temporal supremacy of the popes, i. 55 a 298. Decline of papal influonce, 304 at. 238. Controversy on papal power, i. 336, 457. at. 306. Disc pline of the elergy, 531, 538.

Influence of the Jeausts, 532, 535. Rondelet, ' Ichthyology' of, ii 238 Romani, Pierre, poetry of, n. 4, nt. 21. 32 43H.

Roquefort, 'E'tat de la Poesie Française,' 1. 33.

Rosa, Salestor, satures of, in. 459 Reserving theories of, i. 13, 18, 181 Roscoe, Walsam, his criticism on poetscal prose, 1, 83, n, 25+ n. Obligations to, 263, n. His Leo X., 464, n.

APRIL A Rescommon, Earl of, poems by, 10, 479. Rose, or Rosseus, 'de justa respublice as reges potentate," is 42 44 51h. Rosen, Dr., Arabam algebra translated by, ii. 2500 n.

Rossi, or Erythmeus, collections of, i.

Rota, Bernaldino, poetry of, it 88. Hothman, the geometrician, it. 227 Horron, plays of, in 5% n. Wen-eeslas of, an Routh, Dr., ' Religiose Sacra ' of, v. 12 Howley, poems of, s. 161. Dramatic works of, as 123.

-. Thomas, poems attributed to, i. 164.

Roy, General, bus 'Military Antiquities,' åre., i. 591. m.

Royal Society of London, it, 431 in 56%. The Philosophical Fransactions of son 30% 382, 183.

Ruarus, epistles of, ii. 337.

Rubbs, the 'Parmaso Italiano' of, ii. 86.

Rubens, Albert, on the Roman costume, iil 254.

Rucellar, 'Rosmunda' of, i 263, 264. The Bees of, an imitation of Virgila fourth Georgie, 409.

Rusbrek, Olans, on beteals, iti. 219. Rueda, Lope de, Spanish plays of, i. 428, 4 29.

Ruel, John, i. 328. His translation of Dioseorishes on botany, 457. ' De natura sterpium,' id.

Rulmkemus, his prace of Muretus, i.

Rumphius, Herbarium Amboinense of, 10. 583.

Russell, poems of, ii. 104, a.

Hutchest, the poet, i. 3th Rutgerson, 'Varue Lectiones' of, ii. 7K1.

Ruysch, Dutch physician, art of injecting anatomical preparations perfected by, tit. 588.

Sanvedro, a political moralist, ii. 525 Sibinus, George, a Latin poet, ii. 144. Socchetti, Itanian movelist, a. 159, Sachs, Hans, German dramatic poet, i. 5005 415, 441, m.

Sackville's ' Induction to the Mizrour of Magistrates, a. 121, 167. His Gorbodue,' 167.

Sacy, M de, French author, m. 272. Sadier, Sir Halph, emberry of, 1 335. Sadolet, Cardinal, reputation of, 1, 262. 316 n. n. 289 Observations of, t. 412, n. 425, 439, n. 464. His street party, 537.

"Sad Shepherd" of Ben Jonson, ili, 97 Saint Real, the abbe de, to 288 n.

Sainte Marthe, or Sammarthanus, Laim poet, n. 145 nr 481. Has Padotrophia, in 145.

Salam nea, university of, 1-18. Lectures at, by Labrica, 171, 172

Sales, St. Francis de, writings of, il. 361,

Salif, references to, m. 4, 11, 131-520 Salisbury, John of, History of, i. 4-16. 73 181. Learning of, 70. Style of, 71, Sallo, Denis de, publishes the first re-108W . 11. 515.

Sallust, influence of, n. 268 283.

Salmanius, Clarefe, erudition of, II. 135. His ' Phinister Exercitationen' and other works, it De Lingua Hellemistical, in 276. Death of, in. 245. Salutato, Coloccio, on Plutarch, L 93.

An ornament of learning in the four-teenth century, 83 n.

Salvator Ross, satures of, iii, 453.

Salviani e Animalium aquatilium historia, n. 138.

Salvinti, his attack on Tasso, entitled L'Infarmato, ii. 207.

Salvini, a bigotted Florentine, remarks by, iti 3,

Samaritan Pentateuch, the, iii, 222,

Sammarthanus, p. 145. m. 481. Sancher, Ibonas, works of, n. 14, 15, 16. Sancroft, Archbohop, bis 'Fur predesti-natus, in. 272. Sanctios, his Grammar, t. 489, iii 246. Sanctorius, ' de Medicina statica,' hi.

220. Sanderson, an English casaist, ii. 507.

Sanderson, an English cashist, ii. 507. Sandy's sermons, i. 662.

Sannazaro, excellent genius of, the Italian pact, 1, 258, 412. Latin poetry of, 423, 11, 202 in, 424, 481. * Arcadia.* of, 1, 258, 413, 11, 213.

Sanson, Nicolas, his maps, ni. 592.

Santis, De. economist, ii 527.

Santeul, Latin poetry of Santolius, or, 111, 188.

Soppho, translated by Madame Dacler, in. 247.

Sameens of Spain, i. 30. Refinement of, 200 Collegiate foundations not derived from, 16.

Sarbievos, Casimir, modern Latin poet, m. 50, 51

Sarpi, Father Paul, ii. 294, n. His account of the work of Bellarmin, 299 n, His writings, 212. His medical discoveries, 300, n. iii. 60. His religious tenets, 301. See n.

Sarrann, French poet, id. 21.

Saure, Origin and Progress of, by Dryden, in 544.

Sammuse, Claude, works of, n. 283, Sammur, La Forgu of, nr. ..17.

Savigny, De, quotations from, i. 61.

Savile, Sir Henry, t. 514, 529 His edition of Chrysostom, u. 275.

Saxony, the Reformation protected in, i. 202.

Scala, Fliminio, extempormeous comedy introduced by, in 60.

Scaliger, Joseph, critical remarks of, i. 483, 504. if. 147. I thronology of, i. 524. Julian period invented by, 525. The "Scaligerma," 534. ii. 553. ii. 249. ii. Epitaph by Human on, 504. ii. 'De emendatione temporum of, i. 324. I iii knowledge of Arabic, ii. 250. iii. 224. Latin poetry of, ii. 145. ii. Criticistos by the Scaligers, i 553. p. 562. n. iz. 274. 287. * Sealigerana,* iii 541.

Scaliger, Julius Carac, I. 320, 504, * Decauses Latina linguay, i. 120, His * Poetics, i. 200, 202, Insective of, against the * Ciceronanus, i. 349, Soundmann, early poetry of, s. 10. Legends of, an. 27.

Scapula, his Abralgment of Stephens's 1 mazurus, i 48%. Distict on, & n. Operious on the Lexicon of, 486 s.

Scaraba is equilam quarit' of Ermanus,
 1. 280–282.

Searron, Abbé, the Roman commque of, na. 555.

Schemer, the Jesuit, optical discoveries of, in. 2.9.

Schreffer, Peter, his inventious in printing, 1, 150.

Scheiding Melissus, in, 507,

Schlegel, Frederic, his opinion that Latther a report of Satanceviaions bordered on towardy, 1, 366, Schum, treatises on, il. 327, 328, a. Schmidt, Ernsmus, observations of, L. 557. His Pindar, ii. 276.

Scholastic philosophy, its slow defeat, L 37%. Defended by the universities, 477.

treatises, ii. 2. Character of certain, ii. "02.

Schools, cathedral and conventual, under tharlamagne and nit successors, a. 6, 7, n. State of English set ools in the time of Henry VIII., a. 336 English, institutions and regulations of, in the reign of Elizabeth, 510, 511.

Science, atite of, a 442 in 170. Lord Baron 'de augmentis acientus min, in, 591 et sej. Hobbes's chart of haman, ii. 449, 480. Institutions for the adval comest of, in 564.

Scroppins, Gaspar, controversies of H. 284. Hisphaelogical works, in 283. Grammur of, ii 245, 288. On the style of Lipsus, i. 4ab.

Scot. his ' Discovery of Watchersk,' i. 90, n. 511, 546, 515.

- of Soutstarret, Latin elegies of, in.

Scotland, state of classical learning in, 1 514. Latin poets of, in. 53. Calvinits of, ii. 43.

Scott, Sir Walter, (ii 473,

Scotti, his ' Monarchia Solipsorum,' ni,

Scottish dialect, ancient poems in the, 1, 259, 417, n. Scotus, Dans, barbarous character of his sophistry, i, 507, n.

Erigens, John, his myticism, i. 8.

Scriptures, Holy, first printed Bible, a 152. Erisman's New Testament, 266, 283. Tyndale's New Testament, +57. 173. English Bible under the authosity of James 1, ii. 366. Italian versions, t 357. The Vulgate, 567. Hebrew, Syrine, and Challa e text, a 907 h 240, on 221. The Pentatouch in Summitan characters, 2001. Masoretic text, and vowel points, 224, 225. The Decalogue, n. 505. Frankitian of part of, into Greek hear noters, in. 24). A theopie New Pestament, s, 460 The Hebrew chromology, in. 256 Expositions of, a. 50% iii, 750% Lettin versions and Roman editions, 566 Protestant editions of, k. 375, 567. Polygott Rible of Alcala, i. Nos. Versions of, into modern languages, 1, 124 and, 567 Forty eight editions of the Bible prohibited by Rome, 266.

Seuders, Mademoiselle de, Heroie remanees of, in 160-16% i, 460, 553. Sendery, observations on the 'Cid' of Corneille by, DL 140,

Seba, Advodatus, a Gallo, Latin poet, il. 144. Objects and views, 137. Apology for, a. 27

Sebonde Raimond de, i. 136.

Seckendorf attacks the motives of Erusmus, a 350, a. Remarks on Luther by, 295.

Secundary Latin poems of, ii. 14% Sedaco, his ' Parnaso Espanol,' in 102. 10% in 12.

Segueri, Paolo, sermons of, iil. 519.

Segar, History by, a 4-5;

Segrais, pastoral poetry of, iii. 460. His nores, 555. 'Sogramana,' &c., 547.

Segutor, President, library of al 242. So contists, writers of the extensib centrary, in. 4.

Sel ten, his treatise 'de Jure naturali janta Hetanos, ii, 507, 508 iii 223, 225, · Lubte-Pilk 'of, ii, 357, n. 508. His controversy on fisheries, the · Mire liberum une clausem,' 651 Acundeian Murbles' of, in 291.

Self beforee, right of at 549

Sons Peligre on tenets, n. 222, 320, Searce, tragedors of, in 153, 164 268, ,13

Sensation, Hobbeck theory of, ii. 462. bens lity, universal, theory of CamSergardi, satures of, in Latin, iii. 481.

Seri o, treatmen by, il. 230.

Semons of the statements century, i. 168. Serra, Automo, on the means of obtaking in mey without mines, it 525. Prime of Venice by, 326. On commercial exchange, 527.

Servetus, tenets and works of, i. $60. Put to death at General 146, 549 in 344. Account of his Christianismi Restrictio, 213, 547, n. 548, n. 111.

213, 214 8.

· Seven Champions of Christendom' by

Johnson, ir 21st

Sévigne, Madame de, letters of, iti 524. Her talent, 525. Want of sensibility Colloquial style of, ste in n.

Serille University, lectures at, L 171,

Shadwell's plays, immoral, iii, 515, 316. Sature on, by Dryden, 474

Shakspeare, William, his poems, Venus and Adoors, it 127, 176. Lucrece, th. His life and early place, 177, &c. Few diliterations by Shakspeare, nor any by Lope de Vega, 155. Has so nets, in 37. Plays of - I wellth Night, 80. Merry Wives of Windsor, ic. 509. Measure for Measure, ii. 168, 212. iii. 82. King Lear, 84. Tunon of Athens, 85. Penseles, ii. 177, n. in. 86. The historical plays of, n. 184. Julius Casar, in. 87, 88. 489. Antony and Cleopatra, 87. Othella, 89. Cornolanus, 88. Righ-ard 11., 91. Tempest, 89. His other plays, 87, 89, 91, 106. Henry VI., whence taken, ii. 171. 176 Councily of Errors, 177, iii. 505. Midstammer Night's Dream, ii 179. Two Gentlemen of Varous, 178. Love's Labour Last, & Tammy of the Shrew, sb. Romeo and Junet, 181, 182. Merchant of Venice, 183. 373. in 542. As You Lake it, ii. Cymbeline, 212. 185. Auto-blographical poems of, by G. A Brown, i. 28 Retirement and death of, in, 77 n 82. Greatness of his genius, 17 n. 29. Orientaes of his genus, it 32 his 29. Judgment of, 50. His pospolarity, 51. 63. Critica on his drinna, ab. Bryden's remarks on, 113. B. See also ii, 170, p. 174, 198, in 421, 513. Sharrock, 'de-effens,' &c. us. 349.

Shepherd, life of Poggio by, i. 83. n. Specialan, plays of 10 50%. Shirary, works of, m. 119. Comedies of, 120 514.

Sibilet, Thomas, the ' Art postague' of,

i. 443. His 'Iphigenia' of Euripides, #HDI Sidonius, observations of, i. 20. Siens, the 'Rozzi' of, ii. 262. 'Intronati' of, i. 465. Sigismund, Emperor, literature encouraged by, i. 97.

ants by, i. 531.

Sigonius, works of, i. 391. 490. De consolatione, 509. On the Athenian Polity, 520. On Roman Antiquity, 517. De jure civium Rom, and de jure Italia, 519.

Silvester's translation of the Creation, or La Semaine, by Du Bartaa, ii. 116. Poems ascribed to, 126. iii. 44.

Simler, George, a schoolmaster at Hesse, i. 254.

Simon, le Père, iii. 281. Critical History of, 298. 590. Criticisms of, i. 460. Singers of Germany, i. 36. iii. 22. Sionnta, Hebraist, iii. 222. 224. Sirmond, the historian, ii. 355. Sismondi, criticisms of, i. 26. ii. 66. 155. Sixtus V., i. 566. ii. 250. 258. The Sixtine Bible published by, i. 566.

Skelton's rhymes, i. 307. 432.

Smetius, Martin, works on Antiquities by, ii. 290, 291.

Smiglecius, the Logician, iii. 302. n. Smith, professor at Cambridge, i. 534. —— Adam, Works of, ii. 582, 583. Saell, Willibrod, his 'Cyclometricus,' iii.

Solida, the ratio of, iii. 177. Solinas, his 'Polyhistor,' ii. 283. Solis, Antonio de, 'Conquest of Mexico' by, iii. 594.

Solon, philosophy of, it. 548.

Somets, Italian, ii. 83. et seg. iii. 449—452. French, ii. 413. Of Milton, iii. 49. Of Shakspeare, 37. Of Drummond of Hawthornden, 41. Of the Earl of Stirling, tb. Construction of, 42. u.

Sophocles, style of, iii. 465. 472. 557. Sorbonne, the, i. 228. iii. 272. 300. Soto, Peter, confessor to Charles V., i. 367. 544. ii. 506.

Barahona de, poetry of, ii, 106.
Dominie, De Justitiâ, ii. 22. 82.
Soul, seat of the, on, ii. 444. iii. 313.

VOL. tit.

Sours, Manuel Faria y, sonnets of, iii.

South, Dr., sermons of, iii. 275. 296. Southampton, Lord, friend of Shakspeare, ii. 176.

Southern, his Fatal Discovery, iii. 513. Oroonoko, ib.

Southey, Mr., his edition of Hawes, i. 905. Remarks of, ii, 198. n. 213. Edition of Poets by, iii. 27.

Southwell, Robert, the Jesuit, poems of, ii. 126.

Sovereign, and sovereign power, the, ii. 532, 546.

Spain, dramatic productions of, i. 256. 428. ii. 153. iii. 59. 62. Poets of. i. 327. 411. ii. 102. iii. 11. Epic poets, ii. 106. Persecution for religion, in, i. 361. Prose writers of, iii, 132. Cervantes, 154. Library of the Escurial Palace, ii. 259. n. iii. 225. Of Alcala and Salamanca, 259. Loyola and the Jesuits of, i. 593. Philologists and literati of, i. 329, 440. Metaphysicians of, ii. 370. Philip II. and the Inquisition of, i. 531. 558. ii. 266. Prohibited books in, 102. Romances of, Ballads of, i. 231. ii. 110. 213. 110.

Spanish Curate' of Fletcher, iii, 102. Spanheim, Esckiel, Nusmismatics of, ii. 292. iii. 245. 255, 256.

Speculum humanæ salvationis, the, i, 208.

Speed, maps of in 1646, iii. 228. Speed, maps of in 1646, iii. 228. Spelman, Glossary of, iii. 536. Spencer, 'de Legibus Hebrasorum,' iii. 590.

Spener, writings of, iii. 280.
Spenser, Edmund, his school of poetry,
i. 229. iii. 27. 29. His 'Shepherd's Kalendar,' ii. 123. 210. His 'Epithalamium,' 127. The 'Faery Queen' of, 134—141. Compared with Ariosto, 186. Political works of, 199.
Sperone Speroni, his tragedy of 'Canace,'

i. 427. 440. Dialogues of, 389. Spiegel, Dutch poet, his works, iii. 25. Spinosa, system of, ii. 5. The 'Tractatus theologico politicus' of, iii. 281. Ethica or Moral System of, 342. et seq. 384.

Spinosism, character of, iii. 354. Spiritual dramas of Spain and Portugal, i. 256.

Spondanus continues the Annals of Baronius, ii. 355. Sprengel, medical remarks of, ii. 246.

iii. 214, 215. 219. n. 220. 576.

7.1

St. Vincent, Gregory, geometry of, iii.

Strei, Madame de, her ' Corinne,' 1 86. liberrations of on Bomeo and Ju-Staut, n. 182.

Stair, Lord, work by, ii, 45 i. n.

Stampa, Gaspara, an Italian critic, ti. 88, 90, 91,

Stanley, Thomas, 'History of Ancient Pholosophy' by, un. 250, 503, His edition of Eschylas, ni. 250.

Stapulensis, Faber, conduct of, i 347. Ed tou of the Scriptures by, 375.

Star Chamber, the, n. 267

Stationers Company founded in 1555, ii. 967.

Statios Achilles, or Estaco, a Portuguese commentator, 1. 481,

Status, 'Theband' of, it 202, ni. 469. Statistics, writers on, in. 441. Statistical topography, in 520.

Steele, the ' Conscious Lovers of,' iii. 51%. Steevens, commentator on Shakspeare, ii. 171, 177, iii. 38, 94,

Stellatus, Palingenius, the Zodaicus

Stephens, Henry, his crudition, i. 482 His press celebrated, 489. Life of, by Mattaire, ib, n. By Almeloveen and other biographers, ib. n. His Thesaurus Langue Latine, t. 483, 485. His own testimony on various lexicons,

i. 325. 454 n. Scapula's abraigment of the 'Thesaurus' of, 4%5 Dies in poverty, 486. His philological works, 308, 496, ili, 538. Epigrams, i. 145. Farbid to print, 266. logy for Herolotus by, 368.

Robert, ' Thesaurus,' of i. The Novum Testomentum Griecum,' &c. &c. edited by, 575. 486, n. 566, n. 989, Stermus, Sonon, his Staties, 11, 241, 242. Stewart, Dugnid, Metaphysical Works of, it 28, 51, 401, 432, it, 456, 461. 474, n. 377, 379, 381, 385 iii. 273, 365 433

Sufelius, Michael, ii. 221. in. 171. Still, John, Bishop of Bath and Webs, Sullingficet, polemical writings of, in. 26 % 276, 295, 372,

Stir ing. Earl of, somets of, in. 41. His poem of * Domissky, it is, Stockwood, John, his Progymusma

Scholastering' in S13 in Strada Famianic, ii 28th. The Informa Famiani of Scioppins, 285 The · Probasiones Acad rese of in 131, Strasburg, books pulsashed at, it, 263, Stragelius, 'Luci Theologici' of, i. 561

Strozzi, poem on chocolate by, ili, 480. Strype, John, his ' Lafe of Smith,' i. 334. n. Remarks of, ii 39.

Stunion, the Spanish commentator, i. ,08.

Sturm, John, his treatise on Education in Germany, i. 340.

Suard, remarks of on the French theatre. ii. 163. n.

Suarez of Granada, his treatise de Logibus, in 500 Titles of his ten books, 501. His perpetual quotations, 503. His Metaphysica. Disputations, 3"0. His theory of government, 522. His work of laws, 523, 540, Suckling, Sir John, poetry of, ni. 44. Soicas, proverb quoted from, i. 189. His lexicon, 219.

Sun, spots of the discovered by Harriott, Fabricius, and Schemer, in 88. 100 revolution round its axis, ib.

Supra-laparian tenets, n. 330. Supremacy over the Church, question of, 11 3 39, et seg. Remarks on regal supremacy, 341. Surrey, Earl of, his style of poetry described, i. 417, 419. The introducer of blank verse, 420. Poems of, il.

119. Character of, by Sidney, 124. Swabian period of German poetry, i.

Swammerdam, the naturalist, ' History of Inwests' by, vii. 57%.

Sweynbern, the printer, 1, 186. Swift, Dean, in. 556. Has . Tale of a Tub, i. 437. m. 563

Switzerhand, the Reformation begun by Zwingle at Lurich, i. 292. Doctr.nes of the Protestants of, 545, Sydenbam, Dr , m. 389. Sydney, Sir Philip, ii. 80, 169. His * Arcadia,* in 1 st. 216, 218, 10, 236. Delence of Porsic, it 124, 197, 211. Poems of 176. in. 514.

—, Algernon, his Discourses on Government, n. 450.

Sylborgian his Greek grammar, i. 275. Ilia Aristotle and 488 nr. 245. Dionysus, 491.

Sylvanic Datch physician, mi, 212 388, bylanes, the French grammarian, i. 442. Synergists, tenets of a 549.

· Syntagina Philosophicum of Gassendi, in 208, 315 971.

hyphon, power of the, isi, 200.

hyriac version of the Bibbe, in 248. ht. 224 The Maronite college of Mr. L. banus, 16

Tabernamontanus, figures used by, ii.

Table-talk of Selden, il. 357. n. Character of the, 508.

Tacitus, the 'Annals' of, i. 262. ii. 268. Lipsus's edition of, 480. Savile's translation of, 514. Commentary on, translation of, 514. iii. 427. Davanzati's translation of, ii. 190.

Talmud, the study of the, iii. 223.

Talon, Omer, 'Institutiones Oratoriee' of, ii. 208.

Tanaillo, Italian poet, his 'La Balia,' ii. 146.

Tapsensis, Vigilius, the African bishop, works of reviewed, iii. 536.

Tartaglia, Nicolas, his solution of cubic equations in algebra, i. 446. Unfairly published by Cardan, ii. 219. mechanica, 230.

Tasso, Bernardo, his 'Amadigi,' ii. 92. Celebrated sonnet by, 93. n.

-, Torquato, the 'Jerusalem Delivered of, ii. 95. et seq. 206. iii. 463. Comparison of with Homer and Virgil, ii. 96. 100. And with Ariosto, 99, 100. Excellence of his style, 97. 188. His conceits, 98. Defects of the poem, ib. His peculiar genius, 99. The 'Aminta' of, 150. His ' Torrismond,' a tragedy, 149.

Tassoni, his observations on the poetry of Bembo, i. 407. On Petrarch, &c., iii. 130. 'Seechia Rapita' of, 8. 46. 4.58.

Tauler's sermons, in German, i. 48. ii.

Taurellus, Nicholas, his ' Alpes Casse,' ii, 5, 6, n. Tavannes, political memoirs by, il. 48.

Tavelegus, grammer of, i. 338. n. Tavernier, his travels in the East, iii. 594.

Taylor, Jeremy, ii. 326. 332. His Die-masive from Popery, iii. 268. 298. Sermons of, ii. 359. Devotional writings of, 360. His Ductor dubitantium, iii. 381. 390. 399. Its character and defects, 381. His ' Liberty of Prophesying, ii. 345. Boldness of His defence of toleration, 349. 351. Effect treatise, 353. Its defects, ib. Effect of his His defence of episcopacy, 354. iii. 549, ----, Brook, 'Contemplatio Philoso-phica' of, il. 440, n.

4 Telemachus, Fénelon's, iii. 557. Telescope, invention of the, iii. 201. Dutch, or spying-glasses, 202.

Telesio, Bernard, plausible hypotheses of, ii. 7. 371, 372, 389.

Tellez, a Spanish metaphysican, il. 370.

Temple, Sir William, iii. 251, 549. His defence of antiquity, 551, Tenneman, on the Origin of Modern Philosophy, i. 13. n.

Tepel, his history of the Cartesian philosophy, iii. 317. n.

Terence, comedies of, first printed as verse, i. 267. Editions of, 472.

Testi, imitator of Horace, iii. 11. Teutonic languages, the, i. 10, 125.

Theatre of Europe, i. 207. The French stage, ii. 162. n. &c. The early En-glish drama, i. 43!. ii. 166. &c. Theatres in Paris, 165. Theatres, Closed by London, 168, iii, 77, 78, the parliament, 79. Extant English Mysteries, i. 210. Forbidden in Spain, ii. 160. See Drama.

Theobaid, commentator on Shakspeare, iñ. 93.

Theodore, archbishop, i. 5.

Theodoric persecutes Boethius, i. 2. Theodosius, Code of the Emperor, i. 59. iii. 447.

-, the geometrician, i. 445. Theocritus, i. 219. 267. 408. ii. 123.

'Theologia Moralis' of Escobar, ii. 500. Theological literature, History of, i. 527. ii. 298. iii. 258. 291. 297. Change in the character of, 280. Expositions in theology, i. 560. iii. 281.

Theology, system of i. 12. ii. 407. Public schools of in Italy, 86. Controversial, i. 516. 559. Scholestic method of, 560.

Theophrestus on Plants, ii. 234. Lectures by Duport on, iii. 249. His ' Characters,' 409. On Botany, i. 457. Theosophists, sect of, ii. 578.

Theresa, St., mysticism of, ii. 361.

Thermometer, the, ini. 569. Thevenot, travels of, iii. 593.

Thibault, king of Navarre, troubadour, î. 32,

Thomists, the sect of, i. 378. 545. ii. 2. See Aquinas.

Thomson, Dr., on Anatomy, iii. 576. Thouars, M. du Petit, ii. 249.

Thuanus, M. de Thou, Latin style of, ii. 5, 28, Iii. 232, Thucydides, editors of, i. 479. iii. 251 Thyard, the French poet, ii. 118.

Thysius, a French critic, ii. 282. Tibaldeo, Italian poet, i. 225.

Tick, Professor, remarks on Shakspeare by, ii. 174.

Tifernas, George, teacher of Greek at Paris, i. 180.

Tillotson, Archbishop, ii. 327. iii 276, 277. His sermons, ii. 335. n. iii. 29" 222

Tiedemann, remarks of, i. 13. Tintoret, paintings of, ii. 101. Tiraboschi quoted, i. S. n. 4. n. 501. 503, iii. 85, 522. 'Titus Andronicus,' not a play of Shakspeare's, ii. 176. Tobacco plant, earliest notice of, ii. 241. Toleration of religions, ii. 47. 343. 349. Toletus, the Jesuit, his ' Summa casuum conscienties,' ii. 500. Tolomei, Claudio, il. 87. 94. Tonelli, his notes on Poggio, i. 83. n. Torelli, his tragedy of ' Merope,' ii. 149. Torrentius, his Horace, ii. 279. Torricelli, high merit of, iii, 126. draulies of, 199. Tortus, Matthew, answer of, ii. 299. Toscanelli, gnomon in Florence cathedral by, i. 184. Tostatus, Alfonsus, i. 170. Tottel's Miscellanies, ii. 119. Toulouse, University of, i. 15. Tournebœuf. See Turnebus. Tournefort. His Elémens de la Botanique,' iii. 577. 579. Toussain, eminent scholar, i, 328, 475. Toutain, his ' Agamemnon,' from Senece, ii. 163. ' Toxophilus,' or Treatise on Archery, by Ascham, i. 441. Trade, on Foreign, iii. 441. Tragedy, Italian, t. 426. ii. 149. iii. 54. 57. Spanish, ii. 157. French, 163. iii. 68. et seq. English, 84. et seq. Ancient Greek, 466. Rymer on, 547. See Drama, and names of dramatic authors. Translating, Dryden on the Art of, iii. 547. Transubstantiation, controversy on, i. 17. Travels, early writers of, i. 260. Later writers of, iii. 593. Traversari, Ambrogio, on Profane Literature, i. 94. On Translations from the Greck, 97. Treaties, public, iii. 558. 574. Truces and conventions, 576. Tremellius, the Hebrew critic, i. 567. Trent, the Council of, its proceedings and history, i. 863. 538, 539. m. 544. 566. li. 266. 301, 318, Triglandius, a notable theologian at Utrecht, ii 458. Trinitarian controversy, the, i. 546. ii.

Triquero, Spanish dramatist, ii. 158.

counterfeited, i. 200.

Trusmegistus, Hermes, philosophy of,

Trimino, principles of his ' Italia Liberata, i. 359. 409. Tristan, the 'Marianne' of, iii. 79. Trithemins, ' Annales Hirsargienees' of, i. 149. Trivium mode of education, i. S. n. ii. 258. Troubadours, and Provençal poets, i. 51. 'Troye, Recueil des Histoires de,' by Canton, i. 157. Truth, intuitive, on, ii 453. Trypho, Greek treatises of i. 321. Tubingen monastery, Hebrew taught in, i. 255. Turamini, ' de legibue,' ii. 76. Turberville, poems of, ii. 127. Turenne, Marshal, iii. 263. 294. Turkish Spy,' the, ii, 514. n. iii, 559. Turks, History of the, iii. 146. Th The Turkish language, 225. Turnebus, i. 328. His translations of Greek classics into Latin, i. 475. His 'Adversaria,' 476. Montaigne's character of, ib. His reputation, 483. His ' Ethics of Aristotle,' 492. Turner, Dr., his New Herbal, ii. 240. His ' Avium pracipuarum historia,' i. Turner's History of England, i. S. 6. n. 7. n. On Erigens, 9. On Scholasticism, 14, Turpin, romance of 'Charlemagne' by, i. 223, Turrecremata, Joannes de, his ' Explanatio in paalterium,' i. 156. Tycho Brahe, Mundane System of, ii. 228. et seq. His discovery as to the path of comets, ii. 229. iii. 186. Tymme, Thomas, translations by, i. 393. Tyndale's, the first English version of the New Testament, i. 357. 373. Tyrwhitt's observations on Chaucer, i. 30. n. 420. Twining on the Poetics of Aristotle, ii. 204. Ubuldi, Guido, Geometrical Treatises of, Udal, Nicholas, i. 333, 433. His comedy of 'Ralph Roister Doister,' 434. ii. 166. Uguccio, the lexicographer, i. 78. Ulpian on the Roman Law, ii. 73. Understanding, Malebranche on the, iii. 331. Locke's 'Essay on the Human,' 914, 362, Unitarians, Polish and German, iii. 277. Universal character, on a, by Dalgarno, ші. 361.

Universal ideas, question of the reality of, i. 19. How formed, iii. 351.

Universities: - Origin of the name, i. 15. Of Paris, 11. Its succession of early professors, 19, 20. Of Bologua, Of Padus, 19. ii. 257. 370. Of Toulouse, i. 15. Collegiate foundations, not derived from the Saracens, Cordova and Granada possessed gymnasia rather than universities, ib. Of Oxford, 15. Its great men, io. n. ii. 258. iii. 248. Of Germany, i. SS1. Italian universities, i. 503. ii. 257. Of Leyden, ii. 258. iii. 225. 316. n. Of Altdorf and Helmstadt, ii. 370. Of Copenhagen, i. 332. Of Prussia, ib. Of Marburg, ib. Of Konigsberg, Of Jenn, ib. Of Scotland, 515. Of Seville, i. 172. Of ii. 20. 258. Salamanca, ib. Of Alcala, ib. State of, in the seventeenth century, iii. 229. Urban VIII, Matthei Barberini, il. 304. iii. 50. 52. 128.

Urbino, Francis, duke of, i. 521.

Urfé, d', romance of, iii. 160. 460. 557. Usher, Archbishop, ii. S57. Forms the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, iii. 231. His Annals of the Old Testament, 256. His Chronology, 956.

'Utopia' of More, i. 274.

Vacarius in 1149 taught at Oxford, L

Vaillant, work on medals by, iii. 256. Vair Du, criticisms on the style of, iii. 142, Valdes, a Spanish teacher of the Reformation, i. 361.

Valentinian, by Fletcher, iii. 105.

Valerianus, de infelicitate litteratorum, i. 314. n.

Valla, Laurentius, works and criticisms of, i. 142, 143, 172, 176, 284, 320, 996. 332. 484. a.

Valle, Pietro della, bis Travels, iii. 226. Vallée, pamphlet of, against Christianity, i. 564, Valois, Henry, philological works of, ıii. 248.

Van Dale on ancient oracles, iii. 523. Vanbrugh, Sir John, dramas of, iii. 504.

Vanini, Lucilio, burnt at Paris, ii. 362. Varchi, history by, i. 463. His dislogues, the 'Ercolano,' ii. 205. Praise of Dante above Homer by, 206. Varenius, 'Syntaxis Grace linguae' of, i.

Varignon, M., Statics of, ii. 232. Varino, the Greek scholar of Italy, i. 220. Variorum editions of the classics, iii, 243, Varoli, the 'Anatomia' of, ii.246. Vasa, Gustavus, confiscates ecclesiastical property, i. 343.

Vasari, his paintings in the Sistine chapel, i. 584.

Vasquez, law writer, il. 82, 370.

Vasquius, Quotations of, ii. 503. Vassan, de, M., collects the 'Scaliger-ana secunda,' i. 504.

Vatable, Professor of Hebrew, L 327. Vatican, library of the, i. 467. ii. 259.

Vaugelas, M. de, Remarks on the French language by, iii. 141. 527. tionary edited by, iii. 139.

Vaumorière, De, a continuator, iii. 162. Vaux, Nicholas, Lord, poet, i. 422. ii.

Vayer, La Mothe le, Dialogues of, il. 510. Considerations of, iii. 142.

Vega, Gircilasso de la, i. 411. ii. 102.

______ Lope de, Spanish plays of, ii.
106. n. 154. iii. 59, 60. His fertility, ii. 155. Versification, ib. larity, 156. Comedy, 157. Tragedy, 158. Spiritual plays of, 160.

Vagetable productions, on, ii. 241. Vegius, Maphous, Æneid continued by, L 191, il. 202, Velasquez, history of Spanish poetry by, ii. 104. 106.

Veldek, Henry of, i. 36.

Velthuysen, 'de justi et decori,' &c., ili.

Venesection introduced, ii. 257.

Venice, contest of Pope Paul V. with, ii. 299. Republic of, iii. 426. 429. Its commerce and government, ii. 526, 527. Academy of, 262.

Venus, transit of, over the sun, and the phases of, iii. 194.

Verscity, Puffendorf on, iii. 403. Verdier, Bibliothèque Française by, ii. 209, 264, Vergara, Greek Grammar of, i. 325. 487. Vergerio, Peter Paul, an early Greek translator, i. 97.

Verona, Two Gentlemen of, ii. 178. Vertunien, Francis, collections of, i.

504. n. Vesalius, de corporis humani fabrica, His anatomical discoveries 1, 454. 455. ii. 245. His disgrace and death, i. 456. See also iii. 212.

Vesling, the anatomist, writings of, iii.

Vespucci, Americo, discoveries of, i. 261. Vettori, Peter, edition of Cicero by, i. His Greek erudition, 322. SI 9. 'Varise lectiones' of, 476. opinion of, 477.

Vicente, Gil, dramas of, i. 256. 429. Vico, Eneas, on Numismatics, i. 523. ii. 261.

Victor Vitensis, edition by Chiflet of, iii. 536.

Victoria, Francis à, 'Relectiones theologices' of, ii. 77. 89. Opinions of, on public law, 78.

Victorin of Feltre, i. 85.

Victorius, Professor, i. 319.

Vida, of Cremona, Latin poet, i. 423. 464. iii. 461. Ars Poetica' of, ii.

Vidua Vidius, anatomist, i. 456. ii. 246. Vienna, public library at, i. 467. ii. 258. Vieta [Francis Viete] his reputation as an algebraint, i. 447-449. ii. 221. Mathematical works of, iii. 179. gebra of, 180.

Vieussens, discoveries by, in the anatomy of the nerves, iii. 587.

Viger, or Vigerius, 'de Idiotismis,' ii. 275.

Vigilius Tapsensis, iii. 536.

Vigneul-Marville, or M. D'Argonne, iii. 135. 526. 529. n. His Mélanges de Littérature, 541.

Vignola, Perspective of, ii. 230. Villedieu, or Des Jardins, Madame, novels of, iii. 554.

Villegas, Manuel Estevan de, poems of, iii. 13.

Villon, poems of, i. 207.

Vincent de Beauvais, i. 114, 115. Vincente introduces regular drama in Europe, i. 256. n. Vincentius Livinensis, il. 395. 335.

Vinci, Lionardo da, painter, i, 216, 217. 454. Viner, Abridgment of Law by, iii. 447.

Vinnius, Commentaries of, ii. 70. 540. Virgil, Eclogues of, i. 272, 333, iii. 460.

Æneid of, ii. 107. iii. 469. Continuation by Maphæus, i. 191. ii. 202. Caro's Italian translation, ii. 95. Imitation of the Georgies of, iii. 482, Tamo compared with, ii. 95. 98. 151. Camoens compared with, 107. Homer compared with, ii. 200.

, Polydore, i. 229. Visconti, contributor to the Biographie Universelle,' iii. 255. n.

Visè, the 'Mercure Galant' of, iii. 536. Vitelli, Cornelio, i.110. 229.

Vitello, treatise on optics of, i. 110, 445. ii. 230.

Vitensis, Victor, the African bishop, works of, iii. 536.

'Vitiis sermonis, de,' treatise by G. Vossius, ii. 287.

Vitruvius on Architecture, £ 215.

Vives, ethical writings of, i. 326. 367. Attack on the Scholastics by, 378.

Viviani, solution of the area of the cycloid by, iii. 478. 565.

Vlacq, the Dutch bookseller, iii. 174. -, preceptor of Princess Mary, 378. Character of his works, 378, n.

Vost, Gisbert, Dissertationes theologicae' of, ii. 356, 357. Controversy of with Descartes, 458. Voiture, letters of, ii. 490. iii. 196, 197. Poetry of, 21, 524, 530, n. 541, Volkelius, ' de vera Religione,' Il. 336. Volpone' of Ben Jonson, iii. 96.

Voltaire, saroasms of, iii, 137, 262, marks of, ii. 95, 106, iii. 354, 362. 594. Poetry of, i. 194, iii. 459. dramatic works, 490, 520. His style, Vondel, Dutch writer of tragedy, iii. 26. Voragine, James of, 'Golden Legend' of, L 129.

Vossius, Gerard, philological works of, i. 489. n. ii. 287, 289, iii. 244. toria Pelagiana, by, 833. n.

-, Isane, 'Catullus' and 'Pompo-' nius Mela of, iii. 244, Aristarchus of, 246.

Voyages, early writers of, i. 260. 461. ii. 251. iii. 227. English voyages of discovery, ii. 253. iii. 593.

Vulgate, translations of, printed at Delft. in 1497, i. 374.

Wace, poems of, i. 35.

Wakefield, Robert, lectures at Cambridge by, i. 399. ii. 249.

Waldenses, poems attributed to the, i. 28. n.

Waldis, Burcard, a German fabulist, ii. 118.

Waller, versification of, iii. 42. 461. 474. Panegyric on Cromwell by, 462. Wallis, 'History of Algebra' by, i. 449.

ii. 221. iii. 180. His Institution of Logic, 302. 564. Walpole, Horace, ii. 216. Correspondence of, iii. 137. 525.

Walther, Bernard, the mathematician, i. 184. Buys the MSS, of Regiomontanus, ib.

Walton, Isaac, his 'Complete Angler,' iii. 550. Life of Hooker by, ii. 25. n. Brian, Polyglott of, iii. 590.

War, the Rights of, treatises on, by Ayala, ii. 79. By Gentilis, 81. 529. 541 . 546. 565. 567.

Warburton, Bishop, ii. 327. Comments on Shakspeare by, iii. 93. Remarks of, 291. 307.

Warner, his 'Albion's England,' ii. 127.

Warton, Dr., on the French versions of Latin authors, i. 76. n. Criticisms of, 208, 260, 305, 387, 435, ii. 209. On the Latin poetry of Milton, iii. 55.

Watson, poems by, ii. 125. Wealth of Nations, ii. 526, iii. 441.

Webbe, his Discourse of English Poetry i. 511. ii. 132, 209. His travestic of the 'Shepherd's Kalendar,' ii. 139. Webster, dramas of, iii. 121, 122.

Weimar, literary academy established at, in 1617, i. 467. n. iii. 22.

Weller's Greek grammar, il. 275. Wencesias, critique on Rotrou's, iii. 76. Worder, German translator of Ariosto and Tasso, iii. 23, Werner, his ancient geometrical analysis restored, i. 445. Wesley, remark by, on the instinct of animals, ii. 385.

Wessel of Groningen, i. 177. West, Dr. W., of Dublin, remarks by, i, 179, 390.

Westminster school, Greek taught in, i. 396, 510,

Whateley, Archbishop, Elements of Logic' of, ii. 398, 427, p. 476, 489, p. Whetstone, plays by, ii. 168. lii. 77.

Whewell, Mr., remarks of, ii. 232. n.

Whichcot, tenets of, iii. 276, 277.

Whitaker, i. 555. Translation of Nowell by, 510.

White, Thomas, or Albius, iii. 301.

Whitgift, reply of, to Cartwright, i. 516. The 'Lambeth Articles' by, ii. 330. Whittingham, Bible of, i. 567.

Wicliffe, John, i. 170.

Wicquefort's 'Ambasandor,' iii. 448. Widmandstadt's New Testament in Syriac, ii. 248.

Wierus ' de præstigiis,' i. 565.

Wilkins, on the 'Principles of Natural Religion,' iii. 277. On a 'Philoso-phical language,' 361, 523. His Discovery of a New World in the Moon, 550. See also 565.
Willer of Augsburg, the first publisher of catalogues of new books, ii. 263.

William of Champeaux, his school of logic at Paris, i. 14.

 Duke of Guienne, troubadour, i. 31. III., reign of, iii. 438, 442.

478.

Williams, Dr., library of, ii. 77. Willis, Dr., his 'Anatomy of the Brain,' iii. 587. Theory of, 589.

Willoughby's Natural History, ii. 288. iii. 572.

Wills, alienation of property by, ii. 553. Wilson's 'Art of Logic,' i. 434. ii. 209. His 'Art of Rhetoric,' ii. 193. 209. Wimpfeling, reputation of, i. 179. 347.

467.

Winchester collegiate school, education of boys at, in 1586, i. 510, n. Winterton, 'Poets Minorea' of, ii, 278. Wiston, geological theory of, ii. 584.

Wit and fancy, Hobbes on, ii. 484. Witchcraft, books against the punishments for, i. 511. 516. 565.

Wittich, works of, iii. S17.

Wither, George, poems of, iii. 43. Wittenberg, the university of, i. 285. 291, 292. 379. 543.

Witton School, Cheshire, statutes of, i. 511.

Wolf's Demosthenes, i. 479. 493. n. Wolsey, Cardinal, i. 334. ii. 282.

Woman, the Silent, by Ben Jonson, iii. 97.

Women, gallantry towards, its effects, Probable origin of, ib. i, 126.

Wood, Anthony, his enumeration of great scholars whose names render Oxford illustrious, i. 16. n. 236, 378. n. Woodward, on the nutrition of plants, iii. 582. On geology, 565.

Worde, Wynkyn de, books printed by, i. 267. n.

World, physical theory of the, ii. 7. 9. Wotton, on 'Modern and Ancient Learning,' iii. 251. 559. Wren, Sir Christopher, iii. 566. 586.

Wright, Edward, mathematician, ii. 227. On Navigation, 255. Wurstieius, or Urstieius, Christian, ii.

Wurtzburgh, converts in, i. 535.

Wyatt, Sir John, poems of, i. 417. 421, 422. ii. 119. His epistle to John Poins, L 418. n.

Sir Thomas, works of, i. 417. Wycherley's ' Plain Dealer,' and ' Country Wife, iii. 504, 515. Wykeham, William de, founds a col-lege and schools, i. 162.

Wytenbogart, controversy of, with Grotius, li. 914. Remarkable letter to. from Erasmus, 317.

Xavier, St. Francis, i. 369. Xenophon, editions and versions of, i. 479. 479.

Ximenes, Cardinal, i. 467. ii. 259. 308. Prints the Greek Testament, i. 284. Xylander, Plutarch by, i. 479. ii. 34.

York, school of, i. 6. ' Yorkshire Tragedy,' a work of merit, ii. 174.

Ypres, Janaenius, Bishop of, ii. 336.

Zaccarias, a Florentine monk, translation of the Scriptures by, in 1542, i.

Zachary (Pope) releases the Franks from allegiance to Childeric, i. 559.

Zainer, a printer at Cracow in 1465, L 156. At Augsburg, 157.

Zamberti, the first translator of Euclid, i. 445.

Zamoscius, 'de Senatu Romano,' i. 520. Zanchius, i. 562.

Zarot, printer at Milan, i. 158. 166. 219.

Zasius, Ulrie, Professor at Friburg, on Erasmus, i. 283. n. Led the way to more elegant jurisprudence, id. 404. Zell, Ulric, printer at Cologne, i. 156.

Zeni, the brothers, voyage of, in 1400, ii.

Zeno, Apostolo, i. 180. 225. 238. n. ii. 399.

Zerbi of Verona, work on 'Anatomy' by, i. 260.

Zerbino, stories of, il. 905.

Zeunius, ii. 275.

'Zodiacus Vita,' moral poem by Manzolli, i. 359.

Zoology, writers on, i. 457. ii. 235. 238.

iii. 206. 572. et seq. Zopyrus, betrayal of Babylon by, inexcusable, ii. 577.

Zorosster, i. 200. Religion of, iii. 591. Zouch's ' Elementa Juris Civilis,' ii. 540. Zurich, the reformed religion taught by Zwingle at, i. 293. Anabaptists condemned at, and drowned in the lake of, 549. Gesner's botanical garden at, 241.

Zwingle or Zuinglius, Reformer, i. 293. His tenets differed from Luther's, 346. His variance with Erasmus, Character of his writings, 367. 959. Published in a fictitious name, 357. His death, 355. Foretold by Luther, 494. Charge of religious intolerance against, not proved, i. 549.

Zwoll, college of, i. 177.

. For some names and topics unavoidably omitted in the INDEX, the READER is requested to refer to the Convents of each Volume.

THE END.

LONDON: Printed by A. Sportuswoods, New-Street-Square.

*

•

.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN GRADUATE LIBRARY DATE DUE 新女女 APR 19 1976 AUG 1 0 1994

